

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

B 1,015,318

J

301

1721

HANSARD'S
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

THIRD SERIES:

COMMENCING WITH THE ACCESSION OF

WILLIAM IV.

50° VICTORIÆ, 1887.

VOL. CCCXII.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM
THE ELEVENTH DAY OF MARCH 1887
TO
THE THIRTIETH DAY OF MARCH 1887.

THIRD VOLUME OF THE SESSION.

LONDON:
PUBLISHED BY CORNELIUS BUCK & SON,
AT THE OFFICE FOR "HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,"
22, PATERNOSTER ROW. [E.C.]
1887.

J
301
H21

General

J 301
H 21
V. 312
3rd Series

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TO

VOLUME CCCXII:

THIRD SERIES.

LORDS, FRIDAY, MARCH 11.

FOREIGN HORSE-BREEDING DÉPÔTS—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

Address for—

Page

"Copies or extracts of reports of Her Majesty's diplomatic agents at Paris, Vienna, and Berlin, on the subject of horse-breeding dépôts, forwarded to the Foreign Office in the year 1884,"—(The Earl of Strarford)

1

Address agreed to.

UNIVERSAL PENNY POSTAGE—MOTION FOR A PAPER—

Moved, for—

"The fourth letter written by Mr. Henniker Heaton, M.P., to the Postmaster General on the subject of the universal penny postage,"—(The Earl of Crawford)

3

Motion agreed to.

[4.45.]

COMMONS, FRIDAY, MARCH 11.

LONDON CORPORATION (CHARGES OF MALVERSATION)—

Select Committee nominated :—List of the Committee

4

QUESTIONS.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—CONSTITUTION OF THE FORCE—Question, Captain Colomb; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)

4

MARRIAGE ACT—NONCONFORMIST MARRIAGES—LEOMINSTER—Question, Mr. T. Blake; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)

5

INDIA—TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT—Question, Colonel Hughes-Hallett; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)

6

LAW AND JUSTICE—COURT HOUSES—ACCOMMODATION FOR PRISONERS AWAITING TRIAL—Questions, Mr. Childers, Sir John Kennaway, Mr. Caleb Wright, Mr. Shirley, Mr. Channing; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)

6

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—DUNMANWAY PETTY SESSIONS—CASE OF FELIX SWENNY—Question, Mr. Gilhooly; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)

7

VOL. CCCXII. [THIS SERIES.] [b]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 11.]	Page
NAVY—EMPLOYMENT OF MARINES ON PRIVATE SERVICE—Question, Mr. Gilhooly; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	7
EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—MR. JOHN FROST, CO. CLARE—TRAVELLING EXPENSES OF THE POLICE FORCE—Question, Mr. P. M'Donald; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) ..	8
AGRICULTURE (IRELAND)—EDUCATIONAL STATIONS—Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) ..	8
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT BELFAST—REPORTS OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF INQUIRY—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) ..	9
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT BELFAST—COLONEL FORBES, R.M., AND MR. M'CARTHY, R.M.—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) ..	9
LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—EVIDENCE IN REVENUE CASES—Question, Mr. Godson; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) ..	10
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS AT ENNISKILLEN, &c.—Question, Mr. H. Campbell; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	11
SOUTH AFRICA (NATAL)—THE CHIEF LANGALIBALELE—Question, Mr. Dillwyn; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) ..	11
POLICE (METROPOLIS)—DAYLIGHT ROBBERIES IN THE STREETS—Question, Mr. Knowles; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	12
LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—MULTIPLE APPOINTMENTS IN BAMPTON DISTRICT, OXFORDSHIRE—Question, Mr. F. W. Maclean; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) ..	12
LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—CASE OF WILLIAM CASSELS—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) ..	13
THE CURRENCY, GOLD AND SILVER (ROYAL COMMISSION)—Question, Mr. Montagu; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	14
ARMY MEDICAL STAFF (INDIA)—BRIGADE SURGEONS—Question, Colonel Hughes-Hallett; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) ..	14
INLAND REVENUE (IRELAND)—THE COLLECTORSHIP AT SLIGO—Questions, Mr. Kennedy, Mr. P. M'Donald; Answers, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) ..	15
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—REMOVAL OF CATTLE FROM IRELAND—PLEURO-PNEUMONIA—Question, Colonel Gunter; Answer, The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Lord John Manners) ..	15
PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (IRELAND)—NORTH ANTRIM—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) ..	16
MERCHANT SHIPPING—THE WRECK OF THE "FLAMINGO"—Question, Mr. C. W. Gray; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) ..	17
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—SHIPMENT OF INFECTED CATTLE FROM DUBLIN—PLEURO-PNEUMONIA—Question, Colonel Gunter; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) ..	17
ARMY—MUSKETRY—EFFICIENCY OF THE INFANTRY—Question, Mr. Howard Vincent; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	18
BULGARIA—EXECUTIONS OF INSURGENTS—Questions, Mr. Dillon; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	19

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 11.]	Page
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF—Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	19
PUBLIC OFFICIALS—BETRAYAL OF TRUST—Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	20
PUBLIC OFFICIALS—THE DOCKYARDS—BETRAYAL OF TRUST—Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	20
GREENWICH HOSPITAL—AGE PENSIONS—Question, Sir Edmund Commerell; Answer, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett (A Lord of the Admiralty)	21
METROPOLIS—COAL AND WINE DUES—THE BLACKWALL AND GREENWICH TUNNEL—Questions, Mr. Lyell, Mr. Webster; Answers, The Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg)	21
OPEN SPACES (METROPOLIS)—BURTON'S COURT, CHELSEA—Question, Mr. Whitmore; Answer, The Financial Secretary, War Department (Mr. Brodriek)	22
PUBLIC PARKS AND WORKS (METROPOLIS) BILL—THE VICTORIA PARK ESTATE—Question, Mr. Pickersgill; Answer, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket)	23
POST OFFICE—ADDRESS TO THE POSTMASTER GENERAL—Question, Mr. Dixon-Hartland; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	23
ARMY (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—CONTRACT FOR CARTRIDGES—Question, Mr. James Stuart; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote)	24
METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS—SEWAGE PRECIPITATION WORKS AT BARKING—Question, Mr. Salt; Answer, The Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg)	24
LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (IRELAND)—THE BOROUGH OF NEWRY AND THE COUNTIES OF DOWN AND ARMAGH—FISCAL RELATIONS—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)	25
THE EXHIBITIONS OF 1884, 1885, 1886—Question, Mr. Watt; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	25
THE IRISH LAND QUESTION—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Cobb; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	26
PUBLIC OFFICIALS—THE DOCKYARDS—BETRAYAL OF TRUST—Questions, Mr. Caldwell, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	26
THE CONTRACT SYSTEM OF THE ADMIRALTY—THE ROYAL COMMISSION—IRREGULAR PUBLICATION OF EVIDENCE—Personal Explanation, Sir William Plowden; Reply, The Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood)	27
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE NAVY ESTIMATES—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	37
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE NAVY ESTIMATES—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	37
THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, AND THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1885—THE EVIDENCE—Questions, Colonel Hughes-Hallett, Mr. Hanbury; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	38
MERCHANDISE MARKS ACTS CONSOLIDATION—Question, Mr. Howard Vincent; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	39
THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, AND THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1885—MR. KNIFE'S REPORT—Questions, Mr. P. O'Brien, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	39

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 11.]

Page

ORDER OF THE DAY.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (RULES OF PROCEDURE)—RULE 1 (CLOSURE OF DEBATE)—RESOLUTION—ADJOURNED DEBATE [ELEVENTH NIGHT]—
Order read, for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Amendment proposed to the Main Question, as amended:—Question again proposed, “That the words ‘and also if a Clause be then under consideration’ stand part of the Question:”—Debate resumed	40
After debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 154, Noes 95; Majority 59.—(Div. List, No. 58.)
Amendment proposed,
In line 10, leave out “with the consent of the Chair, as aforesaid,” and insert the words “the assent of the Chair, as aforesaid, not having been withheld,”—(Mr. W. H. Smith)	64
After short debate, Amendment agreed to.
Amendment proposed,
In line 11, after the first word “That,” to insert the words “certain words of the Clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause, or That,”—(The Marquess of Hartington)	69
Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”
Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the words “or That,”—(Mr. Staveley Hill.)
Question proposed, “That the words ‘or That’ stand part of the said proposed Amendment:”—After debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 257, Noes 134; Majority 123.—(Div. List, No. 59.)
Question proposed,
“That the words ‘certain words of the Clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause, or That,’ be there inserted”	95
After short debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 278, Noes 100; Majority 178.—(Div. List, No. 60.)
Amendment proposed,
In line 12, after the word “Debate,” to insert the words “Provided that whenever the Chair does not withhold its assent to a Motion of Closure which, if carried, would withdraw from consideration any Amendment of which Notice has been given, the Chair shall declare whether such an Amendment is an abuse of the Rules of the House, or has been sufficiently discussed under some other form,”—(Mr. Childers) ..	106
Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted:”—After short debate, Moved, “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Mr. Labouchere:)—After further short debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 94, Noes 223; Majority 129.—(Div. List, No. 61.)
Question again proposed, “That those words be there inserted:”—Moved, “That this House do now adjourn,”—(Mr. Pictou) ..	121
After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Amendment (Mr. Childers), by leave, withdrawn.
Main Question, as amended, again proposed:—Debate further adjourned till Tuesday next.

MOTIONS.

Coroners’ Elections Bill—Ordered (Mr. Wootton Isaacson); presented, and read the first time [Bill 193]	124
Merchandise Marks Law Consolidation and Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Attorney General, Baron Henry De Worme, Mr. Stuart-Wortley); presented, and read the first time [Bill 194]	125

[2.45.]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, MONDAY, MARCH 14.

Page

Railway and Canal Traffic Bill (No. 32)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Stanley of Preston) .. 125
After debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 29th instant.

Incumbents of Benefices Loans Extension Act (1886) Amendment Bill (No. 39)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Duke of Buckingham and Chandos) .. 168
Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Church Sites (Compulsory Powers Repeal) Bill (No. 22)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Bishop of Lichfield) .. 168
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^a accordingly.

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order (Limerick Water) Bill [H.L.]—

Presented (The Lord Privy Seal) ; read 1^a (No. 42) .. 169

Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis) Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord Stratheden and Campbell) ; read 1^a (No. 43) .. 169

[9.0.]

COMMONS, MONDAY, MARCH 14.

QUESTIONS.

THE COPPER CURRENCY—FRENCH BRONZE COINS—Question, Mr. Atkinson ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	170
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—OMAGH POST OFFICE—Question, Mr. Gilhooly ; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	170
NAVY—THE CHANNEL SQUADRON AT LISBON AND GIBRALTAR—Question, Mr. Gourley ; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	171
SEED SUPPLY (IRELAND) ACT—REPAYMENT OF LOANS—Questions, Colonel Nolan, Mr. F. J. X. O'Brien ; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	171
THE MAGISTRACY (SCOTLAND)—MR. STIPENDIARY GEMMEL—Question, Mr. Caldwell ; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	172
COURT OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND)—REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE—Question, Mr. Mac Neill ; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	172
LAND PURCHASE (IRELAND) ACT—APPLICATIONS FOR ADVANCES—Questions, Mr. Mac Neill ; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	173
PROCLAIMED MEETINGS (IRELAND)—NATIONAL LEAGUE MEETING AT ASH-GROVE, CO. DUBLIN—Questions, Dr. Tanner, Mr. Chance ; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	173
WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—MARTINI-HENRY RIFLES—Question, Mr. Chance ; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	175
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—PROSECUTION OF DISTRICT INSPECTOR MILLING, ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—Questions, Mr. Chance ; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) ..	175
THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, AND THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1885—SHORTHAND WRITERS' NOTES—Questions, Mr. Chance, Mr. E. Harrington ; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	176

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 14.]

	Page
POST OFFICE—SALE OF STAMPS TO RAILWAY TELEGRAPH CLERKS—Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	176
LAND ACT (IRELAND)—WICKLOW TENANTS—Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	177
HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (CHANCERY DIVISION)—AN ADDITIONAL JUDGE—Question, Mr. F. W. Maclean; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) ..	177
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT—LOANS OF WORKS OF ART, &c.—Question, Mr. Bartley; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) ..	178
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—MR. E. RYAN, COMMITTED FOR CONTEMPT—Question, Mr. Finucane; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	179
EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—NOTICE TO RELIEVING OFFICERS—Question, Mr. Gilhooly; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) ..	179
LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—THE HERBUSTA CROFTERS—MRS. M'MILLAN—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) ..	180
PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (IRELAND)—NORTH ANTRIM ELECTION—MALICIOUS INJURY TO PROPERTY—Questions, Mr. M'Cartan; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	181
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—SACRILEGIOUS INJURY TO ATRHA CHURCH, CO. LIMERICK—Questions, Mr. Johnston, Mr. Abraham (Limerick, W.); Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	182
MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—BOATS AND LIFE-SAVING APPARATUS ON PASSENGER SHIPS—Question, Captain Price; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) ..	183
POST OFFICE—NEWSPAPER WRAPPERS AND "VANITY FAIR"—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	183
SHIPPING—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION—Question, Mr. Thomas; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) ..	184
ARMY—SENTENCES BY COURTS MARTIAL—THE RECENT RULES AND REGULATIONS—Question, Mr. A. B. D. Elliot; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	184
PROCLAIMED MEETINGS (IRELAND)—RETURNS—Questions, Mr. J. E. Ellis, Mr. Mac Neill; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	185
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—FATHER KELLER, YOUGHAL—Questions, Viscount Lynton, Mr. Lane; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour); Question, Mr. Lane [No reply] ..	185
INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS—COMBINED DEPARTMENTS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS—Question, Sir John Dorington; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	186
WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT) CONTRACTS FOR CARTRIDGES—MESSRS. KYNOCH AND Co.—Question, Sir Frederick Mappin; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) ..	187
WAR OFFICE—WARRANT OFFICERS—REGIMENTAL SERGEANT MAJORS—Questions, Mr. Seale-Hayne, Colonel Hughes; Answers, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	187
EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—EVICTIONS AT ENNISCOORTHY—EMPLOYMENT OF THE CONSTABULARY—A POINT OF ORDER—ALTERING QUESTIONS—Observations, Mr. J. E. Redmond; Reply, Mr. Speaker; Questions, Mr. J. E. Redmond; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	188
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—DISTRICT INSPECTOR SMITH, OF MACROOM—THE PROCLAIMED NATIONAL LEAGUE MEETING AT AARGROVE, CO. CORK—Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	191

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 14.]	Page
LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ACT—LABOURERS' DWELLINGS—NOTICES ON THE CORK UNION—Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	191
PRISONS (IRELAND)—HOURS OF OFFICIALS—Question, Mr. Hayden; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	192
LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—AFFRAY AT DRUMSNA, CO. LEITRIM—Question, Mr. Hayden; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	193
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—ALLEGED MISCONDUCT AT MACROOM—Questions, Dr. Tanner; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. Balfour) ..	193
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—THE RIOTS AT LURGAN—Questions, Mr. M'Oartan; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. J. Balfour) ..	194
LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACTS—THE ROYAL COMMISSION—EVIDENCE AS TO EVICTIONS—Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	195
RUSSIA—RUMOURED ATTEMPT ON THE LIFE OF THE Czar—Question, Mr. Puleston; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	196
HORSES—SUPPLY FOR MILITARY PURPOSES—Question, Sir William Crossman; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	196
MEMORANDUM OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE RELATING TO THE ARMY ESTIMATES, 1887-8	197

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—
COAST DEFENCES AND COALING STATIONS—THE PROTECTED BARBETTE SYSTEM OF FORTIFICATION—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed, To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the best way of utilising the protected barrette or disappearing system in coast defences and coaling stations,"—(Colonel Duncan,)—instead thereof ..	233
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to .
Main Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—
DEFENCES OF THE EMPIRE—COAST DEFENCES OF GREAT BRITAIN—Observations, Sir Edward Hamley:—Long debate thereon ..	238
Question put, and agreed to :—Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to .

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES, 1887-8—

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £149,391, Number of Land Forces.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ..	326
(2.) £4,522,000, Pay and Allowances.
Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday .

M O T I O N S .

Copyright (Musical Compositions) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Addison, Mr. Jennings, Mr. Howarth, Mr. Powell); presented, and read the first time [Bill 195] ..	334
COMMONS—
Select Committee appointed:—List of the Committee ..	334
VOL. CXXII. [THIRD SERIES.] [o]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 14.]	Page
Criminal Law (Scotland) Procedure (No. 2) Bill — Ordered (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland); presented, and read the first time [Bill 196]	334
Rating of Machinery Bill — Select Committee nominated :—List of the Committee	334
	[1.50.]

LORDS, TUESDAY, MARCH 15.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—COURT HOUSES—ACCOMMODATION FOR PRISONERS AWAITING TRIAL —Question, Observations, The Marquess of Ripon; Reply, The Paymaster General (Earl Beauchamp) ..	335
Church Patronage Bill (No. 26) — House in Committee (according to Order)	336
Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed , as amended. (No. 44.) [8.0.]

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MARCH 15.

QUESTIONS.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—DETECTIVE CONSTABLE P. MONOHAN —Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	349
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) —Mr. JAMES SIMMS, DRUMLANE, CO. DERRY—Questions, Mr. M'Cartan; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	350
COMMISSIONERS OF IRISH LIGHTS—CARLINGFORD LOUGH LIGHTKEEPERS' HOUSES —Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worme)	351
LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—LOANS —Question, Mr. Stanley Leighton; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	351
PARLIAMENT—PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS —Question Mr. Stanley Leighton; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	352
INDIA—MADRAS BOARD OF REVENUE—STATEMENT OF MR. THOMAS —Question, Mr. Gilhooly; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	352
INLAND REVENUE—INCOME TAX ON AMERICAN FLOUR MILLS COMPANIES —Question, Mr. Dixon-Hartland; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	353
IRELAND—THE ORANGE ORGANIZATION—UNION OFFICIALS —Questions, Mr. Chance, Mr. Johnston; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	353
RIVER THAMES—THE WATER COMPANIES—THE SEWAGE SYSTEM —Question, Mr. Dixon-Hartland; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	354
LAW AND JUSTICE—COURT HOUSES—ACCOMMODATION FOR PRISONERS AWAITING TRIAL —Question, Lord Elcho; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	355
THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON BI-METALLISM —Questions, Mr. Howorth, Mr. Childers; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	356
WAR OFFICE—SIGHT TEST FOR CANDIDATES FOR COMMISSIONS —Question, Sir Guyer Hunter; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	356
ILLEGAL MEETINGS (IRELAND)—STREET BANDS —Question, Mr. Chance; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)	357

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 15.]

Page

GREENWICH HOSPITAL—THEIR NORTHERN ESTATES—Questions, Sir Samuel Wilson, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett (A Lord of the Admiralty)	357
ZANZIBAR—BOMBARDMENT OF MINENGANI BY THE PORTUGUESE—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	358
POOR LAW (ENGLAND AND WALES)—“BOARDING OUT” OF PAUPER CHILDREN—Questions, Mr. Norris, Mr. Mundella; Answers, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	359
INDIA (RAILWAYS)—THE RAILWAY TO QUETTA—Questions, Mr. Buchanan; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	360
INLAND REVENUE—WITHDRAWAL OF THE COLLECTOR FROM SLIGO—Questions, Mr. O'Kelly, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	361
INDIA—VACCINATION LAWS IN BRITISH INDIA—PENALTIES—Question, Mr. Hunter; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	362
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—DISTURBANCES AT YOUGHAL—Question, Mr. Lane; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour); Question, Mr. Chance [No reply]	362
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—DISTURBANCES AT YOUGHAL—TELEGRAM FROM CAPTAIN PLUNKETT, DIVISIONAL MAGISTRATE—Questions, Mr. Lane, Mr. Seager Hunt, Mr. Chance, Mr. P. O'Brien, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour); Question, Mr. Fox [No reply]	362
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—JEREMIAH HEGARTY, MILLSTREET, CO. CORK—Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	365
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—IMPORTATION OF CATTLE FROM IRELAND INTO SCOTLAND—Questions, Mr. O'Doherty; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	366
THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS AND THE PADDINGTON TRUSTEES—SALE OF LAND—Question, Mr. Lionel Cohen; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson	367
POST OFFICE—POSTAGE TO AUSTRALIA AND NEW CALEDONIA—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	368
POST OFFICE—CHARGES FOR POSTAL ORDERS—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	369
EDUCATION (IRELAND)—NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS—Questions, Mr. Tuite; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	369
SOUTH AFRICA—GERMAN OCCUPATION OF PONDOLAND—Question, Dr. Clark; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland)	370
CEYLON—THE COLOMBO AND KANDY RAILWAY—Question, Sir Roper Lethbridge; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland)	370
STATE OF IRELAND—THE NORTH RIDING OF TIPPERARY—Question, Mr. P. J. O'Brien; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	372
POST OFFICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—THE HAMPSTEAD POST OFFICE—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	372
LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—THE ILKLEY LOCAL BOARD—REDUCTION OF THE QUOTA OF MEMBERS—Question, Mr. Barran; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	373
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—DISTRICT SURVEYORS—Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	374

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 15.]	Page
THE IMPERIAL INSTITUTE—THE SITE AT SOUTH KENSINGTON—Questions, Sir Samuel Wilson, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	375
THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, AND THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1885—"ANONYMOUS WITNESSES"—Question, Mr. Chance; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	375
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE ESTIMATES—Questions, Mr. Childers, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), Mr. Speaker ..	376
SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES—DISCUSSION OF VOTE 1—Questions, Sir George Campbell, Mr. Woodall; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	377
POST OFFICE—PILLAR BOXES—MARKING WITH THE POINTS OF THE COMPASS—Question, Colonel Waring; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	378
HIGHER AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION—Question, Mr. Mark Stewart; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	378
SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—THE VOTE ON ACCOUNT—Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	378

ORDER OF THE DAY.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (RULES OF PROCEDURE)—RULE 1 (CLOSURE OF DEBATE)—RESOLUTION—ADJOURNED DEBATE [TWELFTH NIGHT]— Order read, for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Main Question, as amended:—Question again proposed:—Debate resumed ..	379
Amendment proposed, In line 12, after the word "Debate," to insert the words "Provided, That whenever the Chair does not withhold its assent to a Motion of Closure which, if carried, would withdraw from consideration any Amendment of which Notice has been given, the Chair shall declare whether such an Amendment is an abuse of the Rules of the House, or has been sufficiently discussed under some other form,"—(Mr. E. E. Russell) ..	383
Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted:—"After debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 146, Noes 215; Majority 69.—(Div. List, No. 62.) Amendment proposed, In line 12, at the end, to insert the words, "Provided always, That in Committee of Supply, when a Vote is under consideration, and to the particular items of which more than one Notice of Amendment has been given, if, after discussion on one of such items, the Rule for closing that discussion is put in force, the fact of its adoption shall not be held to apply to Amendments to the other sub-items of that Vote,"—(Mr. Dilwyn) ..	395
Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted." After debate, Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, To leave out from the word "consideration," to the end of the Amendment, in order to add the words "it shall not be competent for a Member to make any Motion to bring to a decision any Question already proposed from the Chair for the granting a whole Vote, in case any Member proposes to move the reduction of the Vote by omitting or reducing a sub-head thereof, the omission or reduction of which has not been previously moved,"—(Mr. Chance) ..	423
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment:—"After further short debate, Question put, and agreed to. Question put, "That the words 'Provided always, &c.' be there inserted:—"The House divided; Ayes 130, Noes 216; Majority 86.—(Div. List, No. 63.)

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 15.]

Page

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (RULES OF PROCEDURE)—continued.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of line 12, to insert the words, "Provided, That no Motion for a Closure of the Debate may be made on a Tuesday or a Wednesday,"—(Colonel Nolan) .. 432

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted :"—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In line 13, after the word "That," to insert the words "Questions that the Question that certain words of any Clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause, or that any Clause stand part of or be added to the Bill be now put, shall not be decided in the affirmative, if a Division be taken, unless it shall appear by the numbers declared from the Chair that such Question has been supported by a number of Members at least twice the number of the Members voting against it, and that other,"—(Mr. Parnell) .. 436

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted :—After short debate, Question put :—The House divided; Ayes 49, Noes 191; Majority 142.—(Div. List, No. 64.)

Main Question, as amended, again proposed .. 444

Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Gedge) :—Question put, and agreed to :—Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

M O T I O N .

Bankruptcy Offices (Sites) Bill—Ordered (Mr. David Plunket, Mr. Jackson) : presented, and read the first time [Bill 197] .. 444
[1.15.]

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16.

O R D E R O F T H E D A Y .

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (RULES OF PROCEDURE) — RULE 1 (CLOSURE OF DEBATE)—RESOLUTION—ADJOURNED DEBATE [THIRTEENTH NIGHT]—

Order read, for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Main Question, as amended :—Question again proposed :—Debate resumed .. 445

Amendment proposed,

In Rule 1, line 15, to leave out from the word "by," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a majority which consisted of not less than One Hundred Members, and which bore to the minority the proportion of three or more to two,"—(Mr. Gedge) .. 454

Question proposed, "That the words 'more than,' stand part of the Question :"—After debate, Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in line 16, to leave out "Two Hundred," in order to insert "Three Hundred,"—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor) .. 467

Question proposed, "That 'Two Hundred' stand part of the Question :"—After short debate, Question put :—The House divided; Ayes 222, Noes 120; Majority 102.

Division List, Ayes and Noes .. 475

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words, "Provided always, That this Rule shall be put in force only when the Speaker or the Chairman of Ways and Means is in the Chair,"—(Mr. William Henry Smith) .. 478

Question proposed, "That those words be there added :"—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words, "Provided that the Member who shall claim the application of this Rule shall inform the House that he has previously had no communication with the Chair, direct or indirect, as to the propriety of making such Motion,"—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor) .. 480

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 16.]

Page

Business of the House: Bill of Exchange—continued.

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."—After short debate, Question put.—The House agreed. April 17. June 30: Majority 249.—See List, Vol. vi.

Amendment proposed.

At the end of Bill, to add the words—"Provided also, That any number of Members exceeding ten, who shall be designated with such accuracy, shall be entitled at the next sitting of the House, to make a collective petition in writing, which shall be recorded in the Journals of the House."—Mr. Parnell.

437

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."—After short debate, Debate adjourned till Friday.

WEDNESDAY.

Reformatory Schools Act 1885 Amendment Bill.—Introduced Mr. Jephcott, Mr. Pittman, Mr. Lister, Mr. Jones, Mr. Isaac Stewart. Seconded and read the first time [Bill 198] [L.S.]

491

THURSDAY, MARCH 17.

Pharmacy Act Amendment Bill No. 28.—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."—The Earl of Minto ..

491

Motion agreed to.—Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Lunacy Act Amendment Bill No. 40.—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."—The Earl of Minto ..

493

Motion agreed to.—Bill read 2^d accordingly.

On Question, "That the Bill in question."—After short debate, Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

Globe Lands Bill No. 41.—

Amendments reported according to Order ..

496

Bill to be read 2^d on Tuesday next; and to be printed as amended. No. 41.

Ireland: City of Limerick.—The ASSESSOR RATE.—MOTION FOR PAPER—

Moved, for—

"Correspondence between the Irish Government and the Mayor of Limerick with reference to the rate agreed to be levied upon the City of Limerick for the maintenance of inmates in the city and county asylum."—The Earl of Minto ..

500

After short debate, Motion agreed to.—Correspondence ordered to be laid before the House.

Lord Ashbourne and Henry Esler.—Observations The Lord Chancellor of Ireland Lord Ashbourne [L.S.]

501

COMMONS, THURSDAY, MARCH 17.

QUESTIONS.

ADMIRALTY.—LOOK ALTERNATION AT BONGAY'S & HIS MASTER'S NAVY.—Questions, Admiral Field: Answers, The First Lord of the Admiralty Lord George Hamilton, The Under Secretary of State for India, Sir John Gurney

503

ESTATE.—THE ARMY OF GUERRILLAS.—DETERMINATIONS FOR THE TROOPS AT ASSAULT.—Question, Mr. Sneyd: Answer, The Financial Secretary, War Department Mr. Brodrick

503

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 17.]	Page
LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART—THE NATIONAL GALLERY—THE NEW ROOMS—Question, Mr. W. H. James; Answer, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) ..	504
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—Question, Sir Joseph M'Kenna; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) ..	504
FISHERIES (IRELAND)—BOARD OF FISHERY CONSERVATORS—Question, Mr. W. Abraham (Limerick, W.); Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	504
ROYAL COURTS OF JUSTICE—DELAY OF CAUSES—INSUFFICIENCY OF COURTS—Question, Mr. Baggallay; Answer, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) ..	505
RUSSIA—IMPRISONMENT OF J. W. ROBINSON, A BRITISH SUBJECT—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	506
AUSTRALIAN COLONIES—APPLICATION FOR GOVERNMENT LOANS—GREENWICH HOSPITAL FUNDS—Question, Sir Samuel Wilson; Answer, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett (A Lord of the Admiralty)..	506
MAGISTRACY (ENGLAND AND WALES)—THE WINCHESTER BENCH—"A JOB LOT"—Questions, Mr. Mac Neill, Mr. Clancy; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	507
POST OFFICE—DELIVERY OF THE IRISH MAILS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	508
COURT OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND)—TRANSFER OF UNCLAIMED DIVIDENDS—Question, Mr. P. M'Donald; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) ..	509
EGYPT—ARMY OF OCCUPATION—MAJOR MACDONALD—Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	509
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—IRREGULAR CONVICTION AT NEW ROSS POLICE STATION—Questions, Mr. J. E. Redmond, Mr. M'Cartan; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)..	510
RIVER THAMES POLLUTION—BYE-LAWS OF THE THAMES CONSERVATORS—Questions, Colonel Dawnay, Mr. Henry H. Fowler; Answers, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) ..	511
INDIA—DISCONTENT IN MADRAS—Question, Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) ..	512
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF POOR LAW GUARDIANS TO THE MALLOW UNION—Questions, Dr. Tanner; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	513
CONVENTION OF PARIS, 1815—ENGLISH INDEBTEDNESS TO FRANCE—Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	514
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE, 1887—"SPECIFIC SUBJECTS"—Questions, Mr. T. E. Ellis, Mr. W. Abraham (Glamorgan, Rhondda); Answers, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) ..	515
ADMIRALTY—WILLIAM ROPER, AN ARTIZAN OF DEVONPORT DOCKYARD—Question, Mr. Mac Neill; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	515
LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)—DECREES FOR RENT, CO. DONEGAL—WRONGFUL ACTION OF A BAILIFF—Question, Mr. O'Doherty; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) ..	516
WAR OFFICE—COMPULSORY RETIREMENT OF LIEUTENANT COLONELS—THE ROYAL WARRANT, 1887—Question, Mr. Henry H. Fowler; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	517
POOR LAW—DEATH OF ELIZA RYAN IN ST. PANCRAS WORKHOUSE—Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) ..	517

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 17.]

	Page
NAVY—PROMOTION OF CHIEF GUNNERS AND OTHER NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS—Question, Mr. E. Robertson; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	519
UNLICENSED HALLS, &c.—“PUBLIC” BUILDINGS—Question, Mr. Tatton Egerton; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	520
THE ROYAL GARDENS, KEW—Question, Mr. E. Robertson; Answer, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) ..	520
THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, AND THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1885—THE SHORTHAND WRITERS’ NOTES—Question, Mr. T. P. Gill; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	521
INDIA—DISCONTENT IN MADRAS—Question, Mr. Tuite; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) ..	521
ARMY—MAJORS—THE ROYAL WARRANT, 1887—Question, Sir Henry Tyler; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	521
INDIA (MADRAS)—THE COVENANTED CIVIL SERVICE—LAND SPECULATIONS—MR. SULLIVAN—Question, Mr. Buchanan; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) ..	522
NAVY—LIEUTENANTS AND SUB-LIEUTENANTS—Question, Mr. De Lisle; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	523
STATE OF IRELAND—DISTURBANCES AT YOUGHAL—Questions, Mr. Lane; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	523
NAVY—WIDOWS OF SEAMEN AND MARINES—Question, Captain Price; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	524
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—GREENWICH HOSPITAL SCHOOL—Question, Captain Price; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) ..	524
PROSECUTION OF OFFENCES ACTS—THE REGULATIONS—RESULTS—Question, Mr. Henry H. Fowler; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	525
INDIA (MADRAS)—SALE OF MUNICIPAL BUILDINGS IN OOTACAMUND—Question, Mr. Tuite; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) ..	525
WAR OFFICE—COAST DEFENCES—MARTELLO TOWERS—Question, Mr. Norris; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	526
WAR OFFICE—ROMAN CATHOLIC ARMY CHAPLAINS—Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	526
WAR OFFICE—WOOLWICH CADETS—THE JUBILEE REVIEW AT ALDERSHOT—Question, Mr. E. R. Russell; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	527
THE QUEEN’S JUBILEE CELEBRATION—A SPECIAL HOLIDAY—Question, Colonel Anstruther; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	528
COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE—THE HESSIAN FLY—Question, Mr. H. Gardner; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	528
INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT, DUBLIN—APPOINTMENTS—Question, Mr. J. E. Redmond; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) ..	528
STATE OF IRELAND—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—Questions, Mr. Lane; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	529
LEGACY AND SUCCESSION DUTIES—COPIES OF RESIDUARY ACCOUNTS—Question, Mr. Finch-Hatton; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) ..	530
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—OUTBREAK AT EXETER TRAINING COLLEGE—Question, Mr. Sydney Buxton; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) ..	531

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 17.]	Page
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—IMPORTATION OF CATTLE FROM IRELAND INTO SCOTLAND—Question, Mr. O'Doherty; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	531
DISTRESS IN THE METROPOLIS—THE CONFERENCE—Question, Captain Colomb; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) ..	532
EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—THE "ÔÛTROÏ" AT CAIRO—Question, Mr. Picton; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	533
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—Co. TIFTERARY—Questions, Mr. P. J. O'Brien, Dr. Tanner; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	534
LAW AND JUSTICE—THE KENTISH TOWN MURDER—Question, Mr. Shirley; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	535
ARMY ESTIMATES—THE SELECT COMMITTEE—Question, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	535
NAVY—THE DOCKYARD WORKS AT HAULBOWLINE—DISCHARGE OF WORKMEN—Question, Mr. Hooper; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	536
METROPOLIS—MAGNITUDE OF THE DEBT—Question, Mr. Wootton Isaacson; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	536
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—THE ATTACK ON THE POLICE—Questions, Mr. Lane; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour); Question, Mr. Clancy [No reply] ..	537
STATEMENT EXPLANATORY OF THE NAVY ESTIMATES, 1887-88, AND OF THE POLICY EMBODIED THEREIN.. ..	539

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—

SHIPS OF WAR (DESIGNS)—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the designs upon which ships of war are now being built, and how far they are in harmony with the transition in Naval construction and tactics, and also the necessity for an organised system of harbour and coast defence,"—(Mr. Gourley,)—instead thereof .. 589

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question: "—After debate, Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair: "—

ADMIRALTY EXPENDITURE—COST OF CONSTRUCTION—Observations, Mr. J. M. Maclean:—Long debate thereon 619

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—NAVY ESTIMATES—

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That 62,500 men and boys be employed for the Sea and Coast Guard Services for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1888, including 12,900 Royal Marines" .. 695

After short debate, Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit, until the 17th of March (Mr. Harrington:)"—After further short debate, Question put,

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
[March 17.]
SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.
Original Question again proposed	698
Original Question put, and agreed to.
(2.) £2,940,700, Wages, &c. to Seamen and Marines.
(3.) £277,000, Supplementary, Navy Services.
Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again To-morrow .
Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Acts Amendment Bill—
Order for Committee read:— Moved , "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Baron Henry De Worms)	698
Motion agreed to:—Bill considered in Committee.
After short time spent therein, Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.
MOTION.
—o—
Isle of Man (Customs) Bill—Considered in Committee:—Resolution agreed to, and reported:—Bill ordered (Mr. Jackson, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer); presented, and read the first time [Bill 199]	700
	[2.40.]
LORDS, FRIDAY, MARCH 18.
IMPERIAL AND COLONIAL GOVERNMENT—THE CONFERENCE IN LONDON—Question, Observations, The Earl of Harrowby; Reply, The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (The Earl of Onslow)	701
	[4.45.]
COMMONS, FRIDAY, MARCH 18.
QUESTIONS.
—o—
POST OFFICE—TELEGRAMS—REGISTERED ADDRESSES—Question, Mr. Blane; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	706
NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—MONITORS IN NATIONAL SCHOOLS—Question, Mr. Blane; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	707
LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—POLICE AT TOBERMORRE, SOUTH DERRY—Questions, Mr. Chance, Mr. Lea; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	708
LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—IMPRISONMENT OF WILLIAM CASSELS—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	708
JURORS (IRELAND)—RETURN—Question, Mr. Chance; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	709
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT BELFAST—CHARGES OF JUDGE O'BRIEN TO THE GRAND JURIES—Question, Mr. Chance; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	710
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—BUILDING OF ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS—THE CONSULTING ARCHITECT—Question, Mr. J. E. Ellis; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke)	710
IRISH REPRODUCTIVE LOAN FUND ACT—CO. KERRY—Question, Mr. E. Harrington; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	711
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE MAAMTRASNA TRIALS—PAT JOYCE—Questions, Mr. M'Cartan; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	712

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 18.]

	Page
COUNT OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND) — MR. L. H. JAMES, LATE OFFICIAL ASSIGNEE — Question, Mr. P. M'Donald; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) ..	713
IRELAND—HARBOURS, &c. ON THE WEST COAST—PORT OF SLIGO—Question, Mr. P. M'Donald; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	713
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—EXEMPTION FROM ATTENDANCE—THE BYE-LAWS —PARTIAL ATTENDANCE—Question, Mr. Shaw Lefevre; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) ..	714
POST OFFICE—THE TELEGRAPH BRANCH AND THE POSTAL BRANCH—Question, Mr. Broadhurst; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	715
TELEGRAPHS ACT, 1868—PRE-TRANSFER TELEGRAPH CLERKS—Question, Mr. Broadhurst; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) ..	716
IRELAND—ALLEGED ILLEGAL LOTTERIES—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) ..	717
INDIA (BOMBAY)—THE HINDOO MARRIAGE LAWS—CASE OF RUKMARAI — Question, Mr. Cozens-Hardy; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) ..	717
CUSTOMS HOUSE—FOREIGN GOODS BEARING BRITISH TRADE MARKS—Questions, Mr. Howard Vincent, Mr. Mundella; Answers, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) ..	718
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF POOR LAW GUARDIANS—CLAIMS TO VOTE—Question, Mr. Hooper; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	719
CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS—FIXITY OF TENURE—Questions, Mr. Cochrane-Baillie, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	720
LAW AND POLICE—ALLEGED ASSAULT ON MR. FRANCIS CONNOLLY— Question, Mr. Blane; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	721
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY — POLICE SUPERVISION — Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	722
ADMIRALTY — COALING AT HOME PORTS — Question, Admiral Mayne; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	723
ADMIRALTY—THE DOCKYARDS—CONSTRUCTION OF SHEERS AT PEMBROKE — Question, Admiral Mayne; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	724
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—MULLINGAR POST OFFICE—Question, Mr. Tuite; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	724
VACCINATION — INSTRUCTIONS TO PUBLIC VACCINATORS — Question, Mr. M'Arthur; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) ..	725
CHINA—GERMAN PROTECTORATE OVER ISLANDS OF CHUSAN—Questions, Mr. F. S. Stevenson; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	726
LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—"STORMY EVICTIONS IN MAYO"—Question, Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	726
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE QUEEN'S CORONER—POWERS OF COMMITTAL—Questions, Mr. Lane, Mr. Chance; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes), The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	726
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL — Questions, Mr. Lane; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	727
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—LETTER OF DR. C. RONAYNE, J.P.—Question, Mr. Lane; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	728

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 18.]	Page
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULUS —Question, Sir Robert Fowler; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) ..	729
MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT (1854) AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL —Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	730
INDIA—FORCE OF OBSERVATION ON THE PISHIN FRONTIER —Questions, Mr. Buchanan; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) ..	730
POST OFFICE — THE ANNUAL HOLIDAYS — Question, Mr. J. Rowlands; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	730
SCOTLAND—SHOOTING STRAY DOGS —Question, Mr. Mark Stewart; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) ..	731
MERCHANT SHIPPING—ACCIDENTAL LOSS OF LIFE—INQUIRY —Question, Mr. Lees; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms) ..	731
IMPERIAL AND COLONIAL DEFENCES—COALING HARBOUR AT SINGAPORE — Question, Mr. De Lisle; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) ..	732
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—IMPROVED POSTAL SERVICE AT KINSALE —Question, Mr. Hooper; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	732
LONDON COAL AND WINE DUTIES CONTINUANCE BILL —Question, Colonel Hamilton; Answer, The Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) ..	732
SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE EASTER RECESS —Question, Mr. Munro Ferguson; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	733
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE —Questions, Sir William Harcourt, Dr. Cameron; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	733
 PARLIAMENT—THE NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE (1882)—RULE 2 (ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE)—LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND) — ARREST OF FATHER KELLER—
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Dillon) ..	734
After debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 88, Noes 226; Majority 138.
Division List, Ayes and Noes	781

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (RULES OF PROCEDURE)—RULE 1 (CLOSURE OF DEBATE)—RESOLUTION—ADJOURNED DEBATE [FOURTEENTH NIGHT]—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on the Amendment to the Main Question, as amended:—Question again proposed, "That those words be there added: "—Debate resumed ..	783
After short debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 60, Noes 281; Majority 221.—(Div. List, No. 68.)
Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question, to add the words "Provided also, That in any such Division the votes shall be taken by secret ballot,"—(Mr. M. J. Kenny) ..	793
Question proposed, "That those words be there added: "—After short debate, Question put, and negatived .
Main Question, as amended, again proposed ..	797
After short debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 262, Noes 41; Majority 221.
Division List, Ayes and Noes	798
Moved , "That this Resolution be a Standing Order of the House,"—(Mr. W. H. Smith)	800

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 18.]

Page

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (RULES OF PROCEDURE)—continued.

After debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Resolved, That this Resolution be a Standing Order of the House.

SUPPLY

Army (Annual) Bill

Resolutions [17th March] reported, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Resolution which, upon the 15th day of this instant March, was reported from the Committee of Supply, and which was then agreed to by the House, be now read, and the same was read, as followeth :—

"That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 149,341, all ranks, be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland at Home and Abroad, excluding Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, during the year ending on 31st day of March 1888."

Ordered, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide, during Twelve Months, for the Discipline and Regulation of the Army; and that Mr. Secretary Stanhope, Lord George Hamilton, and The Judge Advocate General do prepare and bring it in.

Bill presented, and read the first time [Bill 202] 801

MOTIONS.

Waterworks Valuation and Rating (Scotland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Edmund Robertson, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Sutherland, Mr. Barbour, Mr. Hugh Elliot); presented, and read the first time [Bill 203] .. 802

PARLIAMENT—ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" .. 802

Question put, and agreed to. [1.20.]

LORDS, MONDAY, MARCH 21.

INDIA—THE QUEEN'S JUBILEE CELEBRATION—RELEASE OF 25,000 PRISONERS—Question, Observations, Lord Stanley of Alderley; Reply, The Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cross) .. 802

Electric Lighting Act (1882) Amendment Bill (No. 10)—

House in Committee (according to Order) .. 804

Amendments made :—The Report thereof to be received on Monday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 49.) [6.15.]

COMMONS, MONDAY, MARCH 21.

QUESTIONS.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—ALLEGED ILLEGAL ARRESTS—CHARGE AGAINST SERGEANT WHARTON—Questions, Mr. J. E. Ellis, Dr. Tanner, Mr. Chance; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) .. 816

POST OFFICE (SCOTLAND)—ACCELERATION OF MAILS NORTH OF PERTH—Question, Mr. Finlay; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) 818

CRIME (ENGLAND AND WALES)—RETURN OF MURDERS BY ARMED BURGLARS, &c.—Question, Sir Algernon Borthwick; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) .. 819

FACTORY AND WORKSHOPS ACT—INSPECTORS IN IRELAND—Question, Mr. Johnston; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) .. 819

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—TOWN COMMISSIONERS OF BOYLE, Co. ROSCOMMON—SUB-INSPECTOR BARRAGE—Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) .. 820

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. CECIL ROOPE, R.M., BOYLE, Co. ROSCOMMON—Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) .. 820

. TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 21.]	Page
MARRIAGE LAW (ENGLAND AND WALES) — MARRIAGES IN DISSENTING CHAPELS—RE-MARRIAGE—Questions, Mr. T. Blake; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	821
ARMY—SUPPLY OF HORSES FOR ARMY PURPOSES—Question, Sir William Crossman; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	823
CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES—THE FISHERIES DISPUTE—Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	823
PRISONS (IRELAND)—CONVICT PRISON AT GALWAY—Question, Mr. Pinkerton; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	824
INDIA—INFANT MARRIAGE AND ENFORCED WIDOWHOOD—Question, Mr. E. R. Russell; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) ..	824
INLAND REVENUE—DEED STAMPS, SCOTLAND—Question, Mr. E. R. Russell; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) ..	825
EVICTIIONS, &c. (IRELAND)—RELATION OF LANDLORDS AND TENANTS — ALLEGED CIRCULAR TO THE POLICE — Question, Mr. O'Doherty; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	825
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—EXTRA DUTY IN TRAVELLING POST OFFICES AT CHRISTMAS—Question, Mr. Lane; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	826
BURIALS — THE BURIAL GROUND AT LLANFROTHERN, MERIONETHSHIRE—Question, Mr. T. E. Ellis; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	826
AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS — COMPARATIVE RETURN, 1831 TO 1886—Question, Mr. Hobhouse; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	827
AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT—REPORT FOR 1886—Question, Mr. O'Doherty; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	827
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS — IMPORTATION OF CATTLE FROM IRELAND — PLEURO-PNEUMONIA — Question, Mr. J. W. Barclay; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	828
METROPOLIS—GUY'S HOSPITAL—Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	828
BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)—FURTHER EXPENDITURE REQUIRED FOR COMPLETION OF ARKLOW HARBOUR—STATEMENT OF THE TOWN COMMISSIONERS OF ARKLOW—Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) ..	829
EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)—MEDAL TO THE SUAKIN REGIMENTS, 1885—Question, Colonel King-Harman; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	830
PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—VENTILATION OF THIS HOUSE — COOKSON'S WHARF, MILLBANK — Questions, Mr. W. H. James, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) ..	830
AFRICA (WEST COAST) — THE ROYAL NIGER COMPANY—Question, Mr. Dillwyn; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	831
EDUCATION CODE, 1887—CLASS SUBJECTS—WELSH — Question, Mr. W. Abraham (Glamorgan, Rhondda); Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) ..	832
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE, 1887—PUPIL TEACHERS AS QUEEN'S SCHOLARS — Question, Mr. W. Abraham (Glamorgan, Rhondda); Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) ..	832
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — THE NEW CODE, 1887 — WELSH-SPEAKING DISTRICTS—Question, Mr. T. E. Ellis; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) ..	832

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 21.]

Page

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE, 1887—THE WELSH AND GALEIC LANGUAGES—PUPIL TEACHERS—Question, Mr. T. E. Ellis; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke)...	833
ADMIRALTY—DRAWINGS SUPPLIED TO FOREIGN POWERS—Question, Sir Henry Tyler; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	834
INDIA—FORCE OF OBSERVATION ON THE PISHIN FRONTIER—Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	834
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—IRREGULAR DETENTION AT NEW ROSS POLICE STATION—Questions, Mr. Sexton; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)	835
DEVELOPMENT OF THE RESOURCES OF IRELAND—THE ROYAL COMMISSION—Question, Mr. T. W. Russell; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	836
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—LETTER OF CAPTAIN PLUNKETT, R.M.—Question, Mr. Cobb; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	836
WANDSWORTH COMMON—VICTORIA PATRIOTIC ASYLUM FOR GIRLS—Question, Mr. Kimber; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	837
LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—THE OFFICE OF CROWN AGENT—MR. AULDJO JAMIESON—Question, Dr. Clark; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	837
NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—PUPIL TEACHERS—Question, Mr. Tuite; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	838
POST OFFICE—COMMISSION ON POSTAL ORDERS—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	838
POST OFFICE—CHARGES AT SHANGHAI—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	839
INDIA (MADRAS)—PLANTATIONS OF CINCHONA—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	839
ADMIRALTY—SHANK PALLISER SCREW BOLTS—Questions, Captain M'Callmont; Answers, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	840
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—OUTBREAK OF ANTHRAX—Questions, Sir John Swinburne; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	841
ADMIRALTY—THE QUEEN'S JUBILEE CELEBRATION—THE NAVAL REVIEW—ROYAL NAVAL RESERVE AND ROYAL NAVAL ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS—Questions, Sir Samuel Wilson, Mr. Addison; Answers, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	841
INDIA—RAILWAYS—THE PISHIN VALLEY LINE—Question, Mr. Buchanan; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	842
WAR OFFICE—HORSE ARTILLERY BATTERIES—Question, General Fraser; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	843
COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—MR. JAMES A. IRWIN, NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHER—Question, Mr. P. O'Brien; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	843
COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—ATTENDANCE OF MEMBERS—Question, Mr. P. O'Brien; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	844
EVICIONS (IRELAND)—THE ESTATE OF MR. S. E. SHIRLEY, CO. MONAGHAN—Questions, Mr. P. O'Brien; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	844

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 21.]	Page
LAND ACT (IRELAND), 1870—TENANT PURCHASERS—Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	845
LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ACTS—MR. JOHN ROE, DONAGHMORE UNION—Question, Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	845
EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—"STORMY EVICTIONS IN MAYO"—Questions, Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien, Dr. Tanner; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	846
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—IMPORTATION OF CATTLE FROM IRELAND—PLEURO-PNEUMONIA—Question, Sir John Swinburne; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	847
VETERINARY DEPARTMENT OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL (IRELAND)—CATTLE FROM AMERICA AND IRELAND—Question, Mr. O'Doherty; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	847
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND)—ELECTION IN MOUNTMELLICK UNION—Question, Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	848
SOUTH AFRICA—PONDOLAND—Question, Sir Lewis Pelly; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland)	849
IRELAND—CONSTABULARY FORCE FOR THE NORTH RIDING OF TIPPERARY—Questions, Mr. P. J. O'Brien, Mr. T. P. Gill; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour); Question, Mr. J. O'Connor [No reply]	849
ADMIRALTY—NAVAL OFFICERS—LIEUTENANTS AND SUB-LIEUTENANTS—Question, Mr. Lisle; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	851
AFRICA (EAST COAST)—THE KING OF JOHANNA—Question, Mr. A. E. Pease; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	851
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—DETECTIVE CONSTABLE PETER MONAHAN—Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	852
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—SERGEANTS JOHNSTON AND BRADY—Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	852
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. JEREMIAH HEGARTY—Questions, Dr. Tanner; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	853
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—COMMITTAL OF CONSTABLE BULMER—Questions, Mr. Chance, Mr. Conybeare, Sir William Harcourt; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)	854
WAR OFFICE—GOVERNMENT WORKSHOPS AND ARSENALS—INSPECTION BY REPRESENTATIVES OF FOREIGN POWERS—Question, Mr. J. Rowlands; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	856
ARMY AND NAVY ESTIMATES—THE SELECT COMMITTEE—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	857
COAL MINES REGULATION BILL—Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	857

NOTICE OF MOTION.

ORDINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL—Notice of Motion, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour); Observations, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith); Notice, Mr. John Morley	858
---	-----

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 21.]

Page

QUESTIONS.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ORDER OF THE DAY FOR COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY—EXCLUSION OF MOTIONS—Questions, Observations, Mr. T. P. Gill, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. Conybeare; Replies, Mr. Speaker ..	858
IRISH LAND LAW BILL—Question, Mr. T. W. Russell; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	860

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—NAVY ESTIMATES—

(In the Committee.)

Mr. COURTNEY in the Chair. [5.15 P.M.]

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £992,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Victuals and Clothing for Seamen and Marines, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1888" ..	860
After short debate, Moved , "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Labouchere :)—Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 71, Noes 196; Majority 125.—(Div. List, No. 71.) [1.20 A.M.]
Original Question again proposed ..	980
After short debate, Moved , "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair,"—(Dr. Cameron :)—After further debate, Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 61, Noes 199; Majority 138.—(Div. List, No. 72.) [3.35 A.M.]
Original Question again proposed ..	1006
After short debate, Moved , "That the Question be now put,"—(Mr. W. H. Smith :)—Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 207, Noes 54; Majority 153. [5.40 A.M.]
Division List, Ayes and Noes ..	1017
Original Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 210, Noes 52; Majority 158.—(Div. List, No. 73.)

CIVIL SERVICES.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £3,624,100, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge for the following Civil Services and Revenue Departments for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1888, viz. :— [Then the several Services are set forth]	1019
Moved , "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Labouchere) ..	1023
[Mr. RAINES (Postmaster General) took the Chair.] [5.45.]
After long debate, Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 57, Noes 141; Majority 84.—(Div. List, No. 74.) [7.40 A.M.]
[Sir JOHN GOSER (Under Secretary of State for India) took the Chair.] [7.45 A.M.]
Original Question again proposed ..	1054
Moved , "That the Item of £6,000, for Royal Palaces, be reduced by the sum of £5,000,"—(Mr. Labouchere :)—After short debate, Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 53, Noes 121; Majority 68.—(Div. List, No. 75.) [8.15 A.M.]
Original Question again proposed ..	1060
Moved , "That the Item of £500, for Marlborough House, be omitted,"—(Mr. Conybeare :)—Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 49, Noes 115; Majority 66.—(Div. List, No. 76.) [8.30 A.M.]
Original Question again proposed ..	1061
Moved , "That the Item of £17,000, for Royal Parks and Pleasure Grounds, be reduced by the sum of £14,000,"—(Mr. Labouchere :)—After short debate, Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 54, Noes 144; Majority 90.—(Div. List, No. 77.) [9.20 A.M.]
Original Question again proposed ..	1068
Moved , "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Original Question again proposed ..	1070

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
[March 21.]
SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICES—Committee—continued.
Moved , "That the Item of £1,500, for the Metropolitan Police Courts, be omitted," —(Mr. Labouchere)	1071
[Mr. COURTNEY here resumed the Chair] [9.35 A.M.]
After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided ; Ayes 51, Noes 186; Majority 135.—(Div. List , No. 78.)	[9.40 A.M.] 1073
Original Question again proposed
Moved , "That a sum, not exceeding £3,614,100, be granted, &c.,"—(Mr. Labouchere :)—Question put:—The Committee divided ; Ayes 49, Noes 204; Majority 155.—(Div. List , No. 79.)	[10.10. A.M.] 1075
Original Question again proposed
After debate, Moved , "That the sum of £3,622,600, be granted, &c.,"—(Mr. Dillon :) —After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided ; Ayes 80, Noes 255; Majority 175.	[1.0 P.M.] 1120
Division List, Ayes and Noes
Original Question put, and agreed to
Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday .
Bankruptcy Offices (Sites) Bill [Bill 197]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Plunket)	1123
Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee of Five Members, Three to be nominated by the House and Two by the Committee of Selection.
Isle of Man (Customs) Bill [Bill 199]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Jackson)	1124
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow .
Small Debts (Scotland) Bill [Bill 42]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Caldwell)	1124
Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday .
Pauper Lunatic Asylums (Ireland) Superannuation Bill [Bill 62]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Chance)	1125
Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday 19th April.
WAYS AND MEANS—
Considered in Committee
(In the Committee.)
(1.) Resolved , That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the Service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1887, the sum of £1,251,076 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.
(2.) Resolved , That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the Service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1888, the sum of £12,078,800 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.
Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday . [1.20 P.M.]

LORDS, TUESDAY, MARCH 22.

THE COLONIAL CONFERENCE—REPRESENTATION OF MALTA—Question, Earl De La Warr; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (The Earl of Onslow)		1126
Church Patronage Bill (No. 44)—
Amendments reported (according to Order)		1127
Bill to be read 3 ^a on Tuesday next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 52.)

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 22.]	Page
Church Sites (Compulsory Powers Repeal) Bill (No. 22)—
Moved , "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee on the said Bill,"—(The Lord Bishop of Lichfield) ..	1131
After short debate, on Question? Resolved in the negative.
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE ARREST OF FATHER KELLER— Question, Observations, The Earl of Camperdown; Reply, The Lord Privy Seal (Earl Cadogan) ..	1133
Sheriffs (Consolidation) Bill [H.L.]— Presented (The Lord Chancellor); read 1 st (No. 50) ..	1137
	[6.45.]

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MARCH 22.

QUESTIONS.

SCOTLAND—CROFTERS' COMMISSION—VALUERS AND ASSESSORS—APPLICATIONS —Question, Dr. Clark; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) ..	1138
WAR OFFICE—OFFICIAL STATEMENT—ALLEGED DEFICIENCY OF £685,735— NAVAL ORDNANCE—Question, Mr. H. F. Pease; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) ..	1138
LAW AND POLICE (SCOTLAND)—ARBROATH POLICE COURT—JAMES BENNETT —Question, Mr. Lacaita; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) ..	1139
POST OFFICE—LEASEHOLD INSURANCE— Question, Colonel Makins; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	1140
ROADWAYS AND STREETS (METROPOLIS)—CANTERBURY ROAD, CAMBERWELL —Question, Mr. Baumann; Answer, The Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) ..	1141
NAVY—DOCKYARDS—DISCHARGES FROM HAULBOWLINE— Questions, Mr. J. O'Connor, Dr. Tanner; Answers, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	1142
EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—THE LAND TAX— Question, Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	1143
COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS— Question, Mr. King; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) ..	1144
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—MANORHAMILTON DISTRICT, Co. LEITRIM —Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	1144
DUCHY OF LANCASTER—THE MIDDLEMAN SYSTEM— Question, Mr. J. E. Ellis; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	1145
COAL AND WINE DUTIES (METROPOLIS)— Question, Mr. Dixon-Hartland; Answer, The Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) ..	1145
PRISONS (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1877—LUNACY DISTRICTS— Question, Mr. Hozier; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) ..	1145
INLAND REVENUE—STAMP DUTY ON YEARLY LEASES IN SCOTLAND— Question, Mr. Watt; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	1146
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—CORONERS' INQUESTS— Questions, Sir John Swinburne, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Sexton; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes); Question, Mr. P. O'Brien [No reply] ..	1146
LONDON COAL AND WINE DUTIES CONTINUANCE BILL—PUBLIC PARK IN TOTTENHAM— Question, Mr. J. Howard; Answer, Sir Robert Fowler ..	1147

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 22.]

Page

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL—LEGISLATION— Question, Mr. Broadhurst; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	1148
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1886—PLEURO-PNEUMONIA (SCOTLAND)— Question, Sir Charles Palmer; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	1148
FINANCE—TREASURY BILLS— Question, Mr. Caldwell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	1149
CONVEYANCING (SCOTLAND) ACT (1874) AMENDMENT BILL— Question, Mr. J. B. Balfour; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) ..	1149
LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, AND THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1885—THE ROYAL COMMISSION—MR. KNIPE'S REPORT— Question, Mr. Coleridge; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	1150
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1886—ANTHRAX IN CHESHIRE— Questions, Mr. Tollemache, Sir John Swinburne; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	1151
EVICIONS (IRELAND)—MR. SHIRLEY'S FARNEY ESTATE, MONAGHAN— Question, Mr. P. O'Brien; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	1152
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—DELIVERY OF LETTERS AT NEWTOWNARDS, &c.— Question, Mr. McCartan; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	1153
ANGLO-AMERICAN FISHERIES CONVENTION, 1818—PURCHASE OF ARMED CRUISERS— Questions, Mr. Gourley, Sir George Campbell; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	1153

MOTION.

—o—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL— MOTION FOR URGENCY [FIRST NIGHT]—

Moved, "That the introduction and several stages of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill have precedence of all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion, including the Rules of Procedure, whenever the Bill shall be set down for consideration by the Government as the first business of the day,"—(Mr. William Henry Smith) .. 1158

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House declines to set aside the business of the Nation in favour of a measure for increasing the stringency of the Criminal Law in Ireland, whilst no effectual security has been taken against the abuse of the Law by the exaction of excessive rents,"—(Mr. John Morley) .. 1174

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Colonel Hughes-Hallett:)—Question put, and agreed to:—Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—

WAYS AND MEANS—

Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill }

Resolutions [March 31] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered (Mr. Courtney, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Jackson); presented, and read the first time .. 1221

[11.20.]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23.

Page

QUESTIONS.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—CORONER'S WARRANT—Questions, Mr. Chance, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)	1221
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—ARREST OF FATHER KELLER—VALIDITY OF THE WARRANT—Questions, Mr. Chance; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)	1222

ORDER OF THE DAY.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL— MOTION FOR URGENCY—RESOLUTION—ADJOURNED DEBATE [SECOND NIGHT]—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [22nd March:]—Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—Debate resumed After long debate, it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood further adjourned till To-morrow.	1223

MOTION.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn:"—

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL—DEBATE ON THE MOTION FOR URGENCY—Observations, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), Mr. W. E. Gladstone, Mr. Parnell	1277
---	------

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—THE INQUEST ON HANLON—Questions, Mr. Sexton; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)	1279
--	------

Motion agreed to. [5.55.]

LORDS, THURSDAY, MARCH 24.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—AFFAIRS OF SWAZILAND—Question, Observations, Viscount Midleton; Reply, The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (The Earl of Onslow)	1280
--	------

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—HELMETS FOR THE MILITIA REGIMENTS—Question, Observations, Lord Fitzgerald; Reply, The Under Secretary of State for War (Lord Harris)	1284
--	------

NORTH-EASTERN ASIA—THE CORÉE—FOREIGN OCCUPATION OF PORT HAMILTON—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

Moved , "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for copy of any written pledges, should such pledges exist, on the part of the Empires of Russia and China with the Government of this country in reference to the occupation for military or naval purposes of the harbour of Port Hamilton or any portion of the territory of Corée,"—(The Viscount Sidmouth)	1285
--	------

After short debate, Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn. [5.0.]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.
COMMONS, THURSDAY, MARCH 24.
PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Page

Kensington Vestry Bill [Lords] (by Order)—

Moved , "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered,"—(Mr. Dodds)	1287
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," in order to add the words "this day six months,"—(Mr. Labouchere .)
Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question:"
—After debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 190, Noes 170; Majority 29.—(Div. List, No. 81.)
Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill considered	1309
New Clause (Consent of Vestry to erection of destructors),—(Mr. Pitt-Lewis),— brought up , and read the first time	1310
Moved , "That the Clause be read a second time:"— Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Chance :)—Question put, and negatived .
Original Question again proposed	1310
After short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to .
Moved , "That the Clause be added to the Bill:"—Question put, and negatived —Bill to be read the third time.

QUESTIONS.

ACCOMMODATION FOR PRISONERS AWAITING TRIAL—SCOTLAND AND IRELAND—Question, Sir Joseph Pease; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1316
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—CORPORAL PUNISHMENT IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS—NEWPORT PAGNELL—Question, Mr. Channing; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke)	1317
INLAND REVENUE—INCOME TAX IN CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE—Question, Mr. Howard Vincent; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	1318
CIVIL ESTABLISHMENTS—THE COMMISSIONERS (SCOTLAND)—Question, Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1318
SCOTLAND—SASINE OFFICE, EDINBURGH—Question, Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1319
SCOTLAND—GENERAL REGISTER HOUSE, EDINBURGH—Question, Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	1319
SCOTLAND—SASINE OFFICE, EDINBURGH—Question, Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1320
RAILWAYS (ENGLAND AND WALES)—TOTON SIDINGS ON THE MIDLAND RAILWAY—Question, Mr. Channing; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms)	1321
FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—WORKS AT GREYSTONES—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1321
LABOURERS (IRELAND) ACTS, 1885-6—RETURN—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1322
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—MILLTOWN—Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1322
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—MR. J. M'NULTY, OF LOUGHGLYNN—Question, Mr. J. E. Ellis; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1323

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 24.]	Page
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—HEAD CONSTABLE O'HALLORAN, OF ENNIS— Questions, Mr. Sexton; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1323
EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—REFUNDING THE FIVE PER CENT COUPON TAX— Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	1324
METEOROLOGICAL OFFICIAL REPORT—WEATHER FORECASTS—Question, Mr. Llewellyn; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	1325
FUNDS IN CHANCERY—Question, Mr. E. Robertson; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1325
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—LIFFORD ASSIZES—HANNAH O'DONNELL—Questions, Mr. O'Doherty; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1326
LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—PROTRACTION OF ASSIZES— QUARTER SESSIONS—Question, Mr. Addison; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1327
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—DISCREPANCY IN AMOUNTS OF EXPENDITURE— Question, Mr. H. J. Wilson; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1328
POST OFFICE—THE POSTAL UNION—THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	1329
EGYPT (THE MILITARY EXPEDITION)—R. A. CATHIE, GUNNER OF THE "SPHYNX"—Question, Sir Samuel Wilson; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	1329
IRELAND—THE QUEEN'S COLLEGE, GALWAY—Question, Mr. Pinkerton; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1330
COMMISSIONERS OF IRISH LIGHTS—LIGHTHOUSE KEEPERS AND CHILDREN— Question, Mr. Johnston; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms)	1331
THE WRECK COMMISSION—RETURN OF INQUIRIES, 1885—Question, Mr. W. F. Lawrence; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms)	1331
MERCHANT SHIPPING—PILOT CERTIFICATES TO FOREIGN SUBJECTS—Question, Mr. C. H. Wilson; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms)	1332
LOCAL GOVERNMENT ELECTIONS (IRELAND)—MOUNTMELICK UNION—Question, Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1332
THE MAURITIUS—CONSTITUTION OF THE LATE COMMISSION—Questions, Mr. O'Kelly, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland)	1333
LICENSING ACT—DOGS—Question, Mr. Montagu; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1335
ADMIRALTY—THE INDIAN TROOPSHIP "JUMNA"—Question, Sir William Crossman; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	1335
SEED SUPPLY (IRELAND) ACT—REPAYMENT OF ADVANCES—Questions, Colonel Nolan; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1336
IMPERIAL AND COLONIAL DEFENCES—HONG KONG—Question, Mr. Webster; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote)	1337
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—CORONERS' WARRANT—Question, Sir John Swinburne; Answer, The Chief Secre- tary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour); Question, Mr. Maurice Healy [No reply]; Questions, Mr. E. Harrington, Sir William Harcourt, Sir Charles Russell, Mr. Chance, Mr. Lane; Answers, The Attorney Gene- ral for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)	1337

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 24.]	Page
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—DISTRICT INSPECTOR SOMERVILLE AND CONSTABLE WARD—Questions, Mr. Lane, Mr. Mac Neill, Mr. Chance; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) ..	1339
WAR OFFICE—MOBILIZATION OF FIRST AND SECOND ARMY CORPS—Question, General Fraser; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	1341
IMPERIAL AND COLONIAL DEFENCES—SINGAPORE—Question, Mr. De Lisle; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) ..	1341
THE RIVER THAMES (THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE BOAT RACE)—THE POLICE—Question, Mr. W. Redmond; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	1342
ARMY CONTRACTS—Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote)	1343
WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—CONTRACT FOR CARTRIDGES—MESSRS. LATIMER CLARK, MUIRHEAD, AND CO.—Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, The Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Northcote) ..	1343
EDUCATION (SCOTLAND)—BI-LINGUAL INSTRUCTION—THE WELSH LANGUAGE—Question, Mr. T. E. Ellis; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke)	1344
UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (WALES)—WELSH TRAINING COLLEGES—Question, Mr. T. E. Ellis; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke)	1345
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (SCOTLAND)—SENIOR INSPECTORS OF SCHOOLS—Question, Mr. Caldwell; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	1346
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—OMAGH WINTER ASSIZES—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)	1346
NAVY ESTIMATES—RE-ORGANIZATION, &c. OF THE ACCOUNTANT GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood)	1347
POST OFFICE—TRANSIT RATES FROM ENGLAND TO INDIA—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	1348
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION—Question, Mr. Brookfield; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1348
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—POST OFFICE AT GRANGEGRITH—Questions, Mr. O'Hanlon; Answers, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	1349
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—TRANSIT OF INFECTED CATTLE FROM IRELAND TO LIVERPOOL—Question, Mr. Mark Stewart; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour); Question, Mr. T. M. Healy [No reply]	1349
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—RETURNS—CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1350
ADMIRALTY—VACANCIES—CIRCULARS—Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	1350
ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIEF ACT, 1829—ROMAN CATHOLIC MISSION AT POPLAR—Questions, Mr. Johnston, Mr. M'Cartan; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1351
SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND BILL—LEGISLATION—Questions, Mr. Anderson, Dr. Clark; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1352

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 24.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL— MOTION FOR URGENCY—RESOLUTION—ADJOURNED DEBATE [THIRD NIGHT]—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [22nd March:]—Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—Debate resumed 1352 After long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr.
Shaw Lefevre :)—Question put, and agreed to :—Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.

Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Bill [Bill 1]—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [28th February], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (for Committee on the Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Bill :)—Question again proposed :—Debate resumed 1438
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.
Bill considered in Committee 1447
After short time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday next.

Accumulations Bill [Bill 81]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Cosens-Hardy) 1448 Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday 2nd May.

MOTIONS.

DIVORCE BILLS—

Select Committee nominated :—List of the Committee 1449

Union Assessment Committee Act (1862) Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Holloway, Colonel Hughes) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 204]

[2.10.]

LORDS, FRIDAY, MARCH 25.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE EASTER RECESS—Question, Earl Granville; Answer, The Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (The Marquess of Salisbury) 1449

Probation of First Offenders (No. 2) Bill (No. 20)—

Moved, "That the Order for the Second Reading be discharged,"—(The Earl of Belmore) 1450
Motion agreed to; Order discharged.

Tithe Rent-Charge Bill—

Bill to amend the law with respect to the recovery and redemption of tithe rent-charge in England—Presented (The Marquess of Salisbury) .. 1451
After short debate, Bill read 1st. (No. 54.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—

Standing Order No. XXXV. to be considered on Monday next in order to its being suspended. [5.45.]

COMMONS, FRIDAY, MARCH 25.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Metropolitan Railway Bill—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Sir Charles Forster) 1464
Bill to be read a second time upon Friday.

VOL. CCOXII. [THIRD SERIES.] [f]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 25.]	Page
Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway Bill—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Sir Charles Forster)	1464
Bill to be read a second time To-morrow.
Walton-on-Thames and Weybridge Gas Bill—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Sir Charles Forster)	1465
Bill to be read a second time upon Thursday.

QUESTIONS.

ADMIRALTY—SIR WILLIAM PALLISER (ARMOUR BOLTS)—Question, Captain M'Calmont; Answer, The Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) ..	1465
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—MRS. LUCAS, CONVICTED OF ARSON—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1465
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—RIOTS AT BELFAST—REPRESSION OF DISTURBANCE—Question, Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1467
MADAGASCAR—RECALL OF MR. PICKERSGILL, HER MAJESTY'S VICE CONSUL AT ANTANANARIVO—Question, Mr. M'Arthur; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	1467
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—OUTBREAKS OF ANTHRAX—Questions, Dr. Cameron; Answers, The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Lord John Manners), The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) ..	1468
LAW AND POLICE—SENTENCE ON FRANCIS M'LOWRAN, AT SOUTHWARK POLICE COURT—Question, Mr. Sydney Buxton; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	1469
ADMIRALTY—GREENWICH HOSPITAL FUNDS—INVESTMENTS—Question, Sir Samuel Wilson; Answer, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett (A Lord of the Admiralty) ..	1469
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—THE CORONER'S WARRANT—Questions, Mr. Chance, Mr. Sexton; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1470
EJECTMENTS (IRELAND)—THE MARQUESS OF DOWNSHIRE'S ESTATES, Co. DOWN—Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1470
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—TELEGRAPH ESTABLISHMENTS AT WATERFORD—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	1471
POST OFFICE—TELEGRAMS—SHORTENED TELEGRAPHIC ADDRESSES FOR THIS HOUSE—Question, Sir Richard Paget; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	1472
POST OFFICE—SUNDAY DELIVERY OF LETTERS—POSTMEN'S WAGES—Question, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	1472
COLONIAL CONFERENCE—AUSTRALIAN OPINION—Question, Sir Samuel Wilson; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) ..	1473
COLONIAL CONFERENCE—THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON IMPERIAL DEFENCE—Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) ..	1474
LOCAL TAXATION—ASSESSMENT OF CHAPELS AND SCHOOLS AT HAYLE, CORNWALL—Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) ..	1474
SALMON FISHING (SCOTLAND)—Questions, Mr. A. L. Brown; Answers, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson), The Lord Advocate (H. A. Macdonald) ..

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 25.]

Page

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS—BOY CLERKS—Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1475
TRIALS BY JURY (IRELAND)—THE RETURN—Questions, Mr. J. E. Ellis, Mr. Sexton, Mr. John Morley; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1476

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL— MOTION FOR URGENCY—RESOLUTION—ADJOURNED DEBATE [FOURTH NIGHT]—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [22nd March:]—Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—Debate resumed 1477
After long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Parnell) :—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Original Question put :—The House divided; Ayes 349, Noes 260; Majority 89.

Division List, Ayes and Noes	1579
Main Question again proposed	1584
Amendment proposed, to add, at the end of the Question, the words "except on Friday,"—(Mr. Labouchere .)
Question proposed, "That those words be there added :"—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn .
Main Question put, and agreed to .

BANKRUPTCY OFFICES (SITES) [CONSOLIDATED FUND]—

Order for Committee read :—Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. Plunket)

After short debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Matter considered in Committee.	1587
--	------

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the grant, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, of a sum to meet any deficiency which may arise in the payment of the expenses of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings incurred under the provisions of any Act of the present Session for the acquisition of property and the provision of new buildings for the Bankruptcy Department.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

M O T I O N S .

Metropolitan Police Provisional Order Bill—Ordered (Mr. Stuart-Wortley, Mr. Secretary Matthews) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 208] .. 1583

Licensing Laws Amendment Bill—Considered in Committee :—Resolution agreed to, and reported :—Bill ordered (Mr. Houldsworth, Colonel Bridgeman, Mr. Samuel Smith, Mr. Whitmore) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 207] .. 1589

Stannaries Act (1869) Amendment Bill—

Select Committee nominated :—List of the Committee .. 1589

Mining Leases (Devon and Cornwall) Bill—

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for Committee on the Mining Leases (Cornwall and Devon) Bill be read, and discharged,"—(Mr. Charles Acland) :—Bill, by leave, withdrawn .. 1589

ADJOURNMENT—

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Akers-Douglas) .. 1589
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to. [2.25.]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, MONDAY, MARCH 28.	Page
IRISH LAND (LAW) BILL—Question, The Duke of Abercorn; Answer, The Lord Privy Seal (Earl Cadogan) ..	1590
ALLOTMENTS BILL—Question, Observations, The Earl of Jersey; Replies, The Lord President of the Council (Viscount Cranbrook), The Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (The Marquess of Salisbury)	1590
RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC BILL—PETITION OF THE SOUTH EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY—MOTION—
Moved , "That the prayer of the petition of the South Eastern Railway Company, presented on Friday last, praying to be heard by counsel against the Bill, be complied with,"—(The Lord Bramwell)	1591
After short debate, Motion disagreed to .
COLONIES (NAVAL AND MILITARY SERVICES)—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—
Moved for, "Address for Report of the Committee appointed last year to consider the position of officers in receipt of pensions and desirous of entering upon military or naval service in the Colonies; also the Correspondence resulting from that Report between the Committee and the Lords of the Treasury,"—(The Viscount Sidmouth)..	1595
After short debate, Motion agreed to .
LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACTS—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION—Question, Observations, The Earl of Milltown; Reply, The Paymaster General (Earl Beauchamp)	1596
House adjourned during pleasure:—House resumed—The Lord Kintore chosen Speaker in the absence of the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Commissioners.
Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill—
Brought from the Commons and read 1 st : Then Standing Order No. XXXV. having been dispensed with for the remainder of this day's sitting, moved that the Bill be now read 2 ^d ; agreed to ; Bill read 2 ^d accordingly; Committee negatived : Bill read 3 ^d , and passed .

[1.0. A.M.]

QUESTIONS.

—o—

COMMONS, MONDAY, MARCH 28.

NATIONAL BOARD OF EDUCATION (IRELAND)—EXAMINATIONS FOR WORKMISTRESSES—Question, Mr. M. J. Kenny; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1598
LAND ACT (IRELAND)—MR. WRENCH, A LAND COMMISSIONER—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1598
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE'S ESTATE, QUEEN'S COUNTY—Questions, Mr. Lalor, Mr. Dillon; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour).. .. .	1599
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—GRAND JURIES—CO. DOWN—Questions, Mr. M'Cartan, Colonel Waring, Mr. W. Abraham (Limerick, W.); Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1600
THE COLONIAL CONFERENCE—IMPERIAL FEDERATION—Question, Sir Samuel Wilson; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland)	1601
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—GUARDIANS—COUNTY COURT JUDGES—Question, Mr. Maurice Healy; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1602
DOMINION OF CANADA—ARMED CRUISE—Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland)	1602
FACTORIES ACTS—WORKING MEN INSPECTORS—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1603

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 28.]

Page

DWELLINGS FOR THE WORKING CLASSES—THE PEABODY TRUSTEES—THE PROPERTY TAX—Question, Mr. Morrison; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	1603
PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND)—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION—Questions, Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien, Mr. M. J. Kenny; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1604
LAND ACT (IRELAND)—A COMMISSION COURT, CO. WEXFORD—Question, Mr. J. E. Redmond; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1605
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—BARRACK IN COOKSTOWN, CO. TYRONE—Question, Mr. M. J. Kenny; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1605
ADMIRALTY—DOCKYARD OFFICIALS—LORD BRASSEY'S "NAVAL ANNUAL"—Question, Mr. Dwyer Gray; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	1606
POST OFFICE—THE REGISTERED LETTER BRANCH—Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	1606
LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—MR. FERRITER, OF DINGLE—Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1607
LANDED PROPRIETORS (IRELAND), 1886—RETURN—Question, Mr. J. E. Ellis; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1608
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTIONS IN COOTEHILL—THE RETURNING OFFICER—Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1608
EGYPT (ARMY OF OCCUPATION)—HEALTH OF THE TROOPS AT ASSOUAN—Question, Mr. Edwards-Moss; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	1608
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—TRIAL OF HANNAH O'DONNELL AT LIFFORD ASSIZES—Question, Mr. McCartan; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1609
LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—ALLEGED ILL-TREATMENT OF CONVICTS—Question, Major Rasch; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1610
BURIAL FUNDS—PARISH OF LLANFROTHERN, MERIONETHSHIRE—Question, Mr. T. E. Ellis; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1610
INDIA (MADRAS)—FRAUDS ON THE REVENUE—Question, Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	1611
INDIA (MADRAS)—OUTBREAK IN THE GUDEN DISTRICT—Question, Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	1612
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—DUTCH CATTLE—Question, Mr. Montagu; Answer, The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Lord John Manners)	1612
IRELAND—DUBLIN HOSPITALS—THE COMMISSION ON GRANTS—Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1613
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—THE CATTLE TRADE WITH IRELAND—Question, Mr. McCartan; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms)	1613
ADMIRALTY (CHATHAM DOCKYARD)—MR. YOUNG TERRY—Question, Mr. Pickersgill; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	1614
HARBOURS OF REFUGE—Questions, Admiral Mayne; Answers, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms)	1614

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 28.]

ARMY—THE AMBULANCE SYSTEM—SURGEON MAJOR SANDFORD MOORE— Question, Dr. Tindal Robertson; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	1615
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES)—THE EXETER TRAINING COLLEGE—THE RECENT OUTBREAK—Question, Mr. Sydney Buxton; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke)	1615
THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, AND THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1885—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1616
INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT (IRELAND)—ENGLISH OFFICIALS—Questions, Mr. J. E. Redmond, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1616
EXCISE—BREWING LICENCES—COTTAGE BREWERS—Question, Mr. Agg- Gardner; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	1618
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CONVICTION OF ——— WALKER FOR MAN- SLAUGHTER—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Johnston; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)	1619
POST OFFICE—ELECTRIC CABLE BETWEEN GUERNSEY AND ALDERNEY—Ques- tion, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	1620
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT BELFAST—MR. WALLACE M'HARDY, CHIEF CONSTABLE OF LANARKSHIRE—PRINTING HIS REPORT —Questions, Mr. Sexton; Answers, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	1620
ORDER—THE HALF-PAST TWELVE O'CLOCK RULE — BLOCKING — Question, Mr. Howard Vincent; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1621
THE QUEEN'S JUBILEE CELEBRATION—THE PUBLIC HOLIDAY—Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1621
REGISTRATION OF PARLIAMENTARY VOTERS—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Chance; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1622
PARLIAMENT—ADJOURNMENT AND SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE—THE EASTER RECESS—Questions, Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Conybeare, Sir George Campbell, Mr. W. H. James; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1622
CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL—THE DIVISION ON THE MOTION OF URGENCY—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. Speaker	1623

MOTION.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill—MOTION FOR LEAVE —FIRST READING [FIRST NIGHT]—

Moved , "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make better provision for the pre- vention and punishment of Crime in Ireland; and for other purposes relating thereto,"—(Mr. Arthur Balfour)	1624
After long debate, Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Illingworth :)—Question put, and agreed to :—Debate adjourned till To- morrow.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Metropolitan Open Spaces Act (1881) Extension Bill [Bill 171]

Bill considered in Committee	1730
After some time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 28.]

Page

MOTION.

Metropolis Management Acts Amendment (Westminster) Bill —Ordered (Mr. Burdett-Coutts, Mr. John Talbot, Mr. Tomlinson, Mr. Seager Hunt); presented, and read the first time [Bill 208]	1744
	[2.15.]

LORDS, TUESDAY, MARCH 29.

Railway and Canal Traffic Bill (No. 32) —
House in Committee (according to Order)	1745
After some time spent therein, House to be again in Committee on Friday next.
ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACT, 1869, AND AMENDING ACTS—SCHEMES OF THE CHARITY COMMISSIONERS—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—
Moved , "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty will withhold her assent from the schemes of the Charity Commissioners relating to (1) the Foundation for a school and almshouses, and for other purposes, in the parish of West Lavington, otherwise Bishop Lavington, in the county of Wilts, founded under the will of Alderman William Dauntsey, dated 10th March 1542, and since further endowed; and (2) for dealing with the Endowment of the Wilts County School, in the county of Wilts,—(The Lord Stanley of Preston)	1761
Motion agreed to :—Ordered that the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves. [8.0.]

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MARCH 29.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway Bill (by Order) —
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Dodds)	1761
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed.
Belfast Main Drainage Bill —
Moved , "That the Lords Amendments be now considered,"—(Mr. Dodds)	1767
Moved , "That the Debate be adjourned till Thursday next,"—(Mr. Sexton):—After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Debate adjourned till Thursday.

QUESTIONS.

NORTH SEA FISHERIES—DEPREDACTIONS BY FOREIGN ON ENGLISH FISHERMEN—THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE —Question, Sir Savile Crossley; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms)	1768
SCOTTISH UNIVERSITIES ENDOWMENTS—LEGISLATION —Question, Mr. Bryce; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	1768
ROYAL COLLEGE OF VETERINARY SURGEONS—FEES FOR ADMISSION —Question, Mr. Wallace; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	1768
POST OFFICE (IRELAND) —Question, Mr. O'Hanlon; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	1769
SEED SUPPLY (IRELAND) ACT, 1880—ISSUE OF SEED —Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1769

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 29.]

Page

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—ROBERT KELLY AND THOMAS SCULLY—Questions, Mr. Gilhooly, Mr. Mac Neill; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)	1770
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTIONS—BANTRY UNION—Question, Mr. Gilhooly; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1771
WEIGHTS AND MEASURES—CORN MEASURES—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Rankin; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms)	1771
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—FORCE IN MILLTOWN—Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1772
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—VACANT CORONERSHIP OF DONEGAL—Question, Mr. Mac Neill; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1772
PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—ARKLOW HARBOUR WORKS—Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1773
LABOURERS' ACTS (IRELAND)—WORKING OF THE ACTS—Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1774
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—DONEGAL WORKHOUSE—THE BOARD OF GUARDIANS—Questions, Mr. Mac Neill, Mr. Chance; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1774
CHIMES AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—DEATH OF HANLON—ARREST OF SUB-INSPECTOR SOMERVILLE AND CONSTABLE WARD—Question, Mr. Chance; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1775
LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—SUB-INSPECTOR MILLING—Question, Mr. Chance; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1776
EMIGRATION AND IMMIGRATION—STATISTICAL TABLES—Question, Captain Colomb; Answer, The Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry De Worms)	1777
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—WAGES, &c. OF LIMERICK POSTMEN—Questions, Mr. H. J. Gill; Answers, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	1777
LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—ARREST OF JOHN MALONE AND RICHARD MAGINN—Questions, Mr. J. E. Redmond; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)	1778
POST OFFICE (SCOTLAND)—POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK AT ARCHIESTOWN AND DALLAS, MONAGHISH—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	1779
RIVER THAMES—POLLUTION BY HOUSE BOATS, &c.—Question, Colonel Dawney; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	1779
CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND)—THE DEBATE—THE CHIEF SECRETARY'S SPEECH—Question, Mr. J. E. Ellis; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1780
LAW AND JUSTICE—COLONIAL JUDGMENTS—THE COLONIAL CONFERENCE—Question, Mr. Osborne Morgan; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland)	1780
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—YOUGHAL—COUNTY INSPECTOR BROWNIGG—Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1781
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)—INOCULATION FOR ANTHRAX—Question, Mr. H. Gardner; Answer, The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Lord John Manners)	1781
PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—PALACE YARD—A GLASS SHELTER—Question, Mr. W. Beckett; Answer, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket)	1781

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 29.]	Page
NAVY—H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT—INSPECTION AT ADEN— Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	1782
EGYPT—DETENTION OF ZEBEHR PASHA— Questions, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Dillon, Mr. O'Kelly; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	1782
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. JEREMIAH HEGARTY, J.P., CO. CORK— Questions, Dr. Tanner, Mr. Chance; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1784
ARMY AND NAVY ESTIMATES—A SELECT COMMITTEE OF EXAMINATION— Question, Mr. Mason; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1785
CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL— Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Chance; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1785
PARLIAMENT—DIVISIONS OF THE HOUSE (PAIRING)—DIVISIONS ON THE 21ST MARCH— Questions, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Arnold Morley, Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. R. W. Duff; Answers, Mr. Bristowe, Mr. Speaker, The Patronage Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Akers-Douglas)	1786

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill—MOTION FOR LEAVE
 —FIRST READING—ADJOURNED DEBATE [SECOND NIGHT]—
 Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [28th March:]
 —Question again proposed:—Debate resumed 1790
 After long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Mac Neill:)—Motion agreed to:—Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.

MOTIONS.

Municipal Franchise (Belfast) Bill—
Moved, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to extend the Municipal Franchise of the Borough of Belfast,"—(Colonel Saunderson) 1876 Question put, and agreed to:—Bill ordered (Colonel Saunderson, Colonel King-Harman, Colonel Waring, Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Lea); presented, and read the first time. [Bill 211.]
Moved, "That the Bill be read a second time upon Wednesday 18th May,"—(Colonel Saunderson:)—Question put, and agreed to:—Bill to be read a second time upon Wednesday 18th May.

ADJOURNMENT—

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn: "—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to. [12.40.]

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill—MOTION FOR LEAVE
 —FIRST READING—ADJOURNED DEBATE [THIRD NIGHT]—
 Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [28th March:]
 —Question again proposed:—Debate resumed 1877
 After long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Labouchere:)—Question put, and agreed to:—Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[March 30.]

Mining Royalties Bill [Bill 23]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Conybeare) .. 1932

Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Tomlinson :)—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Debate adjourned till Wednesday 27th April.

High Sheriff Disqualification (Ireland) Bill [Bill 85]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. John O'Connor) 1932

Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. De Lisle :)—Question put, and agreed to :—Debate adjourned till Wednesday 20th April.

Q U E S T I O N .

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—Question, Mr. Henry H. Fowler; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) 1933

M O T I O N .

Newspaper Libel Law Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Jennings, Mr. Addison) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 212] 1934
[5.55]

L O R D S .

SAT FIRST.

MONDAY, MARCH 14.

The Earl of Chesterfield, after the death of his father.

C O M M O N S .

NEW WRIT ISSUED.

MONDAY, MARCH 14.

For Derby (Ilkeston Division), v. Thomas Watson, esquire, deceased.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

MONDAY, MARCH 28.

Derby (Ilkeston Division)—Sir Balthazar Walter Foster, knight.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

IN THE

SECOND SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 5 AUGUST, 1886, IN THE FIFTIETH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

THIRD VOLUME OF SESSION 1887.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 11th March, 1887.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Report—Truro Bishopric and Chapter Acts Amendment *
(33).

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL—Third Reading—Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) * (29), and passed.

FOREIGN HORSE-BREEDING DEPOTS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF STRAFFORD, in moving—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, for copies or extracts of reports of Her Majesty's diplomatic agents at Paris, Vienna, and Berlin, on the subject of horse-breeding depôts, forwarded to the Foreign Office in the year 1884," said, that his noble Friend (Lord Ribblesdale), who raised the question of our horse supply a few nights ago, had expressed his intention of submitting to their Lordships a scheme for the supply of horses, particularly for military purposes. In the meantime it would, he believed, be interesting to know what foreign countries were doing in the matter. He had reason to believe that at the Foreign Office there were Reports on this subject sent by Her Majesty's Diplomatic Agents from Paris, Vienna, and Berlin; and, through the courtesy of the noble Earl who was, in 1884, at the Foreign Office, he (the Earl of Strafford) had the opportunity of looking into them. They were very interesting, and were not very voluminous. They dealt with the subject of horse-breeding depôts; and the financial part of the question was also dealt with, and showed that a large sum of money was expended in promoting horse-breeding in France, Germany, and Austria. It would be of great service if their Reports could be given to the public, so that those interested in the subject might have an opportunity of studying them. He hoped the noble Marquess would not object to the production of these Reports.

VOL. CCCXII. [THIRD SERIES.]

B

Address for—

"Copies or extracts of reports of Her Majesty's diplomatic agents at Paris, Vienna, and Berlin, on the subject of horse-breeding depôts, forwarded to the Foreign Office in the year 1884."
—(The Earl of Strafford.)

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): There is no objection whatever to the production of the Reports, which I am quite willing should be laid upon the Table.

Address agreed to.

UNIVERSAL PENNY POSTAGE.

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

Moved, for—

"The fourth letter written by Mr. Henniker Heaton, M.P., to the Postmaster General on the subject of the universal penny postage."—(The Earl of Crawford.)

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter before Five o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 11th March, 1887.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee
—Resolution [March 10] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—
Coroners' Elections* [193]; Merchandise Marks Law Consolidation and Amendment* [194].

Withdrawn—Criminal Law (Scotland) Procedure* [131].

LONDON CORPORATION (CHARGES OF MALVERSATION).

SIR JOHN R. MOWBRAY reported from the Committee of Selection, That, in pursuance of the Order of the House, they had nominated the following Five Members to constitute the Select Committee on the London Corporation (Charges of Malversation):—

The Earl of Strafford

Marquess of Hartington;
Sir Joseph Bailey;
Lewis Llewelyn Dillwyn, esquire;
William Henry Houldsworth, esquire;
James Cochrane Stevenson, esquire; and had also named,—

Charles Bradlaugh, esquire, and John Compton Lawrance, esquire, to serve on the Select Committee to propose and examine witnesses, but without the power of voting.

Ordered, That the Report do lie upon the Table.

QUESTIONS.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—CONSTITUTION OF THE FORCE.

CAPTAIN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the strength of the Royal Irish Constabulary; what is the number of Roman Catholics in the Force; whether the Force is chiefly recruited from agricultural districts of Ireland, and largely composed of sons of tenant farmers in Ireland; what was the number of evictions in Ireland in each of the years 1882, 1883, 1884, 1885, and 1886, respectively; what was the number of applications for admission to the ranks of the Royal Irish Constabulary in each of those years respectively; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will consider the propriety of so amending the law that offences, such as firing a revolver, or other fire-arms, at members of that Force when discharging their duty with bâtons, may be dealt with by the same criminal tribunals in Great Britain as deal with similar offences against members of the English Police Force in the execution of their duty?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: The present strength of the Royal Irish Constabulary is 12,554 men, of whom 9,205 are Roman Catholics, and the circumstances as to recruiting and the composition of the force are correctly stated in the Question. As to the number of evictions, the Government have no further information than that already before the House in the Returns periodically laid upon the Table. It is not practicable to tabulate the number of mere applications for admission to the Constabulary (which come from all parts of the three kingdoms); but the number of accepted candidates was 3,344, 657, 642, 1,040, and 1,425 respectively in the five years mentioned. I fear that I do not quite understand the last paragraph. I am not aware of any difference between the law in Great Britain and in Ireland in regard to the matter referred to.

MARRIAGE ACT -- NONCONFORMIST MARRIAGES--LEOMINSTER.

Mr. T. BLAKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has seen a letter in The Christian World, of March 3, by the Reverend J. J. Squire, Primitive Methodist Minister, of Leominster, stating that immediately after a marriage duly performed by him, in the presence of the Registrar, in the Primitive Methodist Chapel at that place, on the 16th of February, the Reverend A. Garthwaite, the curate of Kimbolton, near Leominster, persuaded the parties to go through the marriage service in Kimbolton Church, on the ground that it was not right to marry in a chapel, and afterwards entered the marriage in the parish register; and, whether, if Mr. Garthwaite has been guilty of an illegal act, legal proceedings will be taken against him?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I have seen the letter in question, and I have received a communication from the vicar of Kimbolton, from which it appears, not that the curate persuaded the parties to be married in church on the ground that it was not right to marry in a chapel, but that the vicar was informed that the parties were to be married at the Registrar's Office, and themselves desired to have the marriage ceremony afterwards performed in the church, in which the man had for 16 years been a member of the church choir. The vicar assures me distinctly that neither he nor his curate knew at the time the marriage service was performed, that any religious ceremony had taken place between the parties. This was explained two days afterwards to the minister of the Primitive Methodist Chapel, and I am told that he then expressed himself perfectly satisfied. The vicar also informs me that he was not acquainted with the provisions of the Marriage Act of 1856 when the marriage was entered in the parish register. I am not aware that there were no banns or licence.

INDIA--TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLET (Rochester) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the Papers relating to claims of the Indian Telegraph Department will be produced; when the scheme of re-organization will be sanctioned, and who is responsible for the delay in granting measures of relief; and, whether some measure of relief could be afforded by amalgamating, as in England, the Telegraph and Postal Services?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The case of the Telegraph Department has been referred to the Finance Commission which was recently appointed in India to consider what reductions can be made in the Public Expenditure. The hon. Member will see that until this Report has been received it is impossible to give the information he desires.

LAW AND JUSTICE--COURT HOUSES --ACCOMMODATION FOR PRISONERS AWAITING TRIAL.

Mr. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What action he proposes to take on the Report of the Committee on the Accommodation for Untried Prisoners?

Sir JOHN KENNAWAY, Mr. CALED WRIGHT, Mr. SHIRLEY, Mr. CHANNING, had also given Notice of Questions to the same effect.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I will answer the Questions of the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Baronet the Member for Honiton (Devon) and of the hon. Members for Leigh (Lancashire), of Doncaster (Yorkshire), and of East Northampton at the same time. The importance of the matter to which these five Questions refer cannot be exaggerated; and I am determined to do all that is in my power to remedy a state of things which, in my mind, constitute a serious evil. Places for the detention of prisoners immediately before and after trial appear to be excluded by the Prison Act of 1877 from the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State. Their control and management remains, therefore, where it always has been—with the Justices in counties and the Town Council in boroughs. A week ago, I gave instructions for a Circular to issue to all the County and Borough Authorities in England and Wales calling on them at once to take this matter into their serious consideration, and to inform me what improvements they mean to carry out in their respective Court-houses and other places of detention. I feel sanguine that they will everywhere co-operate with me in finding a remedy for evils which the Report of the Committee wisely appointed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh has brought to light. In reply to the Question of the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire, I can only say that after the replies of the Local Bodies have been received the Government will consider what action on their part may be necessary.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—DUNMANWAY PETTY SESSIONS—CASE OF FELIX SWEENEY.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.) (for Dr. KENNY) (Cork, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a man, named Felix Sweeney, was arrested at Dunmanway for breaking a pane of glass value 6d; whether he was sent to the County Cork Gaol to await his trial; whether he was brought to the Dunmanway Petty Sessions for trial; if, in default of paying a fine of 5s. he was sent to the County Cork Gaol for seven days; whether the expenses in connection with this case were £3 10s. 6d.; and, whether, in future, the necessity of incurring large expenses in such trivial cases will be obviated?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: The man referred to is a tramp who deliberately broke a pane of glass upon being refused alms. The statements in the second, third, fourth, and fifth paragraphs of the Question are substantially accurate. Offences of this kind must be punished, and some expenses attendant thereon cannot be avoided.

NAVY—EMPLOYMENT OF MARINES ON PRIVATE SERVICE.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether information has reached him that, on the 11th ultimo, the Captain of Marines aboard the Shannon, stationed in Bantry Bay, sent a party of Marines to polish the floor of a house in which a ball was held, and that it is the practice of this officer to send Marines to prepare the tennis ground and to do various other works foreign to their ordinary duties; and, if so, whether such employment is sanctioned by the regulations of the Service?

Mr. Matthews

THE FIRST LORD (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): Some of the Marines of the Shannon appear to have volunteered their services in preparing a room for dancing and a tennis court on shore at Bantry. The men were not there during their working hours, and were remunerated privately. The Admiralty, under the circumstances, see no reason for interference.

EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—MR. JOHN FROST, CO. CLARE—TRAVELLING EXPENSES OF THE POLICE FORCE.

MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.) (for Mr. Cox) (Clare, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state the amount of money expended in travelling expenses, &c., for the police force engaged in carrying out the eviction of Mr. John Frost, Rosmanagher, County Clare?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: I am unable to give this information. It requires a great deal of clerical labour to extract these expenses; and, although this has been done in a few cases, it cannot be carried further without neglect of other duties by the official staff.

AGRICULTURE (IRELAND)—EDUCATIONAL STATIONS.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received from Dr. Hodges, of the Chemico-Agricultural Society of Ulster, a communication urging the desirability of establishing throughout the country educational stations for the improvement of the method of agriculture; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to make provision for the establishment of such stations in their promised legislation on the Irish Land Question?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: The communication mentioned was received by the late Chief Secretary, who regretted he did not feel able to promote the request conveyed in it. The subject appears also to have been under the notice of previous Governments, none of whom took a favourable view of the proposal.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT BELFAST—REPORTS OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF INQUIRY.

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Government have yet completed their consideration of the Report of Sir John Day and his colleagues on the Belfast Riots; how soon they will communicate to the House their proposals with respect to social order in Belfast; how soon the Report and Evidence are likely to be in the hands of Members; and, whether the Government have abandoned the expectation of receiving a Report from Mr. Wallace MacHardy?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: This subject is still under consideration. The Report and Evidence have been laid on the Table. The Government, though unable to account for Commander MacHardy's continued silence, are unwilling to come to the conclusion that it is not his intention to make his expected Report.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT BELFAST—COLONEL FORBES, R.M., AND MR. M'CARTHY, R.M.

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there is any truth in the report that the Irish Government have it in contemplation to remove Colonel Forbes, R.M., and Mr. M'Carthy, R.M., from Belfast; whether, if so, the Government have consulted the Members of the Royal Commission on the Belfast Riots in reference to the matter; how long Colonel Forbes and Mr. M'Carthy have served in Belfast; have they satisfactorily discharged their duties; were they complimented by the Royal Commission, and did the Commission report that the stipendiary magistrates had discharged their duties "undoubtedly very well;" have they requested to be removed from Belfast; is the removal due to any complaint; and, if so, of what nature, and by whom made; whether it was established in evidence before the Royal Commission that certain Local Justices had set themselves to procure the removal of Colonel Forbes; and, whether, considering the recommendations of the Commission in regard to the Local Justices, the Government will take no step concerning Colonel Forbes and Mr. M'Carthy until the recommendations of the Commission can be dealt with as a whole?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: Colonel Forbes and Mr. M'Carthy, Resident Magistrates, have been informed that they are about to be transferred from Belfast. The Executive have taken this step on their own responsibility in view of the recommendations of the Belfast Commission, which include a strong suggestion that the Resident Magistrates in Belfast should be barristers. No slur is thereby cast on these two Resident Magistrates, and they have been so informed. Their duties in the past have been satisfactorily performed. One of them has served for over three years in Belfast, the other over four years. All Resident Magistrates are liable to transfer at the discretion of the Executive.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—EVIDENCE IN REVENUE CASES.

Mr. GODSON (Kidderminster) asked Mr. Attorney General, Why, in cases of infringement of the laws relating to the Inland Revenue, defendants are not allowed to give evidence on their own behalf, while in certain cases concerning the Customs, by 39 & 40 Vict. c. 36, s. 259, "the defendant shall be competent and compellable to give evidence;" and, whether he will take immediate steps to remove this disability?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): In reply to the hon. and learned Member, if his Question refers to proceedings in the Superior Court, defendants are competent and compellable to give evidence in Inland Revenue as well as in Customs cases; but if, as I rather gather, the Question refers to charges before magistrates, the ordinary rule applies that the defendant cannot give evidence in a criminal matter except in the particular cases authorized by statute. Her Majesty's Government hope that a Bill will pass both Houses of Parliament this Session to enable the defendant to give evidence in all criminal cases.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS AT ENNISKILLEN, &c.

MR. H. CAMPBELL (Fermanagh, S.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether letters posted in Enniskillen for Dublin and Belfast, after 7 o'clock p.m., are delivered next morning; and, if so, at what hour; and, if not, whether he will make arrangements to have letters that are posted during the night in Enniskillen and the following towns—namely, Clones, Newbliss, Cootehill, Bailieborough, Castleblayney, and Carrickmacross, forwarded by the train leaving Enniskillen at 6.20 a.m.?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): Letters can be posted in Enniskillen up to 8 p.m. for delivery the first thing next morning in both Dublin and Belfast. It is doubtful whether a sufficient number of letters are posted late at night in Enniskillen and the other towns mentioned to warrant an additional despatch by the train leaving Enniskillen at the early hour of 6.20 a.m.; but I will have inquiry made upon this point.

SOUTH AFRICA (NATAL)—THE CHIEF LANGALIBALELE.

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether arrangements have been made for the return of the Chief Langalibalele to Natal; and, if so, under what conditions?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): The Legislative Council of Natal has agreed to the return of Langalibalele to the Colony under the following conditions:—(1) That Langalibalele be placed in the Zwart Kop location, near Pietermaritzburg, under the charge of the Chief Teteleka; (2) that only such Natives as are bond fide members of his family be allowed to live with him; (3) that he be debarred from exercising any authority whatever as a Chief, or from claiming any privilege as such. £50 per annum has been voted for his maintenance. I may add that permission was given, in a despatch dated January 27 last, to make such arrangements as might be necessary for Langalibalele's return; but that there has not yet been time to learn what action has been taken in the matter.

POLICE (METROPOLIS) — DAYLIGHT ROBBERIES IN THE STREETS.

MR. KNOWLES (Salford, W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of the fact that on Friday last a lady was robbed in Westbourne Terrace in broad daylight, and that many similar offences have been committed recently in that neighbourhood, he proposes to take steps, by the employment of detectives or otherwise, to increase the security of the public?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): It is a fact that a lady was robbed on Friday last in Westbourne Terrace at 3.30 p.m. on a very foggy day. The Commissioner of Police tells me that he is not aware that many similar offences have been committed in that neighbourhood. Such an augmentation of the Police Force as would make impossible in this great Metropolis an outrage such as this of snatching away a purse openly carried in a lady's hand, would entail an expenditure of which the taxpayers might reasonably complain.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—MULTIPLE APPOINTMENTS IN BAMPTON DISTRICT, OXFORDSHIRE.

MR. F. W. MACLEAN (Oxford, Woodstock) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the appointment of the same gentleman to fill the offices of Surveyor of Highways of the Bampton East Highway District, Oxfordshire (containing a mileage of 128 miles), and of Sanitary Inspector of the Bampton Rural Sanitary District (consisting of 42 parishes and covering 70,048 acres); whether, having regard to the large and increasing duties of such offices, it is possible for one person adequately to discharge the same; whether complaints have been received by the Local Government Board from the ratepayers district in relation to such appointments; whether the Board has been urged by many of such ratepayers not to sanction the appointment of the same person to both offices; and, whether, under these circumstances, the Local Government Board will direct inquiry to be made into the soundness or otherwise of such complaints, and not sanction the appointment during the coming year unless satisfied that there is no ground for such complaints?

Sir Richard Webster

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): In 1885, when the Local Government Board were informed that the Inspector of Nuisances of the district in question had been re-appointed, and that it was proposed that he should also hold the office of Surveyor of Highways, the Board objected to the two offices being held by the same person. But, having received particulars of the work which had been done by the Inspector of Nuisances, and the Medical Officer of Health for the county having borne testimony to the efficiency with which that officer discharged his duties; the Board considered that there was no sufficient reason for their withholding their assent to an arrangement which had been unanimously approved by the Sanitary Authority. The Inspector has now been re-appointed for another year. The only communication which the Board has received objecting to the re-appointment is from the waywarden of one of the 38 parishes in the highway district. The Board, before arriving at a decision on the subject, will ask for the observations of the Sanitary Authority on the statements in that communication.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—CASE OF WILLIAM CASSELS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is the case that William Cassels, sentenced on the 5th instant by the Sheriff Substitute at Portree to three weeks' imprisonment from his committal on December 23, had been kept in prison awaiting trial ten weeks from that date, or seven weeks beyond the term of his actual sentence; and, if he will explain why a prisoner ultimately tried summarily before a Court whose powers of imprisonment are limited to two months, was detained in prison ten weeks awaiting trial?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): William Cassels was detained in prison for ten weeks before trial, which was, in my opinion, most improper in such a case, unless there were exceptional circumstances to explain the delay. I think it necessary to make a full inquiry, and I shall feel obliged if the hon. Member will postpone his Question for a week.

THE CURRENCY, GOLD AND SILVER (ROYAL COMMISSION).

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in The Standard of the 8th March, which contains the following statement with regard to the Gold and Silver Commission:—

"The Commissioners will probably hold only two or three further meetings."

Whether he is aware that the Commissioners have only recently entered into an inquiry as to bi-metallism, which was the main object of their appointment; and, whether, considering the important character of the subject, he can inform the House if the Commissioners will close their inquiry without calling upon well-known authorities to give evidence as to the advisability of promoting an international agreement for the introduction of bi-metallism?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): My attention has not been drawn to the paragraph in question. My impression is that there is no foundation for such a statement. As the hon. Member is aware, the Commissioners act entirely on their own responsibility, and the Government do not interfere with the discharge of their duties. I should think that the Commission will not break up without dealing with all the important questions that were referred to it.

ARMY MEDICAL STAFF (INDIA)—BRIGADE-SURGEONS.

COLONEL HUGHES - HALLETT (Rochester) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will take into consideration the case of brigade-surgeons on the Medical Staff in India, having regard to the severe examinations they have to pass for their promotion, with a view to placing them, as was contemplated by the Royal Warrant of 2nd

December 1879, on the same footing as brigade-surgeons in all other parts of Her Majesty's Dominions, as regards pay, position, and pension, instead of allowing them to remain, as at present in India, on the same pay after 25 and 30 years' service as surgeons-major, and subject at times to routine duties under medical officers of the latter rank who may be their juniors?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham) (who replied) said: When the Royal Warrant created the rank of brigade-surgeon in 1879 the Secretary of State for India declined to allow any increased expenditure to be cast on the Revenues of India by reason of that Warrant, and the present Secretary of State adheres to that determination.

INLAND REVENUE—THE COLLECTORSHIP AT SLIGO.

MR. KENNEDY (Sligo, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to abolish the collectorship at Sligo, the most important port and town on the West Coast of Ireland after Limerick; and, if so, whether there will then be no Head Office between Londonderry and Galway; whether the Corporation, the Grand Jury, the Harbour Board, and trading community of Sligo have passed Resolutions and forwarded Memorials against the abolition of this office; and, whether the traders of the counties of Sligo, Leitrim, Roscommon, and Longford have given expression to their opposition to the proposed change; and, if so, whether the public feeling will be considered by the Inland Revenue Commissioners?

MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received a copy of the Resolution unanimously passed at a meeting of the merchants of Sligo and the adjoining counties, protesting against the contemplated removal of the Collector of Inland Revenue and his staff from Sligo; and, if not, whether he will inquire into the matter, and recommend to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to consider the wishes of the traders of four out of five of the counties of Connaught?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) (who replied) said, the question of abolishing the collectorship at Sligo was under consideration. In the event of its being abolished there would be no other collector between Londonderry and Galway; but there would be several supervisors and officers, and no inconvenience would be caused. Memorials had been received from the Corporation, the Harbour Board, and also from the public living in the district with reference to the proposed change, and these Memorials would be fully considered.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—REMOVAL OF CATTLE FROM IRELAND—PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

COLONEL GUNTER (Yorkshire, W.R., Barksstone Ash) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether any precautionary measures are adopted to prevent the removal inland of cattle landed at Liverpool or elsewhere in Great Britain from Ireland, that are known to have been herded with, or in contact with, animals suffering with pleuro-pneumonia?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY (Lord JOHN MANNERS) (Leicestershire, E.): An Order of Council has been approved, and will shortly be passed, to enable Local Authorities to deal with animals which have been exposed to contact with diseased animals while in transit, whether from Ireland or other parts of the United Kingdom.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (IRELAND)—NORTH ANTRIM.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, on the occasion of the recent Parliamentary Election for North Antrim, Captain Robinson, the only available magistrate in the town of Portrush, refused, on the day previous to the polling, to take the declarations of secrecy of the agents of the Liberal candidate, who attended before him for the purpose; whether he first refused on the ground that the declarations were not stamped; whether he was entitled to offer such an objection; whether the documents having been stamped at his direction, he a second time refused to sign them, on the plea that they were not properly drafted; whether he did not sign them until after he had caused much annoyance and loss of time; and, what notice will be taken of his conduct?

Colonel Hughes-Hallett

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: The Government have no knowledge of, and have received no information as to, the alleged occurrence. If any person thinks he has cause for complaint against the action of any Justice of the Peace in his magisterial capacity, the proper course is to communicate with the Lord Chancellor, who will take the necessary action.

MERCHANT SHIPPING — THE WRECK OF THE "FLAMINGO."

MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether a portion of the wreck of the iron steamer Flamingo still lies off the north-east headland of St. Margaret's Bay, near the South Foreland, in the course of small craft going round the point; and, if so, whether he will consider the advisability of having it removed?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Trinity House, who are the executive authority in this matter, despatched on the 8th instant a steamer and diver to complete the dispersion of what remains of the wreck of the Flamingo.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS — SHIPMENT OF INFECTED CATTLE FROM DUBLIN — PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

COLONEL GUNTER (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkstone Ash) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that cows belonging to a dairyman in Dublin were exposed for sale in the Dublin Cattle Market whilst suffering with pleuro-pneumonia on the 14th of February; that they were subsequently sent to the Dublin Steamship Company's wharf with a large number of cattle to be shipped for Liverpool; that the Veterinary Inspector there detected the diseased animals and ordered them to be slaughtered; that the shipping of the animals that had been in contact with those slaughtered continued; and that the Inspector's orders for closing the yard as an infected place were unattended to, as no orders to that effect had been received from Dublin Castle?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: The facts are substantially as stated in the Question. There is no power to detain any animals during transit except those found to be diseased. The Privy Council were advised by their professional officer that an order declaring the yard an infected place should not be made. The dairyman has since been prosecuted, and fined £2 and costs.

ARMY—MUSKETRY—EFFICIENCY OF THE INFANTRY.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the Secretary of State for War, What proportion of the effective strength of the Infantry of the Line, and of the Infantry Militia, were put last year through a course of musketry, and what proportion of such number did not succeed in making sufficient points to get out of the third class?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The proportion of the effective strength of the Infantry of the Line that was put through a course of musketry was—trained soldiers, 89 per cent; recruits, 64 per cent. In the Militia the proportion of men trained was 87 per cent of those battalions and half-battalions which were able to go through a course of musketry. Of the trained soldiers of the Infantry, 46 per cent failed to obtain sufficient points to pass out of the third class; and of the recruits, 23·5 per cent. Of the Militia, 38 per cent failed to pass out of the third class. These numbers are based upon the musketry practice of the Army for the year ending March 31, 1886, and of the Militia for the year 1886. As I presume that the object of my hon. Friend is to make a comparison between the shooting of the Army and Militia and of the Volunteers, I should like to say that the conditions are wholly different. In the case of the Army, it is necessary to get 110 points in 80 rounds to get into the second class, and this has been found so onerous that the qualification is to be reduced. In the case of the Militia, a man must make 39 points out of 30 rounds. In the case of the Volunteers, on the other hand, all that is necessary to get out of the third class is to make 45 points out of a maximum of 60 shots; and the recruit will only have to hit the target 12 times in all.

BULGARIA—EXECUTIONS OF INSURGENTS.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government instructed their Agents in Bulgaria to use their influence with the Regents against excessive severity in dealing with the insurgents; whether the British Government took any steps with a view to prevent the recent wholesale executions in Bulgaria; and, whether the Foreign Office has received any communications from the Russian Government on this subject?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government gave no instructions to their Agents in Bulgaria to interfere with the Regents in the execution of their duties. Her Majesty's Government have received no communication from the Russian Government on the subject.

MR. DILLON: That is not answering my Question. I said nothing about duty, but about undue severity.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: That is the exercise of their functions.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Government will afford the House information as to the exact nature of the negotiations now being carried on between Sir H. Drummond Wolff and the Sublime Porte; and, whether he can give an undertaking that no Treaty or Convention on Egyptian Affairs will be concluded with the Porte, or with the Great Powers, until an opportunity shall have been afforded to the House of considering the provisions of such Treaty or Convention?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government will communicate to Parliament the exact nature of the negotiations now being carried on between Sir H. Drummond Wolff and the Sublime Porte as soon as it shall appear that the public interests will be served thereby. The communication to Parliament of any Treaty or Convention concluded with the Porte or with the Great Powers will be made in conformity with Constitutional precedent.

PUBLIC OFFICIALS—BETRAYAL OF TRUST.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether any official Regulations exist under which persons in the Public Service, committing offences similar to that with which Mr. Young Terry is charged, are liable to pecuniary or other penalties in addition to the mere fact of dismissal from their employment; and, whether, if the law does not already provide for the adequate punishment of such offences, the Government will at once introduce a Bill for that purpose, in order to prevent the repetition of crimes which are stringently punished in other countries?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): Any person is liable to dismissal, accompanied by loss of pension, who commits an offence similar to that of Mr. Young Terry, and he is, of course, subject if convicted in a Court of Law to any further punishment that that Court can impose. The law at present is not, in my judgment, in a satisfactory state so far as it bears upon offences of this kind; and it will be a matter of consideration for the Government whether it should not be strengthened.

PUBLIC OFFICIALS—THE DOCKYARDS—BETRAYAL OF TRUST.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, What classes of officials or workmen engaged at Chatham or other public Dockyards are employed in positions of confidence and secrecy; who are permitted to possess information of a confidential nature which has a money value; what precautions are taken as to character, or by means of an oath or some other binding engagement, to guard against a breach of trust; and, what are the lowest salaries or wages paid to any of such persons?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): All officials, and many of the workmen, are necessarily in possession of information relating to the work upon which they are employed that is more or less confidential. The Admiralty cannot judge accurately what may or may not be supposed to have a money value outside the Service. Any item of information, however trivial, may be of money value to some persons. The professional officers and draftsmen are trained and brought up in the Service, and only men of the best character are promoted, or placed in positions of trust. There is no oath or binding engagement made, as a rule, beyond the understanding that breaches of trust are certain, if discovered, to be punished as severely as the powers in the hands of the Department will permit. It is difficult to reply to the last part of the Question, as information relating to special work is open to any intelligent mechanic employed upon it, and whose pay may be as low as 5s. per diem.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL—AGE PENSIONS.

SIR EDMUND COMMERE (Southampton) asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, If any portion of the increase in the Greenwich Hospital Funds will be devoted to the increase of the age pensions now due?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (A LORD of the ADMIRALTY) (Sheffield, Ecclesall): It is estimated that a sum of £5,000 has been distributed in age and special pensions during the present financial year in excess of the amount so distributed in previous years; and it is hoped that this additional expenditure may be maintained. But in distributing the funds, account has to be taken of temporary abatements from the rents of the estates of Greenwich Hospital in the North of England, and of the smaller return from royalties on minerals consequent on depression in agriculture and trade. I may add that the age pension is granted to every naval pensioner who is unable to contribute to his own support, provided he is in other respects eligible.

METROPOLIS—COAL AND WINE DUES—THE BLACKWALL AND GREENWICH TUNNEL.

MR. LYELL (Orkney and Shetland) (for Dr. MACDONALD) (Ross and Cromarty) asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether the proposed tunnel between Blackwall and Greenwich is to be proceeded with without fail, in the event of Parliament giving its consent to the continuance of the Coal and Wine Dues for a few years; and also, in the event of Parliament refusing to continue these Dues, whether it is still the intention of his Board to proceed with the tunnel; and, whether, in the event of the continuance of the Dues, his Board will pledge itself to establish a free ferry between Greenwich and the Isle of Dogs?

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): Before my hon. and gallant Friend answers the Question I wish to ask, Whether his attention has been called to the prospectus of a Company for establishing a ferry between Greenwich and the Isle of Dogs; whether in the advertisement amongst the Directors of the Company appears the name of Dr. Macdonald, M.P.; and whether he can inform the House whether that Dr. Macdonald is a different person from the one that has put down the Question? Also, whether the Metropolitan Board of Works will take steps in the interests of the public to save the public from having to purchase this Ferry Company out of the rates?

THE CHAIRMAN (SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG) (Middlesex, Hornsey): It is the intention of the Metropolitan Board, when the Blackwall and Greenwich Tunnel has received the sanction of Parliament, to proceed with the scheme, whether the Coal and Wine Duties are renewed or not. With regard to the latter part of the hon. Member's Question, I can give no pledge that the Board will establish a free ferry between Greenwich and the Isle of Dogs, in the event of the continuance of the duties. With regard to the Question of my hon. Friend (Mr. Webster), the matter has been mentioned to me, and I have been shown a paper containing a certain document, stating that a certain gentleman was a member of a Company. I really have not the honour of the acquaintance of the hon. Member (Dr. Macdonald), and whether he is a member of this or any other Company I have not the slightest idea.

OPEN SPACES (METROPOLIS)—BURTON'S COURT, CHELSEA.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office, How the cost of the contemplated conversion of Burton's Court into a recreation ground for the garrison of London will be defrayed; and, whether the Government will insist that the public shall not be entirely deprived of their long-continued enjoyment of this open space, and will prevent the erection upon it of buildings that would be injurious to the surrounding property?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY (Mr. BRODRICK) (Surrey, Guildford): The cost of the conversion of Burton's Court into a recreation ground for the troops of the London garrison will be borne mainly by private subscriptions; but a grant of £800 has been made from Army Votes towards the expense of relaying the ground. I understand the public will still have access to the ground at certain hours of the day and on Sundays. The site is not War Department property; and the question of erecting buildings thereon will be for the consideration of the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital, before whom I will take care to bring any complaint which my hon. Friend may forward.

PUBLIC PARKS AND WORKS BILL— THE VICTORIA PARK ESTATE.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the lands managed in connection with Victoria Park, which, by the Public Parks and Works Bill, it is proposed to transfer to the Metropolitan Board, include the whole of the property known as the Victoria Park Estate?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): There is no Estate under the management of the Office of Works outside the actual limits of Victoria Park, and no such estate is intended to be transferred by the Public Parks and Works Bill. The expression "land managed in connection with Victoria Park," referred to by the hon. Member, was used by the draftsman, as he informs me, because the limits of the Park are not legally defined in the Acts of Parliament under which the Park was formed.

POST OFFICE—ADDRESS TO THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge) asked the Postmaster General, Whether any official document has been put before him, submitting for his consideration the address recently presented to the Secretary of the Post Office by certain subordinate officials of that Department; and, whether he has taken any official notice of it?

Mr. Whitmore

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): An official Minute was placed before me a few days ago, submitting for my consideration the Address to which my hon. Friend refers. This Minute the Secretary subsequently requested my permission to withdraw, and I allowed that course to be taken, being reluctant, as I have already stated in this House, to take official cognizance of the incident in question.

ARMY (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)— CONTRACT FOR CARTRIDGES.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether it is the case that the firm of Kynoch and Co., of Birmingham, have lately executed a contract, either wholly or in part, of cartridges for the British Government; whether this contract was completed within the time specified in the contract; and, what percentage, if any, of this order was rejected on account of bad construction?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL (Mr. NORTHGOTE) (Exeter): A contract for 10,000,000 cartridges was obtained by competition by Messrs. Kynoch and Co. in October, 1885. The execution of the contract, for various reasons, some of which were beyond Messrs. Kynoch's control, has been seriously delayed. The percentage of rejections was a little over 20 per cent, and a Special Committee assembled to consider an appeal from Messrs. Kynoch and Co. against these rejections, has reported that they were undoubtedly due to inferior workmanship.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS— SEWAGE PRECIPITATION WORKS AT BARKING.

MR. SALT (Stafford) asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Under what Parliamentary powers the Board is acting in accepting a tender of £406,000 for sewage precipitation works at Barking; whether this expenditure is final; and, what further expenditure is contemplated at the outfalls of Barking and Crossness?

THE CHAIRMAN (Sir JAMES M'GAREL HOGG) (Middlesex, Hornsey): I may state that a tender, amounting to £406,000, for the sewage works about to be executed at Barking was accepted by the Board, in pursuance of the powers of the 135th Section of the Metropolis Management Act, 1875, and of other provisions conferring jurisdiction upon the Board with reference to the disposal of sewage and refuse from the sewers of the Metropolis, and for the purpose of preventing the discharge of sewage sludge into the Thames. The £406,000 applies to the works at Barking only, and is not final. A further sum will probably have to be expended in the completion of the works at both outfalls and the purchase of sludge ships.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (IRELAND)—THE BOROUGH OF NEWRY AND THE COUNTIES OF DOWN AND ARMAGH—FISCAL RELATIONS.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) (for MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY) (Newry) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table a Copy of the Report of Mr. R. Hamilton, Local Government Board Inspector, and of the evidence given before him at the inquiry held in Newry on the 4th January last, and of all Correspondence and Letters passing between the Local Government Board, or Mr. Hamilton, their Inspector, and the officials or members of the Grand Juries of Armagh or Down relative to the fiscal relations between the borough of Newry and the counties of Armagh and Down?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: I cannot undertake to lay on the Table the Report made by the Inspector to the Local Government Board, as it is not usual to publish documents of that character. There is no Departmental objection to the publication of the evidence and the correspondence mentioned; but they are very voluminous, and, perhaps, the hon. Member's object would be sufficiently attained by being given the opportunity of seeing copies.

THE EXHIBITIONS OF 1884, 1885, 1886.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If any Accounts or Receipts and Expenditure have been rendered by the Royal Commissioners for the International Health Exhibition of 1884, the Inventions Exhibition of 1885, and the Indian and Colonial Exhibition of 1886; and, if he will cause such Accounts to be laid upon the Table?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Government have been in no way connected with the various Exhibitions recently held, and, therefore, the Government have no official cognizance of their accounts. I am under the impression that the accounts of the earlier Exhibitions have already been made public; and I believe it is the intention of His Royal Highness, the President, who has taken so much interest in these Exhibitions, and to whose personal energy so much of their success is due, to cause the remainder of the accounts to be made public as soon as they admit of being finally rendered. I may point out that it was only one Exhibition—namely, the Colonial and Indian Exhibition, which was held under the authority of a Royal Commission.

THE IRISH LAND QUESTION—LEGISLATION.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government intend to legislate upon the Irish Land Question during the present Session?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Sir, my answer is, Yes.

MR. COBB: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Land Bill will be introduced before or after the Coercion Bill; and whether or not it will be introduced in the same House?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I can give no further information, Sir, than I have already given in this House.

PUBLIC OFFICIALS—THE DOCKYARDS—BETRAYAL OF TRUST.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the Government are aware that the plans and specifications to which Mr. Young Terry, late draftsman at Chatham Dockyard, obtained access whilst in Government employ, were communicated to a European friendly Power; and, if so, whether he will inform the House which Power so received the information?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing) (who replied) said: As I stated yesterday, it would not be for the public interest that at present any reply to Questions of this character should be made. But I think it only right to state, inasmuch as a number of statements in reference to this case have appeared in the public Press, that they have been made without the authority of the Admiralty, and must, therefore, be treated with caution.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said, he wished to put a further Question. In the morning papers of that day there was a telegram from New York stating that the Secretary to the Navy at New York had denied that any information had been received through the American Legation from the London Correspondent of The New York Times. As the report was calculated to damage that gentleman, he wished to know whether there was any ground for saying that the London Correspondent of The New York Times had anything whatever to do with the matter?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: As I stated before, I must answer all these Questions with some reserve. What I said in the earlier part of the evening was that statements which had appeared in the newspapers relative to this case were made without the authority of the Admiralty; and I have no objection to supplement my statement by saying that no official of the Admiralty has made any charge or allegation against any member of the American Legation, or, as far as I know, against any American newspaper.

THE CONTRACT SYSTEM OF THE ADMIRALTY—THE ROYAL COMMISSION—IRREGULAR PUBLICATION OF EVIDENCE—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): Sir, I rise with great reluctance to ask the indulgence of the House while I refer to a matter personal to myself. I am compelled to take this step in consequence of a Question which was put and answered in the House during my unavoidable absence on Tuesday last. The Question referred to certain extracts which appeared in The Times on Monday morning from the evidence taken by the Contracts Committee of the Admiralty. Now, Sir, when I found on Monday morning that the Question was on the Notice Paper, I wrote at once to the hon. Member for East Bradford (Mr. Byron Reed), who had placed it on the Paper, and also to the hon. Member for the Ormskirk Division of Lancashire (Mr. Forwood), the Secretary to the Admiralty, who was likely to respond to it. In those letters I pointed out that I should unavoidably be absent from my place on Tuesday, and I said that it would be convenient to myself if the Question could be postponed until my return. I must, at the outset, acknowledge the courtesy and kindness with which I was treated by the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Bradford; and I have his permission to read the letter he sent to me in reply to my request. I cannot say that I am able to extend the same gratitude to the hon. Member for the Ormskirk Division of Lancashire. The hon. Member for East Bradford sent a note to me at a quarter past 4 o'clock on Tuesday, when I was on my way to Wolverhampton, and in that note he said—

"On my arrival here at the House I at once saw the hon. Member for the Ormskirk Division, and I have shown him your note. He, however, objects to the Question being postponed, as the matter it refers to is one of administrative importance, and, therefore, will not brook delay; and, besides, he says that he has heard from you on the subject this morning, and that you agree that the Question should be put."

Now, it is a curious fact that I received from the hon. Member for Ormskirk, on Tuesday morning, a telegram, in which he stated—

"I propose, in answer to the Question on the Paper for to-night, to read the first two letters of our correspondence."

Having at that time sent a letter to the hon. Gentleman, couched in the same terms as that to the hon. Member for East Bradford, I telegraphed in reply to the telegram of the Secretary to the Admiralty—

"Good; but see my letter posted this morning: shall be away at Wolverhampton this afternoon."

No doubt, it was natural that the Secretary to the Admiralty should be anxious, for Departmental reasons, that the matter should be disposed of at once; and I can understand, from circumstances which have since transpired, that the hon. Gentleman was not at all unwilling that his answer should be given in my absence. ["Oh!"] I think I shall make this clear to hon. Gentlemen opposite; but, however that may be, whether I am right or wrong in that conjecture, I do not understand why the hon. Member for Ormskirk, unwittingly—for I am sure he would not have done it purposely—should have mislaid the hon. Member for East Bradford, and induced him to bring on the Question, because, had he shown the whole of my telegram to the hon. Member for East Bradford, I am perfectly convinced that the hon. Member would have been the last man in the world to insist on bringing forward the Question in my absence, and would have refused altogether to be the medium of eliciting an answer from the Secretary to the Admiralty. This may be considered comparatively unimportant; but still it is one which I think I ought to bring under the notice of the House. And now I will turn to what was stated by the hon. Member for Ormskirk in the answer to the Question which he gave in my absence; and I must say that I was extremely surprised to find what I can only describe as a very nasty insinuation—["Oh!"]—yes, a very nasty insinuation indeed—contained in it towards the close of the answer. I say again that I have no desire to impute to the hon. Member for Ormskirk any intention to make a nasty insinuation; but, as it stands, I will ask the House whether what he said in answer to a Question put to him in my absence does not contain a very nasty insinuation. The hon. Gentleman said, at the close of his reply—

"I am sorry that the hon. Member"—that is myself—"does not state what he did with the notes he says he took of the Report, seeing that some of the comments in The Times had reference to some of the extracts from the Report."

Then the hon. Gentleman goes on to say, in singular contrast to the terms of my letter—

"As the hon. Member for Wolverhampton is not in his place, it is right to say that I communicated with him and received his consent to the production of the correspondence."

Now, I accept the entire responsibility for the publication of the extracts from the evidence. I am bound to do so. I regret extremely—and I place myself unreservedly in the hands of the House in the matter—that through misapprehension—how it has arisen I cannot at present understand—but, under a complete misapprehension, I took away, in the fullest possible belief that it was public property given to me to do what I liked with, what is said to be a confidential document. Now, there were two documents; one the Report of the Committee on Admiralty Contracts, and the other a Report of the evidence adduced before the Committee. I wish the House to understand clearly what my position was. I had no knowledge whatever of the evidence having been printed, but I had considerable knowledge in reference to the Report. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that on the 18th of February a summary appeared in The Daily Telegraph which purported to be a résumé of the Report of the Committee on Contracts, and rumours were circulated about for some time that there were considerable differences of opinion in regard to the Report, and that the delay in producing it before the House was occasioned by those differences of opinion. I was very anxious to see the Report, if it was to be presented to the House, and to compare it with the résumé in The Daily Telegraph, which I had in my possession. With that object I called at the Admiralty and asked the hon. Member for Ormskirk to allow me to see the Report. There was some difficulty as to my seeing it, but eventually the hon. Gentleman consented to my seeing it as a confidential document. Immediately after he had consented to my seeing the Report I asked if I could see the corrected proof, and I was informed that the proof had been returned to the printers, and that I could not see it. I mention this in reference to my letter of the 4th of March. It occurred to me that although the proof might have gone back to the printers there might possibly be a rough copy which I might be allowed to see. I, therefore, went to the Admiralty on Saturday last and asked to see the document, and, with great kindness, the hon. Member for Ormskirk, through his private secretary, allowed me to see a copy of the Report. The secretary told me that the Report was a confidential communication, and that I should not be allowed to take away a copy of it; but he said I might read it and take notes from it. He then pointed to a second set of papers, and said, "There is the Report of the evidence; you can have that." I said, "I should be glad to have it; may I take it away with me?" He said, "Yes; we do not care for it." I took it away with the intention of reading it afterwards. I read the Report; and, after I had done so, I took away the other collection of papers, with the complete understanding, on my part, that the second bundle of papers was absolutely open to the public. I was fully aware that the Report itself was strictly confidential. I read the evidence in the course of the afternoon, and then handed it over to a friend, with whom I had some conversation about it. I said, "It is public property; you may take it away with you." He did so; and on the Monday morning certain extracts from the evidence appeared in The Times. I can only say that I am extremely sorry that, through a misapprehension—but through no breach of confidence, for I wish altogether to disavow myself from any imputation of that kind—these extracts should have appeared in The Times. And now let me turn to the matter in which I say a nasty insinuation is contained in the reply of the Secretary to the Admiralty on Tuesday to the Question put to him by the hon. Member for East Bradford. In the remarks of the hon. Member for Ormskirk, which I quoted just now, he said—

"I am sorry the hon. Member does not state what he did with the notes which he states he took of the Report, seeing that some of the statements of The Times had reference to the extracts from the Report."

Now, the hon. Gentleman is not altogether correct. If he had taken the trouble to look at the leading article in The Times, he would have found that there was no reference to any extracts from that Report. There is not a single comment of the nature to which he refers. I have here The Times in question, and I challenge the hon. Gentleman to point to one single extract from the Report or one single comment on such an extract. I hope, then, that I have satisfied the hon. Gentleman in regard to his curiosity, which, I admit, was perfectly natural. I took no notes whatever from the Report, and very naturally, because I had been told that it was a confidential document. It would have been perfectly useless for me to have taken notes from it, when it was given to me as a confidential Report, and I knew that in the course of a few days the public would have it in the usual way. The hon. Gentleman is altogether inaccurate in his statement—unintentionally, of course—when he says I have stated that I took notes of the Report. I never made any statement of the kind. I never said that I took notes from the Report. I suppose the hon. Member has arrived at the conclusion that I did take notes from the Report, because I say in my letter, of the 7th of March, that—

"On visiting the Admiralty on Saturday, I was permitted to read and to take notes of the Report on Contract."

He gathers from that that I did take notes. It is true that I had permission to take notes; but, as a matter of fact, I took none whatever. There is another matter to which I feel bound to refer; but I do so with great reluctance, not only on my own account, but on account of the awkward position in which it may possibly place the hon. Gentleman himself. The House will have observed that, in the telegram the hon. Member for Ormskirk sent to me on Tuesday morning, he said—

"I am going to read the two first letters of our correspondence."

As a matter of fact, the hon. Gentleman read four. I attach no importance to that. The only remark I will make is, that it is not what the hon. Member said he was going to do; because, instead of reading two letters, he read four. What I do complain of is that, in reading the fourth letter, the name of another gentleman was unwarrantably dragged into the matter, without any permission from me, without the permission from the other gentleman named, and absolutely without the hon. Gentleman having received the letter from me. I am quite aware, from what the hon. Gentleman himself has told me, that he has been labouring under a misapprehension. He has, no doubt, thought that he received that fourth letter from me. I am sorry to trouble the House at such great length; but it is a matter of considerable importance to me; and, therefore, I will ask the House to follow me while I read the letter in question. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Ormskirk read my letter to him, of the

Sir William Pender

7th of March, and he then went on to say—

"The hon. Member"—referring to myself—"was good enough to enclose for my information the following letter he received on Friday, March 4, from Mr. H. C. Burdett—the friend to whom, I presume, he refers in his letter of the 7th—the day he wrote appointing Saturday, the 5th, on which to peruse the report:—

"Dear Sir William,—Will you come over here as I want to explain how it will be easiest for you to get out the facts and to understand the report to-morrow. Believe me faithfully yours, H. C. BURDETT."

Mr. Burdett had asked me to dine with him at the St. Stephen's Club, and the letter began with these words—

"Will you dine with me at 8 p.m.? The bearer awaits an answer. Will you come over here, &c.?"

Now this letter of Mr. Burdett has been most unwarrantably brought forward; but so far as Mr. Burdett is concerned, personally he is a gentleman who can very well take care of himself. He is a well known writer on statistics, and takes a great interest in the Spending Departments of the Government. I think I am perfectly correct in saying that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Treasury Bench and the Front Opposition Bench have on more than one occasion received from Mr. Burdett very valuable information. But whatever his position is, I altogether object to his letter to me being made use of without his consent and mine. I was greatly astonished when I returned to London on the Wednesday morning to find what had occurred. I knew perfectly well that I had not sent this letter to the hon. Member for Ormskirk. I wrote to the hon. Member, having previously told him that he must have been aware that the letter of Mr. Burdett was not intended for him, and I asked his private secretary to inquire whether any letter of mine had been left in the Admiralty Office when I last visited it. To that letter I received a reply from the private secretary to the hon. Member, Mr. Voules—

"In reply to your letter to-night I beg to give you the following explanation. Mr. Forwood on Monday gave me in the House of Commons a packet of correspondence which he had had with you with reference to the Report of the Committee on Admiralty Contracts. Among them I noticed one addressed to you, and signed, 'H. C. Burdett.' On the receipt of your letter as to whether any letter had been found in my room after your visit ceased, I am now informed by one of the messengers that on Monday evening he found a letter addressed to you on the floor of the room, which he placed on my desk, but without mentioning the matter to me. I can only add that I never saw this letter before Tuesday morning."

Now, I wish to relieve from any imputation whatever Mr. Voules, who gives me this information. It is quite clear that he could not have known anything about this letter, but I think the hon. Member for Ormskirk was bound to know that he had not received this letter from me on the Monday, because he replied to my letter of that date, and made no mention of the fact. All I can say is that if the hon. Gentleman conducts the business of the Admiralty in the same careless manner as that in which he conducts his own correspondence, the business of the Admiralty must be in a rather bad condition. Perhaps upon this subject I may be allowed to refer to a letter which the Secretary to the Admiralty has been good enough to send me. He says—

"In reply to your note of the 9th, about the letter of Mr. Burdett, I first found it in the correspondence on Tuesday morning."

May I remind the House that the letter of mine in which the hon. Member says this enclosure appears, was delivered on Monday evening, and was answered by him on the Monday evening. He goes on to say—

"I rather hastily thought that I had omitted to examine the envelope, as both seemed to 'hang together.'"

A rather curious expression "hang together." Well, Sir, in regard to this matter, I should like to make one or two very short remarks. ["Oh!"] I am sorry to occupy so much of the time of the House, but I think the House will see that it is absolutely necessary that I should give an answer to the imputations which have been made against me. I will only point to the fact that in the letters which passed between myself and the Parliamentary Secretary of the Admiralty, there has never been one single reference to any enclosure whatever, nor has the hon. Gentleman in any reply to me made any reference to any enclosure having been received; when the hon. Member says that he found the letter of Mr. Burdett on his table on Tuesday morning, and considered that it had been enclosed to him by me, he must have jumped to a somewhat extraordinary conclusion. If I had been acting the part of a strictly honest man and wanted to point out to the Secretary to the Admiralty the name of the friend to whom I had given the collection of papers I had received, I should have mentioned the facts explicitly. But why should I go and put into my letter an enclosure which conveys no information at all, and which does not even give my name. Certainly it is addressed to "Sir William," but I imagine that there are a good many "Sir Williams" in Great Britain, and it is impossible for the hon. Member to say that this particular communication was addressed to me. All I say is that if the hon. Member treats letters in this way ordinarily, he has an extraordinary way of dealing with them. I wish again to repeat my complete denial that any suspicion can rightly attach to me that in taking this collection of papers containing the evidence, I had the least idea that I was taking away a confidential Report. I am certain that it was given to me with a clear intimation that it was a public document; and, having arrived at the conclusion, I would ask hon. Members as reasonable men to argue the matter out, and they will at once see that I came to that conclusion because I was told that the Report itself was a confidential document, and that I could not take it away; whereas the second collection of papers which I had not asked for, but which were offered to me, were represented to me to be not confidential, and I was told that I might take them away. I was further told—and it was a matter which had a considerable impression upon me—that the Admiralty "do not care about it."

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. Forwood) (Lancashire, Ormakirk): I hope the hon. Gentleman will remember the old proverb, that one tale is good until the other is told. At the outset, I wish to say that I accept the assurance of the hon. Member that in the mode in which he has dealt with the Papers placed before him at the Admiralty Office, he acted inadvertently and without understanding the conditions under which they were entrusted to him. But the hon. Member has made some remarks, personal to myself, in regard to which it is necessary that I should detain the House for a minute or two while I give a reply. At the outset I wish to remind hon. Members that I believe the House resents—and justly resents—the publication of confidential documents, and that the publication of confidential documents is considered to be a reflection upon the Department that has charge of them. Well, Sir, when on Monday morning I saw documents published in The Times which had been in the charge of a Department of the Admiralty with which I am connected, and knowing that I had permitted them to be seen by an hon. Member in whom I had reposed the confidence which one Member of this House has in the discretion of another—a confidence which has happily characterised the relations between Member and Member of this House—entertaining that opinion, and knowing that I had consented to show an hon. Member a document which was confidential in its character, I felt that if there was any reflection in regard to the publication of this document I was unwittingly the cause of it. I wrote at once to the hon. Member to whom I had lent the document and asked him if he could explain how the matter had become public. I received a reply to that letter on Monday evening, and, as the hon. Member has stated, I gave that reply, together with other documents, to my private secretary in an envelope. On Tuesday morning I saw that the hon. Member for East Bradford had given Notice of a Question which he proposed to put in the House, and I telegraphed to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, saying that in answering the Question I should have to refer to the two letters I had received from him. I received in reply this telegram—"Good; but see my letter of to-day." The letter of the hon. Member was couched in the same terms as his letter to the hon. Member for East Bradford. It stated that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton would be unable to be in his place in the House; but as I proposed only to read the communications I had received from the hon. Member himself and to explain the matter, as the credit of the Department was at stake, and seeing that unless an answer was made at once none could be given until 72 hours afterwards, I felt perfectly justified in reading the letters I had received from the hon. Member. One word more. The hon. Gentleman has referred to what I had supposed to be an enclosure in his letter—namely, a communication from Mr. Burdett. I did not see the letter from Mr. Burdett in opening the letter of the hon. Gentleman on Monday night; but it was given to me on the Tuesday morning with the papers I had given to my secretary on the previous evening. Finding that the letter of Mr. Burdett tallied with that part of the communication of the hon. Gentleman in which he stated that he had given a copy of the evidence to a friend, I came to the conclusion that he had enclosed the letter of Mr. Burdett in confirmation of his statement that he had entrusted the copy of the evidence to a friend and had not sent it to The Times. It is a singular coincidence that that letter should have come into my hands. It does, however, appear that the letter had been dropped in the room of my private secretary, and being found by a messenger, was placed on the top of the letters given by me to my private secretary. In that way the whole matter is explained. I felt justified, in the interest of a Public Department, whose conduct, as I have already stated, was reflected upon by the publication of this confidential document, in taking the earliest opportunity to set the matter right with the public as to how it had occurred, and it was impossible to do so without reading the letters of the hon. Member. I regret that there should have been any misapprehension in the matter, and I regret that the hon. Gentleman should have felt aggrieved in regard to it; but I submit myself to the judgment of the House, and I maintain that what I did was right and proper in the circumstances of the case.

Sir William Plowden

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE NAVY ESTIMATES.

In reply to Dr. CAMERON (Glasgow, College),

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, it was proposed to take the Naval Estimates and the Supplementary Naval Estimates afterwards on Monday evening.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, AND THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1885—THE EVIDENCE.

The following Question stood on the Notice Paper in the name of Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N):—To ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If he can explain why the evidence of the Royal Commission on the Irish Land Question, presided over by Lord Cowper, contains, as if from four witnesses, a series of statements headed "Anonymous;" and, is there any precedent for evidence to be received or published by a Royal Commission from witnesses unwilling to give their names?

MR. T. M. HEALY said: The authorities of the House being unable to place upon the Paper the Question that I desired to put, I decline to put this Question.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLETT (Rochester) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to prosecute any official or employé of the Government who, either by the Royal Commissions or Committees now sitting, have recently sat, or may sit at any time in the future, to investigate matters connected with arms, stores, &c. in connection with the Military and Naval Departments of the State, or by any other means, may be found guilty of betrayal of trust in receiving payment in money or kind from contractors or others for disclosing or parting with, without high authority, plans, tracings, designs, and information generally of a most confidential character relating to Government or to Government workshops?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I understand the Question of my hon. and gallant Friend to be an inquiry whether the Government will use any powers the law may give them to punish breach of trust, fraud, or corruption in a public servant, or in any persons in relation to Public Departments over whom they have control; and my answer is that in all cases of the kind in which the law gives power to punish that power will be rigorously exercised.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): If the law is inadequate, will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to strengthen it?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I will certainly undertake that the subject shall be carefully examined into.

MERCHANDISE MARKS ACTS CONSOLIDATION.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If, with a view to expediting legislation to restrain the fraudulent marking of merchandise, he will grant facilities for the strictly formal Second Reading of the Merchandise Marks Act (1862) Amendment Bill and the Merchandise (Fraudulent Marks) Bill, and assent to their being referred to a Select Committee, with power to take evidence, together with the proposed Merchandise Marks Acts Consolidation Bill?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): If the House will adopt the course suggested by my hon. Friend I shall be exceedingly glad to afford all the facilities in my power, on the understanding that opportunity will be afforded for discussion on a later stage of the measure.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, AND THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1885—MR. KNIPE'S REPORT.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What is the explanation of the delay in presenting Mr. Knipe's Report to Members, and when it will be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The hon. Gentleman asks me what is the reason of the delay in presenting Mr. Knipe's Report to Members. My answer is that the fact that Mr. Knipe dissented from the Report of the other Commissioners would, I think, lead to some delay in the presentation of his Report, a delay for which Her Majesty's Government are in no way responsible, and with which they had nothing to do.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): When may we expect to have the Report?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I believe it is in print, but I am not able to say positively when it will be presented.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (RULES OF PROCEDURE)—RULE 1 (CLOSURE OF DEBATE).—RESOLUTION.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [ELEVENTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Amendment proposed to the Main Question, as amended.

"That, after a Question has been proposed, a Member rising in his place may claim to move, 'That the Question be now put,' and, unless it shall appear to the Chair that such Motion is an abuse of the Rules of the House, or an infringement of the rights of the minority, the Question, 'That the Question be now put,' shall be put forthwith, and decided without Amendment or Debate:

"When the Motion 'That the Question be now put,' has been carried, and the Question consequent thereon has been decided, any further Motion may be made (the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld) which may be requisite to bring to a decision any Question already proposed from the Chair; and also if a Clause be then under consideration, a Motion may be made (with the consent of the Chair as aforesaid) That the Question, That the Clause stand part of, or be added to the Bill, be now put. Such Motions shall be put forthwith, and decided without Amendment or Debate:

"Provided always, That Questions for the Closure of Debate shall not be decided in the affirmative, if a Division be taken, unless it shall appear by the numbers declared from the Chair, that such Motion was supported by more than Two Hundred Members, or was opposed by less than Forty Members, and supported by more than One Hundred Members."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

And which Amendment was, in line 9, to leave out after the word "Chair," to the word "such," in line 11.—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question again proposed, "That the words 'and also if a Clause be then under consideration' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): I desire to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), proposing to leave out the words—the object professed to be aimed at being to secure that substantial Amendments in Committee of the Whole House may not be shut out by the application of the closure. The principle for which the Irish Nationalist Party are contending in supporting the Amendment is that we refuse to trust either the Chair or a majority of the House when the passions of the House are excited. The right to move Amendments was not taken away from the Irish Members even in those days when the Irish minority was much smaller than it is now—in those days when it consisted of only 26 or 27 Members, when great urgency was pleaded, and when a state of semi-revolution prevailed in Ireland. It was not even taken away from the Irish Opposition by the Liberal Party at the time when they were introducing their first two Coercion Acts. Those Coercion Acts were carried, and admittedly carried, under Rules of Urgency which are different from the proposed clôture or any Rules that have ever been proposed in this House. Under the Rules of Urgency, it was left to us to do what we shall be prevented from doing by the Rule now proposed, and that, notwithstanding that the former Rules were much more stringent than anything that has been since suggested. It was left to us to put Amendments on the Paper, and to have them formally put from the Chair and decided by a Division. That right is now to be taken away, and it will not, under the proposed Rule, be in the power of a Member to move an Amendment himself or to have a decision formally pronounced upon it. Now what does this mean? Why, the Chairman of Committees, who will be an ordinary Member of the House and a political partizan, will not be likely to refuse a Minister permission to move the clôture; and we shall have questions put, without a word of argument or explanation, which will prevent the putting of a single one of any of the Amendments to a clause of a Bill. The Rule, as it stands, means the transfer from the Members of the House of Commons to the Leader of the House, for the time being, the functions of proposing and passing any Bill he chooses to bring forward without alteration. We cannot trust to the sense of fairness of a Conservative Administration when dealing with an Irish question. In the case of an English Bill, hon. Members would understand the merits of an Amendment, and would be influenced by that understanding as to whether or not they would allow the Amendment to be squashed. On the eve of a Coercion

"And also if a Clause be then under consideration, a Motion may be made (with the consent of the Chair as aforesaid) That the Question, 'That the Clause stand part of, or be added to the Bill,' be now put;"

Bill, it is positively indecent—nay, more, it is an outrage—for the Government, with an eye to that Coercion Bill only, to ask the House of Commons to pass a Rule containing such a provision as this. The Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) will not help minorities in the slightest degree. It leaves the position of the minority unaltered; nay, it leaves the position of the minority worse—in fact, infinitely worse—because it enables the majority to save an Amendment from the operation of the Rule, while it leaves the minority exactly as it is now. I think I have shown that the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale does not meet the question from the point of view of the protection of the minority. It may meet the question from the point of view of the majority, but it does not touch the question which we have raised by our Amendment. I am surprised that a better production than this miserable Amendment has not been forthcoming; at all events, it does not meet the objection which we urged to the operation of the Rule. In these circumstances, I cannot advise my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast to withdraw the Amendment he has moved. I would urge my hon. Friend still to persevere with his Amendment, and to go to a Division upon it. It will also be the duty of the Irish Members to move an Amendment to that of the noble Lord, when, in its turn, it comes to be proposed, with the object of providing that it should be a satisfactory compromise with reference to the question as a whole; so that the minority shall not be left in the naked and defenceless condition now proposed. Even at the cost of incurring the charge of reiteration, I cannot help repeating that the Rule, as it stands, is more stringent and more oppressive than the Rule of Urgency under which Amendments were ordered to be put at a certain hour without debate, and divided upon by the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think we have some reason to complain, in reference to this matter, of the conduct of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale. The noble Lord was Chairman of the Committee which considered the Rules of Procedure, and he, in conjunction with the Government, has proposed, for the first time in the history of the House, that Amendments put upon the Paper should be disposed of, not according to their merits, but with reference to previous Amendments, with which they have nothing whatever to do and with which they can have no possible connection. I think it rather too bad that a proposal so extraordinary in its nature as that should have been placed on the Paper by the Government, and that a strong Committee of 40 or 50 Members which sat on the question of Procedure—one of the largest Committees which ever sat—should have been befuddled and had its time wasted, under the Presidency of the noble Lord, when the main Rule to which I and my hon. Friends take exception was never brought under its consideration at all. I think that to have asked four Irish Members to sit on that Committee and waste their time in attendance on it for months, under the delusion that they were co-operating with the noble Lord, who is really the Prime Minister of England at this moment, is not in accordance with that fair treatment which the Irish Party have a right to expect. I should like to call the attention of the House to the exact effect of the Amendment if it is adopted by the House. I hold in my hand the Amendments that were proposed to a single clause—the 7th, now 18th—of the Irish Land Act. It was the Fair Rent Clause, and I would ask the House if it can guess how many Amendments were put down to that clause. There were no less than 132; so that, if this Amendment is adopted, the Government, to use the happy phrase of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), will be able to “squash” 132 Amendments at one blow. These Amendments, be it remembered, were not the entire Amendments put down to a Bill, but to a single clause of a Bill, and they wound up with a proposal by the present Chief Secretary for Ireland to omit the clause altogether. The right hon. Gentleman will have an ample opportunity of explaining his action in the matter later on. I ask the House, would it have been decent when there was an important Bill of that character before the House—so important that hon. Members had considered it not only reasonable but necessary to put down 132 Amendments to a single clause—would it have been decent or proper to have swept away the whole of those Amendments by applying the cloture? I am afraid that there are very few Members outside the Government on the opposite of the House, except, perhaps, the right hon. Member for North Hants (Mr. Selater-Booth), the right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), and one or two Gentlemen who have had experience in the Chair—with those exceptions, I do not believe there is a single Member opposite who understands the Rule. If there is, I challenge him to get up and explain what its effect will be. It seems to me that the Government do not really intend to make this Rule, except so far as a Coercion Act is concerned, part of the permanent legislation of the House, for, in spite of our taunts and entreaties, they have given no indication of their intention to make the proposal a Standing Order of the House. It is evidently framed with an eye to a Coercion Bill, and a Coercion Bill alone. We have repeatedly asked the First Lord of the Treasury if he intends the Rule as a serious proposal, and if he did, then to put it down as a Standing Order. We remember very well what Lord Salisbury said last year in regard to the government of Ireland—namely, that it must be governed for 20 years by a drastic system of coercion. As an illustration of the manner in which the Bill may work, let me cite what occurred some years ago in reference to a measure which had no immediate connection with Ireland. I see the Chairman of Committees in his place, and I should like to ask him, in reference to the illustration I am about to give, in what way the minority would have been protected on that occasion, if this Rule had been in existence? The Bill to which I refer was the Prison Discipline Bill of Mr. Forster, and my hon. Friend the Member for Cork moved numerous Amendments to the clauses of that Bill. The House at that time was impatient, and if the Irish Members had not possessed the right—which then existed—of debating the Amendments, there can be no doubt, having regard to the spirit which prevailed at that time, it would have been very difficult to have obtained the least consideration for prisoners. In a future Bill of a similar nature, it may be proposed to give the prisoners hard labour and solitary confinement, and the Irish Members, in order to mitigate the lot of these men, might submit various propositions, such as heating the prisoners' cells. If this Rule is passed, the Chairman would be able to step in and say that Amendments proposed with a view of alleviating the condition of the prisoners were frivolous, on the ground that they might be dealt with by the existing Prison Rules, and the Government would be able to weather the Cape of Good Hope by applying the clôture to some previous Amendment, thereby preventing all subsequent Amendments from being considered. We have heard a great deal from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire as to his horror of clôture; but has any hon. Member ever discussed in the country the proposal of applying clôture to the Amendments that have been proposed? The strangling of children in their birth is a well-known operation; but to strangle them in the womb is very different. The clôture, as proposed by the Government, was intended to kill the child while young; but now it is proposed to kill it off before it can make its appearance, by machinery that was never even dreamt of by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill). May I ask what is the intention of Members of the Liberal Party in consenting to act as bonnets for the Government? Are they not able to realize that Amendments before they have been proposed are to be killed still-born by this newly-invented machine, which is not the clôture, but something which has never hitherto been defined, even in the copious vocabulary of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire. Having taken the whole day on Wednesday to knock into the heads of the Government some idea of our views, and having been met by them with a non possumus, it is remarkable that the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale should have been so struck with the justice of the view taken by the Irish Members as to rise at the end of the Sitting and say that something ought to be done to meet our objections. And now we see that the something he proposes to meet our objections is the Amendment we now see on the Paper. As long as the clôture does not exist, in spite of the protests of the hon. Member for Peckham or Camberwell

[Eleventh Night.]

Mr. T. M. Healy

(Mr. Baumann)—or some classic region of that description—whose young and ingenuous mind desired to have the New Rule enforced on Tuesday without further discussion, I think there is something of value in what the Irish Members said after all. After four hours' discussion, we did contrive to penetrate the intelligence of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, and induce him to consider the reasonableness of our objections. Unfortunately, the proposal which the noble Lord makes is, in our opinion, more unreasonable and much more mischievous than the original proposal of the Government. What the noble Lord proposes is, "That certain words of the clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause." That, as it appears to me, would leave the matter in a worse position than before.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member is not entitled to discuss the words of another Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I have no desire to discuss the words of the noble Lord's Amendment. It might be reasonable, in the case of a Coercion Bill, to discuss such an Amendment; but I maintain that to allow the Government to pick out particular Amendments, and apply the clôture to them, is a worse proposal than the original one of the Government. The least privilege which the smallest Member of the House should be allowed to enjoy is that he should have the power of placing Amendments on the Paper—practical Amendments—and to ask the judgment of the House upon them. Surely that is not too much for any hon. Member to ask. I say that, manage it as you like, whether by the intervention of the Chair, or by a Member rising in his place, you only allow particular Members to propose Amendments, such as the Prime Minister, or a Colonel of Volunteers—the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) need not suppose that I allude to him, for I am not aware whether he is a Colonel of Volunteers, or Yeomanry, or Militia—but if the House will only allow such Members as I have mentioned to propose Amendments, and refuse the same privilege to other Members, a most unfortunate result will, in my opinion, be produced. It may or may not have been reasonable, in a moment of emergency, to propose to kill off each Amendment by a Division, and rather than have this Rule, I would prefer the liberty which existed under the Rules of Urgency. Let us have the power of taking the decision of the House upon Amendments, or otherwise there will be an end of the freedom of proposing Amendments. If you allow the Government to pick out particular Amendments, you will heavily handicap some hon. Members, and give a superabundance of favouritism to others. The proposal made by the noble Lord of putting power into the hands of the Chair to say such an Amendment is frivolous, while such other Amendments may be discussed, is one which is foreign, not only to the genius and traditions of this Assembly; but if you allow a proposal of that kind to exclude, by a side-wind, genuine Amendments submitted by other Members because you imagine it is desirable to bring a debate on some small matter to a close, you will do irreparable injury to the freedom of debate. As I have already said, I believe that the Government, having abstained from making this Rule a Standing Order, really intend that it should apply to the Coercion Bill for Ireland which they are about to introduce. They do not mean to embody it in the Rules as a general Rule, because they are fully aware that if they did so they would be cutting a rod with which to beat their own backs by-and-bye.

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingwinford): The hon. Member has done Members sitting on this side of the House scant justice when he stated that none of us have studied the Rule.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I admitted that there are a few who have, who understand it.

MR. STAVELEY HILL: It is not a few only who have taken the trouble to understand the Rule, or who agree with much that has fallen from the hon. Member. I have myself always been opposed to these Closure Rules. Such questions are not to be looked upon as Party questions; and when I have given way I have only done so in deference to the opinion of hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House who have considered that such Rules are necessary for the effective protection of orderly debate in this House. So far I have yielded; but here is a point at which I think I ought to stop. I do not see why, when the clôture has been applied to the Amendments to one part of a clause, we should be compelled to swallow the rest of the clause without amendment. As Bills are now drafted they contain clauses, each of which may have six, eight, ten, and sometimes a score of sub-sections. Let me take the Army Discipline Act. In that Act we have enormous clauses full of sub-sections; and the same remark is applicable to many other Acts of Parliament. In the Naval Discipline Act all the punishments are contained in sub-sections. Suppose that the first sub-section had been the one which involved the infliction of corporal punishment. We might have had the debate ruled to be obstructive, and the closure might have been applied to it after it had reached a certain stage. It would, then, have been possible for the Government to have passed all the remaining 19 sub-sections without discussion. To such a closure I will never consent; and I think, if we pass it, we shall be giving up a very large slice of our liberty. Many hon. Members on this side of the House have carefully considered this Closure Rule. We are prepared to accept it where it is possible; but I do hope that the Government will find a way of putting in stronger words than any I see at present to limit the actions of the Rule. If not, I hope that it will be resisted by the House.

MR. SOLATER - BOOTH (Hants, Basingstoke): I have endeavoured to frame words to provide that all Amendments should be disposed of in their turn, but not necessarily debated; but I am told by you, Sir, that if the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), which is now before the House, is negatived, I shall be unable to move my Amendment, which will be ruled out. I have, therefore, nothing to fall back upon but the Amendment of the noble Marquess. I would ask the Government whether something more than the Amendment of the noble Marquess is not required to meet my views, and also the case which has been mentioned by the hon. Member who has just spoken? The Amendment of the noble Marquess seems to imply that a private Member should be invested with the functions of the Chairman of Committees for the time being, for it would be in his power to say what Amendment should be put. He is to frame certain words to limit the extent to which the closure is to be applied; but that is essentially the function of the Chair, and by the Amendment we have already made the Speaker or the Chairman is to be limited, as regards his part in the matter, to a mere veto.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Mr. SEXTON (West Belfast): Upon a point of Order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask if the right hon. Gentleman is right in saying that, if my Amendment is negatived, he will not be in a position to move the Amendment which he has placed on the Paper? The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman comes after the word "consideration," which I propose to omit.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is very true; but the Amendment of the hon. Member is to leave out the words—

"And also if a Clause be then under consideration, a Motion may be made (with the consent of the Chair) as aforesaid, That the Question, 'That the Clause stand part of or be added to the Bill,' be now put."

If the House negatives that Amendment, they will have affirmed that these words shall remain in the Rule; and the next Amendment in order will be that of the noble Marquess, which proposes to provide a machinery for avoiding an evil which has been generally recognized by the House. The two Amendments which follow that of the hon. Member for Belfast will be clearly out of Order.

Mr. SEXTON: Then I understand that after the word "consideration" nothing more can be moved?

Mr. SPEAKER: The Amendment of the hon. Gentleman is directed to the same point as that which is dealt with in the two Amendments which follow.

Mr. PARNELL: The Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast seeks to provide that the closure shall not be applied to the consideration of an entire clause.

Mr. SPEAKER: The whole point is, whether the closure, on being applied, will prevent subsequent Amendments—what may be called "bogus Amendments"—coming in. The whole question is whether, upon the closure being applied, such Amendments will not be ruled out.

Mr. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I am anxious to follow the appeal which has been made to the House by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill), not to adopt that part of the Rule in question as proposed by the Government. The view I take of the matter is that the power of closure should be made as large as possible; but the closure and the exclusion of debate are two very different things, and the words of the Rule go a great deal further than closure. It is an important point whether, under the terms of the Rule, as it at present exists, real, substantial, and important Amendments would not be involved in the disposal of frivolous Amendments by the application of the closure. While I would go as far as possible in urging the House to adopt the purest and simplest form of closure, I am not prepared to grant the power of exclusion; and the Rule, if adopted, would not only give the power to close debate, but to exclude it. Under the first part of the Rule it would be in the power of any Member to initiate a Motion that the closure should be applied with a power of vetoing given to the Speaker. But these words go a great deal further, because they empower not only the closure of debate, but its exclusion altogether. I am anxious to make that point quite clear to the House. I am prepared to say close a debate by all means if it is considered necessary to do so, and I would give extreme power to do that; but I must remind the House that to exclude even the possibility of putting the Question is not done by any Foreign or Colonial Assembly where the closure is now applied. The closure is never used to prevent a question being raised. It should be applied in order to prevent Amendments of an absurd and frivolous character which are only brought forward for the sake of obstructing debate from being discussed. No one who voted for the proposal that the Chair should interfere to prevent the abuse of the Rules of the House would agree to sanction Amendments which would also involve an abuse of the Forms of the House. It is quite clear what our course upon that matter ought to be. As was pointed out by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill), we have Bills drafted now-a-days in which there are clauses of two or three pages containing some 15 or 20 sub-sections, each of which, sometimes, has sub-divisions. The effect of the Rule, as it stands, would put it in the power of any Member to prevent Amendments in subsequent sub-sections from being discussed unless the Chair vetoed closure on an Amendment on the first sub-section.

[Eleventh Night.]

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: No; the Chair must not veto.

MR. CHILDERS: I accept the correction. Power would be given to the Chair to exclude a discussion upon every one of the sub-sections after the first Amendment. The hon. and learned Gentleman specially referred to a Bill which was under consideration some years ago—I think the Army Bill. That Bill contained a clause which dealt with the question of flogging in the Army. I recollect that there was a long and animated debate upon the clause which, and I think not unreasonably, was carried over one or two nights. Now, what would have been thought if it had been in the power of any hon. Member, if he were not stopped by the Chair, to have prevented any discussion from taking place on the subsequent sub-sections? Yet that is the power which is proposed to be given under this Rule. It is no answer to say that the power given will not be abused, or that the Chair will always take a reasonable view of the case put before it. I would give the Speaker and Chairman the fullest latitude that may be proposed to be given to them with respect of closure. This, however, is not the power of closure; but you propose, in the event of the first line of a clause being objected to and closed, to give them the power of excluding from debate a number of questions which may be of the greatest possible importance. I should object to give a power of closure, in regard to one Amendment, which would have the effect of excluding debate upon other Amendments not of an obstructive character. The power of excluding every Amendment would be an abuse of the Forms of the House. To that extent I go fully with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Staffordshire, and I do not think that anyone on these Benches would desire such a power to be given, no matter to whom it is proposed to give it—whether an individual Member, or the Chair. I object to give to any individual the power of saying that “this or that proposal shall not go before the House,” or to say “a Motion for Closure has been made, and by my authority under the Rules I will allow that Motion to exclude the consideration of other genuine Amendments altogether.” Therefore, while consenting to carry out a stringent measure of closure, I appeal to the Government not to force the Rule, as it at present stands, or to compel the House to adopt the words as they are now proposed by my right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith), or by my noble Friend on this Bench (the Marquess of Hartington); but to use their best endeavour to find some form of words which may prevent the closure from being applied to genuine and important Amendments, though a previous Amendment has been closed.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House is not able to answer the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say a word. As far as I understand the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, it comes to this. He says—“Your proposal amounts to a proposal for the exclusion of debate.” No doubt it does amount to the exclusion of debate upon frivolous and obstructive Amendments.

MR. SEXTON: All Amendments.

MR. RITCHIE: The right hon. Gentleman says that he would give power to the Speaker or the Chairman of Committees to rule frivolous Amendments out, so that he does not object, under certain circumstances, to a power being given for the exclusion of debate on frivolous Amendments. The right hon. Gentleman proposes that there should be a power vested in the Speaker and Chairman of Committees to say that certain Amendments are frivolous and obstructive, and that they will not be put. Now, what difference is there between that suggestion and the Rule as proposed by the Government—that the Chair shall have power to permit or not to permit a Motion for the closure. The right hon. Gentleman seems to forget that the power given to the Speaker and Chairman of Committees to allow a Motion for closure is qualified by the words contained in the first paragraph of the Rule “unless it shall appear to the Chair that such Motion is an abuse of the Rules of the House, or an infringement of the rights of the minority.”

Mr. Childers

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill) put a case which has also been alluded to by the right hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Childers).

MR. T. M. HEALY: I put a case also. How would you deal with the 132 Amendments which were put down on Clause 7 of the Land Act?

MR. RITCHIE: I will come to that presently. My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire spoke of a clause with 20 sub-sections in it; and he considers that it would be monstrous if the closure were exercised upon a first sub-section in such a way as to shut out all discussion upon the remaining sub-sections. As far as the Government are concerned, they agree that it would be a monstrous thing if substantial Amendments on a clause or the sub-section of a clause were excluded from discussion because the closure had been applied to a previous Amendment; but I cannot conceive for a moment that substantial Amendments would be ruled out in that way, nor can I imagine that any Speaker or any Chairman could be got to fill the Chair who would allow substantial Amendments of that character to be ruled out.

MR. SEXTON: It might be done in order to cut out somebody else.

MR. RITCHIE: We do not believe that such a circumstance could possibly arise, or that any Speaker or Chairman of Committees could be got to fill the Chair who would allow a Motion to be made for cutting out such Amendments as those alluded to by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Staffordshire. The hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) spoke of a Bill which had 132 Amendments proposed to it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: One hundred and thirty-two Amendments to one clause.

MR. RITCHIE: That, to my mind, shows the imperative necessity of some such Rule as this. If it can be conceived possible that 132 Amendments could be put down to a particular section of a Bill; is it not evident to the House that unless some step is taken to rule out a great number of such Amendments, and unless we have some safeguard that similar obstruction shall not be practised in future, you may as well tear up the whole of this Rule? It is exactly to meet such cases as that referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Government think such a Rule is absolutely required. It would be altogether impossible for the Government to proceed with the Public Business if they allowed hon. Members to put down 132 Amendments to a particular clause, and were to detain the House for nights and weeks in the discussion of them. The long and the short of it is—that the Government feel that the real safeguard, in this matter, must rest with the Speaker or the Chairman. We have the utmost confidence that the Speaker or the Chairman will consider it his absolute duty, in carrying out the instructions of the House, to protect the rights of the minority and to see that the Rules shall not operate so as to shut out Amendments which the House ought to consider. On the other hand, we believe that the effect of the Rule we are asking the House to assent to will be that Amendments of a serious and proper character will have much more chance of being adequately discussed than they can possibly have at the present moment. For the Government to consent to the withdrawal of this proposal would be to give up the whole value of the Rule. I was struck by one observation made by the hon. and learned Member for North Longford in reference to the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale. My recollection of the circumstances under which the noble Lord gave notice of that Amendment was, that it had been pointed out by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on the other side of the House, that under the Rule, as it originally stood, the Chairman would not have any option, if the closure was moved on the first Amendment, but either to refuse to put the closure or to put the whole clause. The hon. and learned Member for Longford says that the noble Lord admitted the reasonableness of the proposals of the Irish Members. No doubt there might be a good deal of objection taken to the Rule as it originally stood, and it was generally admitted that the objections which were urged were of a reasonable character. Strange to say, it is now stated that the Amendment of the noble Lord makes the Rule worse. How could that be, seeing that the Amendment will distinctly limit the power conferred by the Rule? The noble Lord's Amendment will remove all reasonable objection, and it is believed that the Rule, as thus limited, will secure adequate freedom of debate for every Amendment the House desires to consider and decide upon. But, on the other hand, Amendments calculated to waste the time of the House will be ruled out; but the House will be able to discuss all other Amendments in a complete and adequate manner.

[Eleventh Night.]

Ms. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I still hope that the Government will consider the representations which have been made to them, especially when those representations have proceeded from hon. Members of great experience on both sides of the House. The uncompromising speech, just made on the part of the Government increases the objection of hon. Members who sit on these Benches to oppose the Rule. The proposal now before the House is one of the most monstrous that has ever been submitted to a deliberative assembly. The importance of assenting to the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) is still greater after the ruling of the Speaker in reference to the Amendments which follow it on the Paper, because if this Amendment is rejected, the proposition of the Government in all its naked deformity will be obliged to be passed as part of the machinery of the Rules. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) how a Chairman, no matter how impartial he may be and how willing to uphold the rights of the minority, if a Member gets up to move a series of Amendments; how can he, in such a case as that which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. Healy) referred to when 132 Amendments were proposed to a single clause of the Irish Land Bill—no matter how able and how impartial he may be disposed to be, and however anxious to maintain the rights of minorities—how can he separate the chaff from the wheat? I contend that it is a position in which the Speaker or Chairman of Committees of this House ought not to be placed. If this Rule is passed, a Member of the Government, with a large majority behind him, may be found getting up, when angry passions have been excited, to call upon the Chair to enforce the closure, and the Chair, although giving a decision which the occupant of the Chair believes to be perfectly right and just, may find that his decision is most unsatisfactory to a large minority in the House. As a Member of the Irish Party, I tell the Government that their conduct in making such a proposal as this, and their refraining from converting it into a Standing Order of the House, although persistently sticking to the proposition itself, is capable of but one interpretation, and that it points to but one purpose—namely, that it has been introduced in order to enable them to rush a Coercion Bill, directed against Ireland, through this House. I join in the challenge which has been given to Her Majesty's Government to make this Rule a Standing Order of the House; but I am afraid they will not dare to do so, for fear of the consequences to themselves when they may happen to be in Opposition. I trust that the Government will take into serious consideration the representations which have been made to them, and will make some effort to prevent a grievous wrong from being done.

Ms. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I hope that the Government before this debate closes will give a clear and distinct intimation that substantial Amendments in the clause of a Bill will not be ruled out because the closure has been applied to an Amendment which may be moved early in the same clause. I find that in the Army Act a whole Bill, perhaps of the greatest importance, may consist of one clause only, and one single clause extends to four quarto pages. If this Rule is passed as it stands, it would be possible on the first line of that clause to shut out every Amendment that might be proposed to the rest of the clause.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I think, Sir, as there must be a power somewhere to prevent obstructive Amendments, that power must either reside in the Committee or in the Chair. That is the only alternative. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) admitted when challenged by my right hon. Friend, that he would allow the Chairman power to rule out obstructive Amendments. Well, that is giving to the Chairman alone the power which is proposed to be given to the Committee with the consent of the Chair; and the right hon. Gentleman who spoke just now has enlarged upon the possibility of the Chairman exercising his veto without all the Amendments being heard. That is in opposition to the proposal put forward by his own Party a few minutes ago. I think I have never heard a more unfortunate argument. From the general observations with which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh commenced his speech, I gathered that hon. Gentlemen opposite are in favour of giving a larger scope to the closure, but that they are not in favour of in any way enlarging or extending the authority of the Chair. But I wish to point out that if we are to have any system under which we are to exclude frivolous and obstructive Amendments, that power must be given either to the Committee or to the Chair alone, and the alternative I put to the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues is that if they are prepared to support words determining what Amendments are to be excluded or not, they will be enormously enlarging and extending the authority of the Chair, and at the same time excluding the action of the House altogether. Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to enlarge, in any such way, the powers of the Chair. This is a power which will only be exercised, after all, by a very considerable majority of the House after having obtained the consent of the Chair to put the closure. It is because of the practice which has grown up of covering the Paper with Amendments which render debate useless and nugatory, that it is necessary to adopt a strong and drastic remedy which I have sufficient confidence in the Committee and the Chair to believe will not be abused, but, on the contrary, afford protection to free debate.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I hoped when the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) rose that he would have been prepared to make some concession on the part of the Government. I understood that the First Lord of the Treasury on Wednesday admitted that the clause in its present form was not satisfactory. It would be contrary to the Rules of the House to discuss now the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington); but, on the other hand, it is difficult to do justice to this question without advertizing in some way to that Amendment. I will say, however, that I prefer having no Amendment at all to having that of the noble Lord. I agree entirely with what has fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Stafford (Mr. Staveley Hill) to the extent that I am in favour of giving power to the Committee, but I am not prepared with him to exclude Amendments as proposed by the clause as it now stands. Allusion has been made to 130 Amendments being put on the Paper in respect to one clause, but I say that in practice those Amendments would very probably run themselves out; the decision on one would shut out many others, and it is very rare that anything like the number of Amendments on the Paper are the subjects of discussion. I put this question to the House;—supposing that there are 130 Amendments on the Paper, what Chairman of Committees could by any possibility determine which of them are obstructive, and which ought to be discussed? Neither the Chairman nor the Committee could determine that. I think, Sir, we must trust to the House applying the closure not in accordance with any prescribed form, but as the case may demand. I think the House will do well to strike out these words, and unless the Government are prepared to make some further concession in this matter, I shall feel myself bound to vote with the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton).

Mr. HALDANE (Haddington): The Question before the House becomes a very serious one indeed, when we consider that, under the modern practice in Parliamentary drafting, a Bill is often moved in the form of a single clause with a number of sub-sections. This practice renders it necessary, for the effective debate of a clause, that not one, two, or 20, but it may be 200, proper and bona fide Amendments should sometimes be moved to it. I deny that any hon. Member, however skilled he may be in weaving Amendments, could put down any considerable number which would not, unless there was something substantial in them, be found to be out of Order; and in the second place, I say that there is effective machinery proposed to be provided in the latter part of these Rules to put an end to debate when that debate is obstructive.

[Eleventh Night.]

It appears to me, therefore, that the mere fact of a large number of Amendments being put on the Paper is not one which ought to make us feel that we have any serious difficulty in assenting to the proposal of the hon. Member for West Belfast. The real alternative is to have no Rules at all—to leave everything to the discretion of the Chairman. The fact that we have Rules, and that we are taking care to amend them—that the principle is laid down on which the Speaker should act—shows the general principle on which we ought to proceed. If we were to accept the proposal of the noble Marquess, we should be at the mercy of anyone who chooses to make a Motion for the closure; but it seems to me that the proposal of the hon. Member for Belfast is the one which, of all that have been put before the House, is attended with the least amount of evil. For these reasons, I am not prepared to accept the proposal of the Government.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Penryn and Falmouth): I have had a position in this House, by the favour of my constituents, for a considerable number of years, and I suppose there is no Member who has more strongly supported the rights of minorities than I have myself. I confess that I have felt some difficulty as to the way in which I should vote. I think the proposal of the Government is open to very serious objections; still I think those objections are in a great measure obviated by the Amendment lower down on the Paper, which is to be moved by my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), and which will, no doubt, be discussed in due order. I venture to state my conviction that if the Amendment of the noble Lord is adopted by the House, it will in a great measure relieve us from the difficulty which surrounds us in respect of this Question. If I am assured by my right hon. Friend on the Treasury Bench that this course will be followed, I shall feel it my duty, on this occasion, to support the Government, and to vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member who sits below the Gangway.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I do not think that much light has been thrown on this subject by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General. It is impossible for the Chair to decide what Amendments are fictitious and what are substantial, and I think a most instructive commentary on the entire proceedings, which ought to make all Members support this Amendment, is the bare fact that all day on Wednesday Members on these Benches spoke in favour of it, and it was not until the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) awoke out of his sleep at 4 o'clock on that day, and discovered that there was something in the point that was being urged, that the Government themselves woke up to the idea that possibly there might be some value in the suggestions which came from this side of the House. Our contention is that it passes the power of the Speaker, or the Chairman, to decide on the genuineness of Amendments until the House has had an opportunity of hearing what can be said in favour of them. Take the case of a Bill dealing with Irish Fisheries, or, if you like, a Coercion Bill, and let hon. Members ask themselves whether the Chairman of Committees can form any idea of their nature until the Proposers of the Amendment, which would certainly depend upon an intimate knowledge of the facts, had explained them to the House? Take, again, the Labourers' (Ireland) Act of 1883. Amendments were proposed to the provisions of the Government by Irish Members, who knew the conditions under which the labourers lived, who knew exactly how far the Act ought to go, and in what direction it ought to tend; what kind of houses, how much land ought to be allotted to the labourers, and what were the best means by which the local authorities could carry out the intentions of the Act. Well, Sir, if the closure had been applied to the Amendments which stood to that Bill, it would have been impossible to carry any of the important alterations that we made in the Act. If that be true of the Act of 1883, it is true in a very much stronger degree of the Act of 1885, which was an enlargement of the former Act, and a considerable improvement upon it; but all the valuable work that was done with regard to that Act in this House and in Committee would have been lost to the labourers of Ireland if the closure had been applied to the Amendments and new Clauses that were moved to the Bill. If an Irish Coercion Bill is brought in by the Government, I contend that it ought to be in the power of Irish Members to point out where it will fail in effecting its object, where it would inflict hardship, or subject localities to unfair and oppressive taxation, and also to move the necessary Amendments in its provisions; but, as has been over and over again pointed out, the proposed Rule will debar us from the opportunity of doing so. I think we have ample indication of the value which is attached to the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast on the Government side of the House. That Amendment ought, in my judgment, to be accepted by this House; and we shall do all in our power to press it on the attention of the Government.

MR. SALT (Stafford): The point before the House is one of considerable importance and interest; it is one, also, which illustrates the very great difficulty of introducing Rules of Procedure. These Rules are the embodiment in words of the power of the House to keep its own order. In the old days, the keeper of order and the rules of decency in debate was the House itself; but the introduction of these Rules shows that something more is wanted than the voice of the House. There must be a power somewhere to deal with the difficulty that has arisen; and if it is not to rest in the House itself, I see no alternative but to put very great power in the hands of the Chair. I confess that I see a difficulty in the words which we have been discussing, and my mind has been very much exercised as to whether I can support them. The whole House agrees in this—that, while they are anxious to retain for discussion any good and useful Amendments to a Bill, it desires, at the same time, summarily to exclude those which are frivolous and useless. That, Sir, is the problem which we have to solve. I do not think there is any real danger of the closure being abused. In the first place, a Member would have to move the closure; and I think we may safely assume that there are not many Members of the House who would move the closure to any clause or Amendment until there were good grounds for doing so. Such a Motion can only be put by the consent of the Speaker. If such a Motion is asked for, the Speaker has his veto, and in that we have the second safeguard to free discussion. The third safeguard is that, if the Motion be unwise, it is in the hands of the House to reject the Motion when it is put. I acknowledge that I have had considerable difficulty in this matter; but I have come to the conclusion that the plan proposed is proper to deal with frivolous and foolish Amendments; and, therefore, having given the matter fair consideration, I shall support Her Majesty's Government on the Division.

MR. SEXTON (West Belfast): Sir, after the discussion which has taken place, I think, perhaps, that it would be for the advantage of the further consideration of this question that I should ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER: Is it your pleasure that the Amendment be withdrawn? ["No, no!"]

MR. T. P. GILL (Louth, S.): The right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General has said there may be 130 Amendments to a clause placed upon the Paper which may occupy several days in discussion; but if those Amendments are proper to propose, why should not their discussion occupy several days? Is the House, which is supposed to give a free amount of discussion to every question which it decides, to be reduced to the necessity of giving to the Leader of the House everything he may ask for at once? The whole argument of the Government throughout this discussion has been that the Rules must be accepted because it is their will that they should be accepted. It is put in the power of the majority to say whether it wants to have a certain Motion debated or not, and if the opposition to a Motion rises to a point at which the majority consider that it has gone far enough, they may put an end to it by the closure. It is all very well for the Postmaster General to say that the Chairman of Committees will decide what Amendments are frivolous and unnecessary; but that, Sir, is assuming omniscience for the Chair, which I do not think any Member of the House has a right to assume. Suppose the Bill in Committee is one which deals with technical matters of an exclusive character, the knowledge of which is confined to specialists—suppose, for instance, that the Chairman of Committees has to decide as to whether or not an Amendment relating to mining is frivolous or useless; I say that the Chairman of Ways and Means would, in all probability, not be able to say that any Amendment of the kind, although it might seem to him frivolous, was useless. You are assuming that the Chairman of Ways and Means is to take upon himself the collective knowledge of the whole House, and decide upon questions which are beyond his knowledge. It will, in fact, come to this: that he will assume that every Amendment is frivolous which he does not understand. That, I venture to say, is a most absurd position in which to put the Chairman, and it is giving him a power which will destroy the efficacy of debate and legislation; and I venture to think that from it the greatest amount of trouble will arise. I am sorry that the Government have not allowed my hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment, and allow others to be proposed which would enable a modification of this clause to be arrived at. I think it is, therefore, our duty to carry this matter to an issue, and discuss it, as far as possible, with the view of convincing those Members of the House who are open to reason. I think we ought to offer every opposition to this particular clause, which strikes at the whole power of the House to amend Bills which are favoured by the majority. I point out that not one substantial Amendment has been adopted by the Government in regard to this Rule which has come from this side of the House. Over and over again has the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House begun his speech with the words—"The hon. Member knows very well that this Amendment cannot be carried." Well, Sir, that is exactly what the majority will always say; they will ask what use there can be in argument, when they have made up their mind? When you become habituated to this state of things, the Government of the day will more and more resort to this method of legislation, and you will have discussion in this House reduced to mere idleness, for everybody who speaks will be regarded as a waster of time. I certainly deprecate the action of the Government with regard to this Amendment. They have to-night broken faith as to what they stated on Wednesday afternoon; and now they will not allow us to withdraw our Amendment, so as not to prejudice the Amendment which stands on the Paper in the name of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale. I protest, in every sense, against the action of the Government, and shall certainly support my hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) if he goes to a Division.

[Eleventh Night.]

Mr. T. P. Gill

MR. P. McDONALD (Sligo, N.): I am pleased to see, by the speeches that have been made by hon. Gentlemen above and below the Gangway opposite, that freedom of discussion has not yet entirely left this House. I have the utmost confidence in the judgment of the Chairman of Committees, and believe that he acts justly and judiciously on all occasions; but it is a very difficult thing to believe that he will be able to act in the same way when he is suddenly called upon to act with regard to Amendments which are of a technical nature. It is often the case that Amendments are put down by lawyers, and that the words on the Paper, which may appear very insignificant, may have a very great importance when explained by the Mover. Under those circumstances, it would not be possible for the Chairman to decide whether such an Amendment ought to be put from the Chair. Again, the essence of a Bill very often lies not in itself, but in the Amendments that have been made in it. We have had many Bills passed through the House relating to Ireland, and I particularly look back on the Land Bill and the last Coercion Bill, to the latter of which there were 130 Amendments put down, all of them being of importance. I am not prepared to see debate on similar Amendments shut out in future without a protest, and for that reason I am strongly in favour of the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton).

Question put, "That the words 'and also if a Clause be then under consideration' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 154; Noes 95: Majority 59.—(Div. List, No. 58.)

Amendment proposed,

In line 10, leave out "with the consent of the Chair, as aforesaid," and insert the words "the assent of the Chair, as aforesaid, not having been withheld."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The consent of the Chair has now become a matter of very great importance, and I should like to know why the Government are continually recurring to the words proposed, against which I have many times protested? I think it is desirable that the consent of the Speaker should be retained. A man may signify his assent; but how is it possible for him to signify his dissent in the way proposed by the Government? For my part, I am opposed to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, because, instead of saving the time of the House, it will cause waste of time. Looking at the serious nature of the subject we are upon, I think that the least we can expect from the Chair is a declaration of assent, and I suggest that words should be put down to show that that is your decision. I think the consequences of putting down that the Chairman shall do this thing if he does not object will be most disastrous. Therefore I think that there ought to be a record of the action of the Chairman affirmatively, and not negatively. This House is largely guided by precedent and by the rulings of the Speaker and Chairman of Committees, and in the way I suggest there would always be a report of them in Hansard. The volumes of Hansard are always accessible, and we shall, for our guidance, be able to look to them for the rulings of the Speaker and Chairman on certain occasions. But that would not be the case if they remain silent, and so we should have nothing to guide us. It has already become difficult to contrive Amendments that shall be secure against what I may call the clôture of the Chair; but in future the difficulty would be met, to some extent, if we had an opportunity of knowing on what ground we were proceeding. It is much safer for the Government that we should have enshrined on the pages of Hansard the distinct grounds and reasons for every decision or ruling of the Chair, rather than that the clôture should be applied simply upon the Chair's non-expression of dissent. I certainly have come to the conclusion that this Rule is not intended to be a permanent Rule of the House, but is only proposed in view of the Irish Coercion Bill.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I did not rise to explain this Amendment, because it seemed to me to explain itself. The House has declared that when the Speaker is in the Chair "the assent of the Chair as aforesaid" shall be necessary to the Motion being put, and it would be very unreasonable to have another set of words relating to the putting of the Motion when the Chairman is in the Chair. I cannot think it is necessary to provide that the Chair's ruling should be accompanied by an explanation.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): Mr. Speaker, if it is to be "the assent of the Chair not being withheld," we shall have Member after Member rising and moving the application of the clôture. Such Motions will be made amidst the cheers and shouts of the dominant Party in the House, and all the dignity that attaches to so serious and drastic a Rule as this will be entirely lost. I protest against it being within the power of any Member to rise during periods of excitement and make this Motion, because I firmly believe dozens of such Motions will be made in the course of a night, especially when the Estimates are under consideration.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): Mr. Speaker, it is only your dissent or veto which can prevent any Member of the House making a Motion for the clôture; and, therefore, the words "with the consent of the Chair as aforesaid," and even the words now proposed to be substituted—namely, "the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld," are inapplicable. Neither set of words are necessary.

MR. GEDGE (Stockport): It seems to me a waste of the time of the House to discuss words of this kind. In the first paragraph of this Rule the Chair is to withhold its assent or put the Motion; then, in the 7th line, we have adopted the words "the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld;" and now, in the 10th line, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) proposes to put in just the same words, instead of "with the consent of the Chair as aforesaid." The two phrases cannot mean precisely the same thing, whereas we do mean the same thing. I think any sensible man of business would say that as we have, in the 7th line, "the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld" we should be foolish if we adopted different words three lines lower down to express precisely the same thing.

Amendment agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON (Lancashire, Rossendale): Mr. Speaker, I have to move the insertion of certain words which will make the Rule run as follows:—

"If a Clause be then under consideration, a Motion may be made (the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld), 'That the Question, That certain words of the Clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause, or that the Clause stand part of, or be added to the Bill, be now put.'"

I am perfectly aware that the words which I have to propose do not remove the objection of a large number of hon. Gentlemen who have spoken in the previous debate, and who object that any powers should be given to any majority of the House to exclude discussion of Amendments under any circumstances whatever. That was not my intention in suggesting, the other day, the insertion of these words. An hon. Gentleman who spoke a short time ago said that I had, in the observations I made on Wednesday, admitted the reasonableness of the contention which had been put forward. I did nothing of the sort. I stated that, in my opinion, any system of closure whatever would be totally inoperative and useless unless some power were given to the Committee, or to the House on the Report stage, of excluding discussion upon Amendments which it did not consider raised important issues. But what I did admit, the other day, was that there was a certain blot in the Rule as it stood—namely, that the House or the Committee might have been put into this difficulty—that it would either have had to decide to discuss all Amendments which might be on the Paper, or might be moved to a clause, or else that in refusing to discuss any of them, and in taking the whole clause as it stood, it would pass over one or more Amendments which it was of opinion raised substantial and important issues. That was a real blot, and it appeared to me, in concert with others, that that blot might be removed by the adoption of these words. These words will enable a Motion to be made to obtain a definite decision on the part of the House or Committee on the words of a clause down to a certain point. The adoption of these words may or may not exclude Amendments of which Notice has been given. The House will have to decide whether such Amendments are, or ought not, to be discussed. It will have the power of stopping short at that point where an Amendment stands which, by the general consent of the House, is admitted to raise an important question, and which it is the general desire and wish of the House should be discussed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Hants (Mr. Slater-Booth) said my Amendment supposes an amount of technical knowledge on the part of Members which is not generally possessed, and which we are accustomed to look for from the Speaker or Chairman. I do not see the force of that criticism. I hope we may assume that any Member making use of the powers given to him under this Rule will satisfy himself that the Motion he makes is one which the House may reasonably entertain; but if this power is rashly used by any Member—if the Member who makes a Motion does not possess that technical knowledge of the Procedure of the House which he ought to possess before making such a Motion—I may point out that his action will be checked by the veto given by the Rule to the Speaker or Chairman. When a Motion is made to exclude a certain number of Amendments to a clause, it will be perfectly competent for the Chairman or Speaker to intervene and say—"This Motion will exclude such and such an Amendment. I shall not give my assent to the exclusion of that Amendment, and I cannot put a Motion so made to the House." Well, Sir, I believe that by the great majority of the Members of the House my Amendment, although not meeting all the objections that have been raised, is considered, as far as it goes, a distinct improvement of the Rule. I am quite aware the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) has stated that, in his opinion, my Amendment will make the matter worse. I cannot see how that can be the case. The hon. Member for Cork says it would give power to admit certain Amendments and to exclude others; but I may point out that it is not the Government alone, or even the majority alone, which will have this power. The power must be exercised by the Government, supported by the majority of the House, and it must also be exercised with the assent of the Speaker or Chairman of Committees. Certainly, it cannot be to the disadvantage of any minority in this House, however unfairly they may choose to assume the majority of the House desires to treat them, that there should be power to allow the discussion of substantial and real Amendments under these circumstances. As the original Resolution seems to me to unduly fetter the discretion of the House, and as my Amendment will restore to the House a considerable amount of liberty, I beg to move the Amendment of which I have given Notice.

The Marquess of Hartington

Amendment proposed,

In line 11, after the first word "That," to insert the words "certain words of the Clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause, or That."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): Mr. Speaker, I find some difficulty in assenting to the Amendment of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) on account of the words "or That" at the end of the Amendment. As the Rule now stands, after the first Motion for the closure has been adopted, a Question "That the whole of a Clause be now put or added to the Bill," may be the Question which may at once, with your assent, be put to the House or Committee. That has been considered to be too great an infringement of the liberty of debate; but the noble Marquess has said that is guarded by the fact that no Member would be rash enough to make such a Motion unadvisedly; or that, if he was, you would restrain him; or that, failing these safeguards, there would be an appeal to the House. If that was the case, it would be entirely unnecessary for the noble Marquess to have moved this Amendment at all. I think we may take it as conceded, by the fact of the Amendment being moved, that something more than these three safeguards is necessary. There are rash people on both sides of the House; and there might be a person in the Chair who would not be able to see to what extent such a Motion might affect the liberty of debate, or the House might be full and impatient. The noble Marquess says his Amendment will be a distinct improvement, and I quite agree with him. It is a distinct improvement that the Mover of the clôtüre should stipulate in his Motion how much of the clause he wishes the closure to apply to; but, this being a distinct improvement, why should the Mover be allowed an alternative? Why should he be allowed, if he chooses, to move that the whole clause be put? I am quite willing to adopt the closure in so far as to allow a Member to move, with your consent or without your veto, that a certain portion of a clause shall be put to the House; but I am not willing to give to any Member the opportunity of doing that which, by the very fact of adopting the Amendment of the noble Marquess, the Government themselves say is the worse plan of the two. I beg to move that the words "or That" be omitted from the Amendment of the noble Marquess.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "or That."—(Mr. Staveley Hill.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or That' stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): I am glad the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) admits now the validity of the arguments advanced from this quarter of the House against this portion of the Rule; but I am sorry I cannot agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Staveley Hill) that this Amendment is a distinct improvement. The Rule was bad enough as before; but, if amended as the noble Marquess proposed, it will be infinitely worse in respect to the freedom of speech and the introduction of substantial Amendments. This Amendment will assist the Government to do wrong, if they are so disposed, rather than to prevent it; because, while the Government would not have the audacity to strike out by the clôtüre all the substantial Amendments, if you give them the power of selecting a portion of the Amendments, their audacity need not be so great, but they will be able to get rid of Amendments objectionable to them. They may say—"Let us apply the clôtüre as far as such and such a line of the clause; we shall get rid of two or three Amendments of an obstructive character, and we shall also get rid of one or two substantial Amendments which we do not care to consider, and which we do not care to have put to the House." The noble Marquess does not think that any Member, knowing the responsibility resting upon him, would make a Motion improperly, but that if a Member did make a Motion the effect of which would be to prevent the discussion of a substantial Amendment, the Speaker or the Chairman would not permit the clôture. Now, the Speaker or the Chairman is to decide which are substantial Amendments and which are not. I should like to know from you, Sir, whether it is possible for you or the Chairman of Committees, supposing the clôture has been proposed upon the first six Amendments on the Paper, to decide whether or not these Amendments are obstructive or substantial Amendments? I do not think it is possible for either you, Sir, or the Chairman to do anything of the kind, unless you are permitted to hear the arguments adduced in favour of the Amendments. It seems to me that, by these Rules, we are expecting the Speaker and Chairman to be possessed of the gifts of a clairvoyant. I admit that the intention of the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) is good. He wishes to minimize the unnecessarily drastic powers of the Rule; but, unfortunately, his Amendment will not effect that object. It would have been all right if the Amendment had provided that each Member having an Amendment on the Paper was entitled to occupy two minutes—or, say, only one minute—in explaining the object of his Amendment, and that then the Speaker or Chairman should say whether the Amendment was obstructive or substantial. It cannot be said that such an arrangement would lead to an undue prolongation of the debate, because, if any Party in the House were so foolish as to put down 20 obstructive Amendments, only 20 minutes would be occupied in their explanation. You ask the Speaker or the Chairman to do what is absolutely impossible; he cannot tell the value of an Amendment until he knows what the Amendment is. The Amendment of the noble Marquess makes matters worse. It does not get over the main difficulty, but facilitates the application of the clôture to substantial Amendments by the application of the clôture to a certain number of Amendments, some of which may be obstructive.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): As far as I can understand the arguments of the hon. Gentleman the Member for King's County (Mr. Molloy), they amount to this:—Assuming the House has determined on closure, the next thing we have to do is to make it so inconvenient in working as to render it practically nugatory. That does not appear to me to be a legitimate form of procedure. However we may object to the closure, it certainly is not legitimate for us to endeavour to graft upon the Resolution some other arrangement which will entirely stultify what we have already done. Although I object to certain arrangements which have been adopted, I cannot think it is dignified or loyal for us to endeavour to prevent the closure being carried out at all, after the principle has once been affirmed deliberately by the House.

Mr. Molloy

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): The hon. Member for King's County has put the difficulty very plainly. He has illustrated how the Amendment of the noble Marquess will leave the door open for the exclusion of Amendments, as distinct from closing a debate upon one that has been moved. Yet the rejection of the Amendment of the noble Marquess will leave the Rule as it is submitted by the Government, and will apply the closure to a clause as a whole. To obviate the difficulty, some Amendment must be looked for in the direction of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Staveley Hill). I quite agree with the last speaker (Mr. Waddy) that it is quite impossible to argue the question from the point of view of making what the House generally has accepted utterly impracticable. The best solution of the problem seems to be to graft upon the Amendment the proposal of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Staveley Hill). I take it he proposes to leave out not only the words "or That," but the words which follow—that is to say, to leave out "That the Clause stand part of, or be added to the Bill, be now put." The effect of that will be that when we are dealing with a clause it will be impossible to adopt a closure overriding at once all future Amendments in it. The Amendment is an improvement on the noble Marquess's. I prefer the arrangement of the noble Marquess to the impracticable proposal of the Government, and I prefer the hon. and learned Gentleman's (Mr. Staveley Hill's) to that of the noble Marquess. If, as I hope, the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment is grafted on the noble Lord's, I shall propose to add at the end some such words as these—

"Provided that whenever the Chairman does not withhold his assent to a Motion of closure, which, if carried, would withdraw from consideration any Amendment of which Notice has been given, he shall declare whether he deems such Amendment to be an abuse of the Rules of the House, or that it has been sufficiently discussed under some form or other."

It should be remembered that there is a great difference between closure and exclusion. Closure does not withdraw from the House the decision on any point; it only expresses the view of the majority that a question has been sufficiently discussed, and forces it to a decision. Exclusion, on the other hand, removes from the consideration of the House certain questions which, from their being put on the Paper, it is clear certain Members wish to be discussed. If, under certain circumstances, there is to be exclusion, it should only be on certain distinct and specified occasions. Although my objection to this form of closure in Committee will not be entirely removed, yet I think it possible, by the adoption of some such proviso as I have indicated, to make it of a more practicable and reasonable character.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): We object altogether to the insertion in the Rule of the words proposed by the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale, because they do not give us the assurance for freedom of discussion which we think we are entitled to claim. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) has very properly pointed out the distinction between closure and exclusion. Of course we recognize that, under certain circumstances, closure may be fairly applied; but exclusion can never be fair. Exclusion simply means the application of the gag. I doubt very much if the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh will have the effect of securing liberty of speech and fair play; and even if the right hon. Gentleman's words are adopted, it will be necessary to obtain a better definition of the power of the Chairman than this Rule at the present time contains. Any proposal which gives unlimited power to the Chairman of Committees to declare whether an Amendment is an abuse of the Forms of the House is very dangerous. The Chairman of Committees has now the power to rule an Amendment un consequential, and, I think, frivolous. We cannot argue with him; his ruling is final. To give unlimited power to the Chairman, who is merely a Party man, to rule any Amendment he chooses out of Order, is to put in his hands one of the most powerful and dangerous weapons, not only of closure, but of exclusion, you can desire. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Staveley Hill) will have a satisfactory effect as far as it goes; but if the words of the noble Marquess are adopted we can easily see that the Chairman of Committees will have the option either of cloturing the clause bit by bit or altogether. I am sorry the Government have been unable to frame a Rule more after what they seem to wish. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) has confessed he has certain ideas in his mind which he is unable to express on paper. I regret he has not been able to express in words his ideas, because if he had I am sure, judging from his generous instincts and conciliatory disposition, he would have framed a Rule which would have secured absolutely free discussion, and not have left us, as this Rule, amended as the noble Marquess suggests or not, unquestionably will, at the mercy of the Chair.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): There are two Amendments before the House. The first Amendment, that of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), provides that the Speaker or Chairman shall have the option of putting either the whole clause, or, in the case of a complicated clause, only a portion of the clause. We can perfectly well understand how, if the clause be a long one, involving many points of dispute, it may be necessary to put only certain portions at a time, and we can also conceive a case in which the clause—say a short and simple clause, which provides that the Act shall apply to Scotland or to England only, as the case may be—may be put as a whole. According to the Amendment of the noble Marquess, the Speaker or Chairman will have the option of putting the whole clause to the House, or of splitting it up into sections and taking the sense of the House on each section; but, according to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Staveley Hill), the Chair would not have it in his power to put the clause as a whole to the House. He would have to put the clauses in sub-sections, whether the substance of the Amendments required it or not.

[Eleventh Night.]

MR. STAVELEY HILL: My Amendment gives power to put a clause in parts, or to allow the Chairman to put it at the very end.

MR. CALDWELL: Nothing of the kind. The words of the Amendment are "That certain words of a clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause." How could it be put that the whole clause "stand part of the Clause?" It would be impossible. So that, according to the Amendment of the noble Marquess, the Chairman will have the option either of putting the whole clause or part of it, leaving other parts which may be contentious out; whilst, according to the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, there would be no power to put the whole clause to the House.

MR. STAVELEY HILL: I am sure the hon. Member does not wish to misrepresent me. There will be a remaining part as well as a first part of a clause, and the clôtüre could not be applied to the remaining part unless the first part had been under consideration, and then all the remaining part of the clause be put.

MR. CALDWELL: The meaning of the hon. and learned Member's Amendment to the Rule, as we have it here, is that it shall be impossible to put the whole clause at one time. It will be necessary to break it up into sections.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): This part of the Rule will apply principally to proceedings in Committee, and, as has been pointed out by the hon. Member for Mid Tyrone (Mr. M. J. Kenny), the Chairman of Committees already has ample power for dealing with frivolous Amendments, or Amendments that appear consequential. It seems to me that the Mover of an Amendment should have some opportunity allowed him of showing why he brings his Amendment forward. The House has already decided upon the principle of the clôtüre; but the Rule as now proposed goes beyond that principle, for it goes to the exclusion of matters which the Members who may bring them forward may not have an opportunity of explaining. It seems to me that the Amendment the noble Marquess proposes is a very dangerous one. We know that very frequently the whole substance of a clause hangs upon two or three words; and it would be quite possible, with this Rule in operation, for a Member on this or the other side of the House, in a moment of irritation, to get up and propose that the clôtüre apply to those particular words. I quite understand that the object of the Amendments is to prevent for a time the application of the clôtüre to all the sections and sub-sections of a Bill, and all the sub-divisions of a Vote; but it will be perfectly in the power of any Member of the House, in a moment of excitement, to propose to apply the clôtüre to certain words, and if he obtains the consent of the Chair, or the consent of the Chair is not refused to him, it is possible for him in that way to shut out half-a-dozen words on which the whole clause hinges. There is another danger which I see in the proposed alteration of the Rule. If the Rule were to be applied as originally intended it would require a large amount of brazenness on the part of any Government to move that a large number of sub-sections be clôtured; but as it is now proposed, taking a clause bit by bit, it will be possible for the Government to get individual Members to move that all the most important parts of a clause be clôtured, word by word, or half-a-dozen words at a time. In this way, without outraging public opinion, the clôtüre may be put upon all the Amendments to a clause. Under these circumstances, though I admit that the Amendment of the noble Marquess has a certain amount of plausibility in it, I believe that it amounts to a most insidious and dangerous proposal, and one which, if passed in its present form, will place us in no better position than we should occupy if it had never been brought forward.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I prefer the Amendment originally proposed to that of the noble Marquess. On Wednesday night I ventured to say that, as well as I could understand the Amendment as it was then read out to us, so far from improving matters, it would make them much worse. I am confirmed in that view, and I think that will be the opinion of everyone who is at all likely to be chronically a Member of the minority in this House. As the Rule stood originally, if there were 40 Amendments to an important clause, and if the Government desired to get rid of those standing in the names of

Mr. Caldwell

Members of a minority, they would have to sacrifice every one on the Paper, even those belonging to themselves or their followers. Though the original proposal would have placed in the hands of the Chairman power which I do not suppose is possessed in any other Legislative Assembly in the world, the interests of the Government and their own necessities would have obliged them to protect the minority; if they destroyed all the Amendments, some of their own, lower down on the Paper, would have had to go with the rest. According to the original proposal it would have been impossible to pick and choose between certain Amendments, and the carrying of a Motion "That the Question be now put" would have wiped off all the Amendments from the Paper. Of course, we know that there is no priority in the putting down of Amendments, and that there is always a chance that a Member of a minority may get his Amendment down before one appears in the name of a Member of the Government. Before a Government Amendment was reached a Member of a minority might, in that way, have obtained the right—in which the Government would protect him—of having his Amendment brought before the notice of the House. The noble Marquess, however, proposes to place a new power in the hands of the majority and the Chair, as if the Rule of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House was not sufficient; and I do not wonder in the least at the Leader of the House assenting most willingly to the Amendment. The result of the proposal will be that the Members of the two Front Benches will meet together and decide what Amendments shall be put to the House and what Amendments shall not be put, and no independent Member in the future will have any opportunity of moving an Amendment to a Bill at all. This is just such an Amendment as one would expect to come from an occupant of the Front Opposition Bench. It is not at all unusual to see the two Front Benches joining together in an endeavour to defeat those hon. Members leading forlorn hopes below the Gangway; and we remember how the noble Marquess who has made this proposal endeavoured on one occasion to put down the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) himself when the right hon. Gentleman was exhaustively treating the subject of prison rules or of the abolition of the lash. We know that if the Amendment of the noble Marquess is carried the result will be that when an important Bill is before the House the Leaders on both sides will put their heads together and decide what Amendment they will permit and what they will not permit. A process of selection will thus be established. Under this system the minority will have no chance at all; and I would, therefore, appeal to every independent Member of the House to vote against the Amendment as an additional attack on the rights of private Members in this House, and an attack which, if passed, will leave private Members no rights at all.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the suggestion made by the right hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Childers). The Question before the House is the Amendment moved by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill). The hon. and learned Gentleman has pointed out that there are two points in the Amendment of my noble Friend the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington), the first being that the question that certain words of the clause defined in the Motion be now put, or that the Question that the clause stand part of the Bill be now put. The hon. and learned Member for Staffordshire has pointed out the great importance of enabling a discussion to take place on the clause itself. But, before we go into that, let me point out that I think hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, whilst I can understand their strong objection to the Amendment of the noble Marquess, seeing that, in their opinion, it makes matters worse, yet should recognize the spirit in which the Motion was proposed—namely, that of minimizing the harm that the Rule in its original form would have done. But I do wish to press very much on the attention of the House and Her Majesty's Government the injustice that might be inflicted by enabling the Question, "That this Clause stand part of the Bill," to be put without any debate. It seems to me quite possible that totally new questions might be raised which could not have been foreseen by the House—questions that have never been debated on any Amendment, and which ought to be debated and put before the House—and a Member who has given Notice of his intention to move that a clause be not inserted in the Bill should not be excluded from putting his case before the House, and stating to the House his reasons for so moving. Take the simple case mentioned by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the St. Rollox Division of Glasgow (Mr. Caldwell). Even in the case of a single short clause, to the effect that the Bill apply only to Scotland, no opportunity might have been given on any Amendment for English and Irish Members to express their views, and argue that the Bill should apply to England or Ireland. And, further, I think it would be impossible for any Chairman, however able and efficient, to divine all the reasons which may be in the mind of an hon. Member who has put down a Notice on the Paper to move the omission of a clause. There is a great distinction between the question of clôture and the question of exclusion. We have never yet in this House contemplated excluding questions which are on the Notice Paper from the consideration of this House. No doubt it is in the competence of the Chair to exclude questions which it thinks have already been discussed, but that is a different thing from excluding questions which have not been discussed. When an hon. Member has given Notice of a Motion he may fairly expect that an opportunity will be allowed him of explaining the grounds of his proposal, and certainly the question of the omission of a clause is one upon which an hon. Member has a right to say that no Speaker or Chairman of Committees shall exclude him from the right of stating his reasons why he moves the omission of the clause. I speak as a Member of a Party in this House especially interested in passing an efficient Rule of Clôture. I think no Party is more interested in the adoption of such a Rule than the Liberal Party, for during the last 50 years that Party has done more for legislation than any other, and it may be hoped that after the next 50 years the same thing may have to be said. But we do not wish to pass a Rule of exclusion to prevent questions which have not been put before the House from being argued.

Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth

Mr. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I should like to know what the Government mean to do by the proposal they wish to adopt? Do they wish to stop the discussion of frivolous Amendments? Do they want to stop the discussion of dilatory Amendments, or of Amendments which are out of Order? If they do, I contend that the Chair already possesses, under the existing Rule of the House, full power to stop these Amendments. Do they want, on the other hand, to stop a debate that may have been already sufficiently prolonged? They will have power to do so under the first paragraph of this Rule. What more can they want? Why, all they can want in the direction of shortening discussion is the power of exclusion, to which reference has been made. It seems to me that that is the only object the Government can now aim at, and, to my mind, it is a thing which should be resisted by every Member who takes an interest in fair discussion in this House. I am sure the House welcomes back to the scene of his labours the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Manchester (Mr. A. J. Balfour), who has just entered the House for the first time since he was charged with the government of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman must take a sympathetic interest in this discussion, because we know that in 1882 he proposed several Motions of an anti-clôture character, and I would almost say distinguished himself as an Obstructive. By this Amendment we shall be putting an additional power in the hands of the Speaker and Chairman of Committees, without a limitation to prevent them from exercising their judgment in accordance with the opinions of the majority in the House. No matter how well intended they may be, they will be unconsciously influenced by the prevailing temper of the majority; and the prevailing temper when, for instance, a Coercion Bill is under discussion will be to cut short debate on the part of the Irish Members. In the case of a Bill dealing, we will say, with Scotch law—a subject that probably no 10 men in this House outside the Scotch Members understand—how will the Chairman of Committees be able to satisfactorily exercise the power of excluding Amendments unless he is a Scotchman, or is assisted by a Scotch assessor? In the case of an Irish Bill, in order that he might properly understand the nature of Amendments that might be moved, it would be necessary for him to have two assessors—one for the Conservatives, and one for the Nationalists. Then there are Bills which deal with questions of pure law, and with the law of real and personal property, passing through the House every year. Unless you have a lawyer acquainted with the law of real and personal property in the Chair, I defy you to say that he is not likely to shut out real and substantial Amendments. What we want is the power of proposing Amendments and of explaining them to the House; and I hold that under any modification of the Rule, except that proposed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), which has been rejected, power will be given to the Chairman of Committees and to the Speaker to exclude substantial Amendments, which is a thing we shall always protest against and endeavour to resist to the last. We desire that the Proposer of an Amendment shall have power to state, at least, the substance of his Amendment. If that power be given, and if a Member abuses it, you have in the first part of the Rule ample power to cure that abuse—you can close the debate at any time you like. Any Government that is not satisfied with a power like that wants a thing that the House of Commons should never grant.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (SIR HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): The hon. Member who has just sat down, and other Members, have asked what is the object of this Government in pressing on this Rule. That object has been stated over and over again, but I will venture to repeat it. The object of the Government is to facilitate debate, and to stop needless discussion and waste of time on dilatory and frivolous Amendments. The Government do not contemplate, nor has it ever contemplated, the exclusion of sound and substantial Amendments, and the words proposed have been accepted in order to enable such Amendments to be put and fully discussed. At the same time, the Government do not think it desirable to take away from a Member of the House, if he can obtain the assent of the Speaker, the power of moving that the clause stand part of the Bill. This might still be necessary to put an end to frivolous and obstructive Amendments. It is not an easy matter for the Government to steer through the differences of opinion expressed in the House. We accept the words proposed by the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale, as we thought, after full discussion, that there was force in the arguments of hon. Members below the Gangway; but now it appears that those Members prefer the Rule as it stands to the Rule as proposed to be amended, and argue that the Amendment will defeat the very object for which it was proposed, and strike a blow at legitimate discussion by Irish Members. The Government dispute this view, and are satisfied that by enabling the Speaker to put part of the clause no substantial Amendments will be excluded. Many hon. Members who have been discussing the matter seem to forget that the Government and the House are committed to the principle of the closure, and that behind the private Member and the House there is the protection of the Speaker and the Chairman. Reference has been made to the temper of the House, and to the possibility of Motions for the application of the closure being carried in haste in an excited and hot-tempered House; but, again, I say that the Government rely on the Speaker and the Chairman, who will be unmoved by the temper of the House. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] Doubtless many hon. Members below the Gangway opposite will not believe that; but the majority of the House believe it, and are ready to rely upon it. The House is used to hearing hon. Members below the Gangway expressing a want of confidence in the Chair; but I must protest against this argument being extended, as it has been again this evening, to casual Chairmen. The First Lord of the Treasury has more than once stated that Her Majesty's Government do not intend that this closure Rule should apply to casual Chairmen; and if the hon. Member who repeated the argument this evening had looked at the Amendment Paper he would have seen an Amendment confining the Rule to the Speaker and Chairman of Ways and Means. The course which the Government intend to pursue is to accept and adhere to the words proposed by the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale, and to reject any other Amendment. I altogether disapprove the proposal or suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that the Speaker should be called upon to give his reasons to the House for excluding Amendments under the operation of the closure. It would certainly lead, in the most objectionable manner, to controversy between hon. Members and the Speaker, and I think the House can well rely on the judgment of the Chair as to whether Amendments are frivolous or substantial.

[Eleventh Night.]

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): The right hon. Baronet who has just spoken used words the meaning of which he, perhaps, did not fully realize, but which were very significant. He said the Speaker and the Chairman of Committees were "behind the House." The Speaker and the Chairman of Committees are before the House, and everything that they do must be done in the face of the House, before the House, and with the full cognizance of the House. There is a difference between right hon. Gentlemen opposite and those who sit on this side of the House. Some things we hold in common. One of them is that we all wish the admission of the Closure Rule in some efficient form; and another is that we are all agreed that the Speaker and the Chairman will, at all times, act to the best of their ability. But we differ on this important point in the matter under discussion—that while Gentlemen opposite desire to throw the responsibility of action on the Speaker, those on my side of the House wish to put that responsibility on the House itself. We think it most dangerous to call upon the Speaker or the Chairman to intervene between the House and its will, and we believe that it would bring the Chair into constant collision with different sections in the House. As to the Amendments proposed, they would put on the Chair, for the first time in its history, the delicate duty of saying what Amendments are frivolous or not. I have fulfilled the duties of the Chair myself, and I can understand the great difficulty—I will say almost the impossibility—of the Speaker judging whether particular Amendments, perhaps several in number, which he has had little or no time to consider, and has not heard discussed, are substantial, or frivolous and obstructive. I recollect being in the Chair when the Crimes Bill was before the House, and when I had to consider not only Amendments placed on the Notice Paper and printed beforehand, but sometimes 20 or 30 paper Amendments on the same clause which were handed to the Chair. How was it possible for me, in such circumstances, to say at once which of those Amendments were substantial and which frivolous? It is altogether out of the power of the Chair to do so, and the effect of placing such a duty upon it will be to bring it into conflict with the minority or the majority of the House. I, therefore, approve the Amendment which I understand the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh intends to move. I agree that it is easy for the Speaker to do one of two things—to say that an Amendment should not be put because it is an abuse of the Rules of the House, of which he can judge at once; or because the question involved has been already discussed in another form. The Government will act wisely in submitting to that limitation of the Amendment. The Amendment of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale is, no doubt, a limitation; but it will not relieve the Chair of the danger of collision with different sections of the House. I hope, therefore, that the Government will be able to see their way to adopt the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Edinburgh when it is proposed.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I wish to re-echo what has already fallen from these Benches—namely, that, bad as the original words of the Resolution were, the Amendment of the noble Marquess is infinitely worse. We object most strenuously to that Amendment; because while we considered, in the first place, that the closure was within the facile grasp of the Government, we considered that whilst they grasped the rose, there was also a certain risk of the thorn. Let us suppose that a clause be under discussion in Committee, and that it is desired by the Government that after a certain amount of irritation has been produced in discussing the earlier words of the clause, possibly on the second word of the clause a Member may rise and move that certain words, according to the formula suggested by the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale, be put. What will happen is that the whole of the clause will be put, and without anyone being heard in favour of the Amendments on the Paper. The proposal of the noble Marquess is that there should be what I may call a hop, skip, and a jump closure. I hope, when we go to a Division, it will be understood by hon. Members exactly what they are dividing on. They are dividing on a proposal which provides that the Chairman is to have in his mind, with regard to an Amendment, a presumption not only as to its frivolity, but as to its use. Suppose there are 40 or 50 Amendments to the clause of a Bill; supposing that a Member rises and proposes that the clause stand part of the Bill, I venture to say that what the Chairman of Committees has to do is not to address his mind to any particular Amendment of the clause, but to find out against which of the many Amendments the Motion for closure is aimed, and then give his sanction or otherwise to the closure. I have, in a previous speech, suggested that the Chairman of Committees may be the strongest partizan in the House; but, whether he be the partizan of the Government or not, it is clear that in each case it is his interest to further Public Business, and the complaint of the majority has always been that it is the desire of the Government of the day to run its own special measures through the House. It is, therefore, necessary that the Chairman of Committees should be imbued with the same desire as the Government to show a good night's work; and, therefore, as a minority, we say that we have no protection from the wholesale adoption of the closure. The Amendment of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale will reduce the risk of the Government, with regard to the closure, practically to nil. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), it is true, has come to the House with a set of Rules to which he says the Government attach the greatest importance and value; but he has not told us that he would stand or fall by those Rules. He has come down and tinkered and pattered with his new Rules day after day, and we do not know that he is not at this moment preparing some new modifications that will change the whole face of them. Well, Sir, it is just when the House is beginning to have a glimmering of what it is that the Government mean by the wording of their first Rule that the noble Marquess comes down and sets them off in another direction. I object that, on this illusory process, we have been allured from one set of words to another, and always told that in the end we shall get introduced the words we want; but, so far as the words now proposed are concerned, I venture to say that the realization of our wishes are as far from it as we have been all along. I think the Government will do well to give us some time for consideration of the proposal made; and I venture to say that the Government might even now stop in their proceedings and put into proper shape the expression of their own ideas. The question involved here is one which I say ought not to be looked at through the light of Party considerations. If you are framing Rules for the conduct of proceedings in this House, I say that the Rules proposed ought to be worthy of the traditions of this House—worthy of the Government Bench, and of the genius which is supposed to adorn the Benches occupied by the Opposition, and not framed in the slipshod and clumsy fashion in which the present Rules have been laid before the House.

Sir Henry Holland

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Nothing can be more touching, Sir, than the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury prostrates himself before the Chair, so to speak, when he is defending this Rule. But I would remind the right hon. Gentleman of the occasion in January, 1881, when he, with Lord Iddesleigh and Lord Cross, flounced out of the House in opposition to the ruling of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair) when he was Chairman of Committees. It is impossible on all the various technical subjects which come before this House that the Speaker or Chairman should say beforehand whether an Amendment is or is not frivolous. You propose to make the Chairman of Committees assessor of the value of these Amendments and of their substantiality; but I say that a more absurd and impossible task was never put upon anyone. What will be the effect of the proposal before us, which is essentially to allow the Government proposal to stand? I will give the Government a lesson in drafting Bills. By closing a clause you will closure the whole of the Amendment to it, and so all that your draftsman has to do will be to put the Bill into one clause, and you can then carry your Bill by the process I have described. That, Sir, is reducing legislation to absurdity. If you had been asked whether the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) was frivolous or not, probably, if you had given expression to your real mind, you would have said, "I will rule this Amendment out;" but what has been the result of our discussing it? Why, we have succeeded in penetrating the mind even of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale, and, after four or five hours' discussion, we induced him to get up and support our proposal. This is not a question of confidence in the Chair. I have a great respect for the Chair, and for all those who have filled it and will fill it—I respect them in advance—but I decline to allow the judgment of the Speaker or Chairman to be the substitute for the good old practice in this House. In my judgment, the proposal of the noble Marquess makes bad worse; he proposes that some Amendments are to be excluded from the clôture. I am inclined to accept the opinion of hon. Gentlemen opposite and upon the Opposition Benches upon English subjects—I know nothing of English matters, and I keep my mind pure and undefiled in that respect—but as to Irish Amendments I deny that they know anything more than I do about them. They have not lived in Ireland, and if I were to put them through a competitive examination of the clauses of the Land Act of 1881—why they would be spun in a very short time. I think that the discussion we have raised, although it will have no good effect so far as Irish Amendments are concerned, will be for the benefit of Englishmen. We have pointed out a blot on the Amendment of the noble Marquess, but, as I have said, it does not affect us. You had an hon. Member saying the other night that this discussion had continued long enough; and, when this Rule passes, you will have some equally uninformed Gentleman getting up and moving the closure on an Irish question. I prefer to be guided by my own experience rather than by the experience of the Speaker, or the Chairman, or of English Members. I shall never forget the time when the First Lord of the Treasury and his Colleagues marched out of the House.

[Eleventh Night.]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Gentleman is not speaking relevantly to the Question before the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I was endeavouring to show that the Chair has not been uniformly respected.

MR. SPEAKER: The Question before the House is simply that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause. The hon. and learned Member has been for some time very much beyond the Question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I have endeavoured to point out, in the few words which I have addressed to the House, that we consider that the words of the noble Marquess do not afford us the protection which we consider we are entitled to in the peculiar circumstances in which we are placed. I think English and Scotch Members are adequately protected by the Amendment of the noble Marquess; but with regard to us that is not the case. As the Government declare that Ireland is to be mainly dealt with, and as the Rules are proposed for the present Session, surely we are entitled as being the Party, whose country will be affected, to press on the Government for some better assurance on this question than we have had up to the present.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): The only point in which I have already taken part in the closure debate has been to object to a portion of the proposal on the grounds of its relation to Irish Business, inasmuch as that the safeguards urged as generally existing in respect of English Business seemed to me absent in the case of Ireland; but I rise to support the Amendment before the House, not because of its relation to Irish Business, but because of its relation to the position of the House generally. My experience is that there are often upon the Paper Amendments to Bills which at first sight appear of little importance, but which, when we come to them and proceed to argue upon them, prove to be of far-reaching importance. I think it would be a great misfortune to the legislation of this House if it were in the power of the House, or any section of the House, to say at any period of the debate on a clause that all succeeding Amendments should be swept away without consideration. In supporting this Amendment I am supporting this position—that it should not be in the power of the House, or in the power of any Member of the House, to bar the House from considering any particular Amendment, or to make a proposal which would lead the House to sweep away, with reference to a clause, all the subsequent Amendments. This, Sir, is the first occasion on which the closure has been advocated as a prospective measure, and I altogether dissent from a Rule which establishes a form of closure which has never been advocated or considered by the country at large. I am, on account of the experience I have had in this House, and on the ground of this proposal being entirely new, opposed to any Resolution of this House which shall prospectively prohibit the discussion of Amendments. It is on that ground, and not because it is connected with Irish Business, that I support the Amendment before the House.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I am of opinion that the effect of the Amendment of the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington) will be entirely destroyed if Rule 5 is carried out; and it can only be prevented by some modification of that clause. I therefore would like to draw the attention of the noble Marquess to what will happen when we come to that part of the Rules—because it will be impossible to pass Rule 5 after we have admitted the noble Marquess's Amendment.

DR. TANNER (Cork, Co., Mid): The silence which the occupants of the Treasury Bench have observed during the greater part of this evening, and notably upon these Amendments, has struck me as most remarkable. The speeches which have been delivered upon the Amendment of the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington) and the subsequent Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Kingwinford (Mr. Staveley Hill), clearly demonstrate that the Amendments are of the greatest importance. I cannot help drawing the attention of the House to the remarks which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair), who has great practical experience in connection with Procedure. He stated that the Chairman may have time to investigate the Amendments placed upon the Paper, and may be able to eliminate those which he deems to be frivolous or objectionable, but that many Amendments are brought to the Chairman when he is actually sitting in the Chair, and that in regard to these it is impossible for him to form a judgment off hand. The right hon. Gentleman knows a great deal about this matter, having acted as Chairman during very troublous times, and therefore I commend his remarks to the serious attention of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) drew attention to the fact that there is a great deal of difference between clôture and exclusion. We know that, as a rule, it will be late in the evening—when time is getting short—that the clôture will be applied. When time gets short, the temper of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen, as has unfortunately been the case latterly, gets short too. I cannot help objecting to this attempt to shift the responsibility from the hon. Member who may propose the clôture to the Chair. I again call upon the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), or the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen), to pay some attention to the remarks which have fallen from right hon. Gentlemen who have had practical experience of the difficulties of Procedure.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): Mr. Speaker, I have noticed throughout the whole of these discussions a disposition on the part of the Government to take no heed of the observations addressed from this side of the House. It is very clear that this Parliament is drifting into a most miserable condition. I hold that these Rules are a great abuse of the privileges of the people's Representatives. I have noticed that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, instead of explaining the Rules to the Members of the House, who are anxious to know what effects the Rules will have, has tried to say as little as possible. I have noticed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) explaining the effects and showing the abuses of certain Rules—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not speaking to the Amendment at all.

[Eleventh Night.]

MR. O'HANLON: I think, Mr. Speaker, that the adoption of the Amendment before the House will only make matters worse. I believe that the Amendment is neither understood by the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale, who proposed it, nor by any other Member of the House. I have heard it discussed from all sides of the House; but I do not know that any two opinions expressed with regard to it agree. If this Amendment is to stop all measures being discussed, we might as well bid adieu to the Business of the country. The noble Marquess and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Kingswinford (Mr. Staveley Hill) cannot agree with the other's Amendment; but they both seem to agree in trying, by every means, to muzzle the Irish Members. I must express my objection to these Amendments; and, in conclusion, add that it is my belief that if these Rules are put in force it will be impossible for any Government to carry out the Business of the country in a satisfactory manner.

MR. DEASY (Mayo, W.): I have had some experience of the temper of the House on occasions when matters of considerable importance to Ireland were under discussion. We are told by hon. Gentlemen who support the Amendment of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) that we may trust to the Speaker or Chairman and the good sense of the House. I remember that, on many occasions, it would not have been safe to trust our lives to Gentlemen in this House at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, when the temper of the House has not been as cool as it is now. I recollect that night after night, when we had been discussing matters regarding our country, Gentlemen on the Government Benches have endeavoured to howl us down, and have appealed to you, Sir, over and over again, to prevent us expressing our opinion. I ask, how is it possible, under such circumstances, for us to trust any of the hon. Gentlemen opposite to allow us to continue a discussion which might be of considerable importance to us, but wearisome to them? I decline to trust my freedom of speech to any hon. Gentleman opposite, or to any Chairman who may be appointed by a political Party to preside over our debates. My belief is that we shall have, in the future, similar difficulties to contend against as we have had in the past. It is not far distant, I fear, when we shall have some very troublous times; and I do trust that, no matter whether this Rule passes or not, the House will preserve some kind of freedom of debate. Now, the silence observed on the Front Ministerial Bench—

MR. SPEAKER: I must inform the hon. Gentleman that the Amendment immediately before us is to enable the Chair to put certain words of a clause for the purpose of preserving subsequent Amendments. The hon. Gentleman's remarks have no reference to that Amendment.

MR. DEASY: I was proceeding to ask right hon. Gentlemen opposite to reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair). I was expressing my surprise when you interrupted me—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must ask the hon. Gentleman to be more respectful, or I must take very serious notice of his remarks.

MR. DEASY: I apologize, Sir, for my seeming disrespect. I had no intention to be disrespectful to you. I hope the Government will reply to the arguments advanced by the Members on the Front Opposition Bench and the Irish Members. I protest against the passing of this Amendment, on the ground that the Government might put the most stringent form of clôture into operation. We believe that all these Rules are aimed against the Irish Members; but I would remind hon. Gentlemen who have experience of the House that some of the most beneficial reforms relating to Ireland have been effected by our putting down Amendment after Amendment to the clauses of Bills. I must also point out that it would be impossible for us, on seeing a Bill for the first time, and without hearing the provisions explained, to say whether we should be justified in endeavouring to amend it. What would be the result? The Government of the day might get any friend of theirs to propose Amendments, and put them down on the Paper first. These Amendments might be discussed at considerable length. They might be of comparatively little importance as compared with Amendments lower down on the Paper; but if the discussion had occupied six or eight hours it might be said that it had lasted long enough, and that the clôtüre ought to be applied. We might have Governments proposing through their Party Amendments in order to prevent us bringing Amendments forward. I do not expect much from the present Government. I believe that, if they get these Rules passed, we shall get little fair play in regard to the proposing of Amendments. There is another important effect this Rule will have upon the House. At present, when a new Bill is introduced, hon. Members generally read it over, with the view of finding whether they can draft Amendments which would amend it. In future no one, except a few who are likely to be chosen by the Government, will go to the trouble of going over a Bill, because they will come to the conclusion at once that, if the Government are in any way hostile to the Amendments, they will simply get one of their Party to move the clôtüre, and thus prevent discussion. It would be better for the country that there should be no legislation at all than that there should be hasty and hurried legislation. I thought that, after what has taken place in connection with this debate during the last two or three days, the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) would, at least, have offered us his opinion on this matter. I shall not detain the House longer; but I do hope some alteration of a very important and material nature will be made in this Rule before it is allowed to pass, because I see great danger to the freedom of discussion, and great danger that hon. Members—at least we on these Benches—will not be permitted that opportunity of ventilating our opinion which the importance of the interests of our country demands.

MR. NOLAN (Louth, N.): Whatever difficulty I may feel myself placed in when questions of Procedure generally are being discussed, I feel compelled, by my duty as an Irish Representative, to say a few words upon the Amendment moved by the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington). If I have any objection to urge to this Amendment, it is that it does not go far enough. At the same time, I feel that, no matter what imperfections this Amendment may have, it is sure to pass, because the Government, who at the present time command a majority, with the aid of the noble Marquess, are sure to accept it. Sir, I feel confident, after listening to the speeches from both sides of the House, that this Amendment will leave it possible to throw out Amendments without their even being discussed, and I look upon such a condition of affairs as very serious. It is argued by Members of the Treasury Bench that every trust may be placed in the Chairman, and that no Amendments will be thrown out unless they are frivolous, or likely to waste the time of the House. But, even granting that the Chairman may be a man of the most complete impartiality, it must be borne in mind that this House legislates upon all manner of subjects—upon agriculture, mining, trade, commerce—and that it is impossible for the Chairman to possess the knowledge of an expert upon all these subjects. He cannot judge of the substantiality of all Amendments which are proposed to Bills, and he cannot know what is contemplated by hon. Gentlemen who move Amendments. This Amendment proposes to take away from the constituencies the power they are supposed to possess under the Constitution, and to vest it in some irresponsible Member of the House and the occupant of the Chair. Although I am not disposed to trespass upon the time of the House any further, I feel the effect of the adoption of this Amendment would be a serious innovation upon the rights of the constituencies.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I cannot help saying that I thought the Amendment of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) would have been drafted more generously to the Irish Members—that the Amendment would have been of a more liberal character. We are asked to repose our confidence in the Chair. Some hon. Members of the House have unlimited confidence in the Chair, and others have very little confidence in the Chair. I am, of course, one of the latter, and I am not willing that the matter should be left altogether to the Chair, because the very fact of the physical tedium of sitting in the Chair—

MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to abstain from that line of argument, and to keep to the Amendment before the House.

MR. BLANE: I regret I have deviated from the subject before the House.

[Eleventh Night.]

I wish the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Liberal Party (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) had seen his way to draft an Amendment to this drastic proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), an Amendment in consonance with the Liberal institutions which this age boasts. This is merely a halting Amendment, and is only made for the purpose of limiting debate. I suppose the noble Marquess expects some day to be in a position to go up to the Chair and whisper to the Speaker his desire to close the debate.

MR. SPEAKER: This is the second time I have to request the hon. Gentleman to keep to the Amendment, with which his remarks have no connection whatever.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 257; Noes 134: Majority 123.—(Div. List, No. 59.)

Question proposed,

"That the words 'certain words of the Clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause, or That,' be there inserted."

MR. PARNELL (Cork): Before this Amendment is passed I wish to ask the Government whether they will not take into consideration the very strong expression of opinion that has just been given in favour of some modification in the Amendment of the noble Marquess, and agree to insert some Proviso which will come at the end of the clause to protect the minority from oppressive action on the part of the majority? I would point out that the Rule, as it now stands, carries the House further in a restrictive direction against the moving of Amendments than the Rules of Urgency did of 1881, under which two Coercion Acts were passed. If the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) will carry his mind back to that year he will remember that under the Rule of Urgency it was provided that the clôtüre might come into force against all Amendments on the Paper at a certain hour named in the Resolution; but it was also provided that the House should have an opportunity of expressing its opinion on these Amendments by the Question being formally put from the Chair. It was not permitted to Members in charge of Amendments to move those Amendments; yet the House could express its opinion on them by Divisions. Under the present Rule, if it is left as it now stands, and if the Ministry of the day is in a majority—and we cannot suppose that the Ministry will always continue to be in a minority as at present—the Ministry will be able to carry a Bill through without allowing the House to express its opinion on the Amendments to the clauses. The right hon. Gentleman will be obliged to admit that the emergencies of the time and season do not necessitate a more stringent provision than was obtained in the year 1881, and I think he should concede a point to us, and agree to the insertion of words in the Rule providing that every Amendment on the Paper should, at all events, be put from the Chair. If he does not, it will be in the power of the Government or the majority, before we come to Amendments, before we have an opportunity of understanding what they are, and before we have the slightest sense of their gravity or importance, to shut us out from all discussion of them or power of decision. I submit that we ought not to pass this Rule in its present shape. I venture to say that there never was a more stringent and absolute Rule. Surely the Government will admit that some consideration is due to the very strong representation which has been made to them in this matter. It has been stated, over and over again, that this is not a Party question; and the right hon. Gentleman opposite must admit that, however much we may have opposed him in this Rule, he has not met with much opposition from the Liberal Party, but, on the contrary, considerable assistance. I think, therefore, something is due to the representations which have come from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers).

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am unable to agree with the hon. Gentleman that the powers now sought to be conferred on the House and the Speaker are oppressive powers in any sense whatever. I am unable to agree with him that they are greater in extent than those given under the Rules of Urgency, for it must be remembered that the Speaker and the Chairman are themselves judges of the justness of the Motion which they are asked to put from the Chair, and I submit that it is inconceivable that the Chair will at any time put a Motion for clôtüre which will shut out legitimate debate or discussion of serious substantive Amendments. Sir, I have not through the whole of this very prolonged debate heard any suggestion from hon. Gentlemen opposite, or from any other part of the House, which will define frivolous and unmeaning Amendments from those that are substantive; and I take refuge, therefore, in the responsibility, discretion, and justice of the Chair to protect the minority against any abuse of the power now sought to be conferred on the majority. I cannot admit that the arguments which have been urged from the opposite side of the House—though I desire to pay all respect to them—have at all shaken the conclusion that I and my Colleagues have arrived at after the very fullest consideration. We do not propose these measures with any desire whatever to strain our powers or to assert our authority; but we are conscious of the impotence to which the House has been reduced through the prolongation of debate. We are conscious of the fact that if Amendments are pressed repeatedly on the consideration of the House, and if the discussion that is required by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway is permitted, and Divisions are to be taken on every Amendment, whether frivolous or substantive, it will be utterly impossible for the House to have any question seriously proposed or debated. It has been said, over and over again, that the majority, or any Member who may move the Motion for the clôtüre, will be responsible for that Motion, and it has been stated, over and over again, that if a Member misuses his power he will have to answer for it to the country. I believe those arguments to have great weight. Moreover, I believe it will be impossible for anyone who occupies the Chair, even in a period of excitement or anger, to permit a Motion to be made which will have the effect of allowing a measure to be passed without due and careful, and even prolonged, discussion. Holding these views, I cannot consent to any mitigation or diminution of the authority which is given to the Chair and to the House, under the conditions that are proposed in the Rule, as it is intended to alter it by the Amendment of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale.

Mr. Blane

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury expressly alluded to myself, and I think I can claim from him the admission that I have done my best to assist him in passing this Rule. He has had no opposition to its principle from us. But what I contend is that there is a great difference between "closure" and "exclusion." We are anxious that the Rule of Clôtüre should be made as strong as possible, and we desire to give every assistance to the Government in framing it; but we do not think it should be in the power of any Member—the consent of the Speaker or the Chairman of Committees not being refused—to exclude from the consideration of the House genuine Amendments. The right hon. Gentleman says that it is impossible to distinguish between such Amendments as are genuine and such as are not; but I can only say that, in the words of the additional Proviso which I intend to move after the end of line 12, I should propose distinctly to declare that when permission is given to, or when refusal is withheld from, a Member to introduce such a Motion as will exclude genuine Amendments; it shall be the duty of the Chair to state to the House distinctly that he gives that permission because he considers the Amendment to be an abuse of the Rules of the House, or that he considers that the question has been sufficiently discussed in some other form. That, I think, after the last Division, is the best security we can obtain. I shall vote for the Motion of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale, and I hope that after that is carried some such words as I suggest will be introduced.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think the House should direct attention to the title of this Rule. It is called a Rule for "The Closure of Debate." I do not know, Sir, whether you would be inclined to extend to this Rule the principle that is applied to a Bill before the House. The principle of Parliament applied to a Bill is that nothing shall be introduced which is beyond the title. I maintain that the provision we are now discussing, with the Amendment of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale, goes beyond the title of the Rule, because both the provision and the Amendment are not for the closure of debate, but for the prevention of debate, and even for the extinction of the mere fundamental right of moving an Amendment. I shall be thankful to hear from you, Sir, as will many other hon. Members of the House, whether, in a Rule that professes to be for closure of debate, another right, separable and perfectly distinct from it, can be introduced. I can complain of a still more striking defect than that in the speeches we have heard from the Treasury Bench. We are discussing the right of moving Amendments, and one would have thought that, in order to justify their position, the Government would at least have brought forward from the Journals of the House some instance of vicious, frivolous, or worthless Amendments. [Laughter.] The hon. Gentleman opposite is disorderly in a double sense; because there is no point in his interruption, and he is interrupting from a part of the House in which he ought to be silent. I wish to challenge the Government. Since 1880 we have had before us many Bills in which Irish Members have taken an ardent interest; but I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to go to the Records of the House and show any Amendment that was frivolous, and which did not receive a large amount of support. We have always in Bills affecting Ireland put forward Amendments conceived in an earnest and serious spirit; and Amendments which we have been able to support by arguments. I would point out to the House that no reply has been given to the cogent arguments of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), and I am inclined to ask whether any circumstances are existing with regard to Public Business, or any circumstances are likely to exist, so extreme as those which existed when the Rules of Urgency were passed? Those Rules were passed at the time when a body of the Irish Members were excluded from this House, when temper was fierce and when Party spirit ran high; but those Rules gave us the right to have each of our Amendments put from the Chair, and to have for each of them not only formal, but substantial consideration. On a question of this magnitude it will not do for the Government either to sit in helpless dumbness or when they do rise, speak empty platitudes at the Table. They must apply themselves to the facts of the case, and endeavour, at least, to make some show of offering an intelligible answer to the arguments placed before them. The noble Marquess proposes to make it optional with the majority either to carry the whole of the remaining Amendments to a clause or to carry a clause by sections or instalments. That proposal distinctly makes the Rule worse, and more oppressive against minorities than ever. If the Rule stood as it was before the noble Marquess set his hand to it, the Government would be driven either to allow all the Amendments to be put, or to shut them all out, and that is a clear and intelligible issue; but the noble Marquess puts the thing in a new condition, because his proposal will enable the Government to pick out, say, five Amendments proposed by themselves or their Followers, and to shut out 50 that might be proposed by Members of the Opposition. The noble Marquess, while professing to come forward in the character of an advocate of the rights of minorities, has—I do not know whether by intention or inadvertence, but I should rather think by inadvertence—produced a result which practically extinguishes the right of Amendment in the hands of the Opposition, and leaves that right in the hands of the Government and the majority. Surely, that is an intolerable result. If the Rule is amended as suggested, it will be possible, with a sympathetic Chairman, to shut out all the Amendments of the Opposition, and to pass all those proposed by the Friends of the Government. It is easy to expose the hollow pretence that the Chairman will be a protection to a minority in the event of this Amendment being accepted. The Chairman will have to decide, on the spur of the moment, not whether one Amendment is substantial, but whether all of them are substantial or not. We have all heard of "Admirable Crichton;" but Admirable Crichton would only be an ignorant rustic compared with the Gentleman who could satisfactorily decide such a matter as that. We have Bills dealing with the condition of work in factories, Bills dealing with the conditions under which vessels should be allowed to go to sea, Bills dealing with mining matters, and Bills affecting all questions of industry, brought before us from time to time; and will anyone pretend to tell me that either the Speaker or the Chairman will take upon himself, in regard to such measures, without a committee of experts at his elbow, to say whether or not certain Amendments are substantial or are frivolous? Why, by exercising this Rule the House will make itself the laughing stock of the country, and will soon be rudely compelled to alter its regulations.

Mr. Sarton

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): So long as the opportunity is permitted to me I, for one, intend to offer the strongest protest against the proposed Rule. I do so now, it is true, for the last time; but I wish to say that I certainly hope to live to see the day when the Rule will be used against the Government opposite. I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers), who has just said that he intended to vote for the Amendment of the noble Marquess, that this Amendment is likely to interfere with the operation of the Rule, and I would invite him not to vote for it. He will find, in the future, that this provision moved by the noble Marquess will prevent the real stringency of this Rule, as it will prevent its being put in operation in an honest and fair sense. Under the circumstances, it will only be found to hit the Party sitting on these Benches. We have not had an opportunity of considering the Rule as a whole. The Government have refused to accept the request of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) to put the Rule and Amendments down as a whole, so that the House might consider it. It was only when this Amendment was proposed that we grew into the importance of this particular matter. We heard the purport of it suggested on Wednesday; but until hon. Gentlemen came down this morning they were not aware that they were to have submitted to them a Rule to prevent the putting of Amendments. I would especially beg the right hon. Gentleman and the Members of his Party not to vote for the Amendment of the noble Marquess on these grounds. They have no guarantee whatever that it is proposed to make this a Standing Order applicable to every state of facts; there is no guarantee that it is bond fide. I say it is not intended bond fide so far as the general Business of the House is concerned. We have pressed—and pressed in vain—for an answer to our demand, do you intend to make it a Standing Order? We have got no answer—no sufficient answer to that question.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I have said distinctly that it is the intention of the Government to make this a Standing Order. As soon as the Rule is passed we propose to ask the House to make it a Standing Order; but I said we could not undertake to have another debate upon it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: When they have got their closure, when they have got this Rule, all they have to do to make it a Standing Order is to apply the closure instantaneously. The right hon. Gentleman will not have another debate; he has the power in his own hands under his newly-forged machinery. I appeal to Liberal Members not to support in the Lobby the Amendment of the noble Marquess. I infinitely prefer the Rule as it stood. It will protect the Tory Party in any Bills they may bring in; it will strike at us alone. I beg the Liberal Party, unless they have a distinct pledge that it will be made a Standing Order, not to allow this Rule to be used against us—not to be used to push forward a Coercion Bill against our liberties, as dear to us as are their liberties to them.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 278; Noes 100: Majority 178.—(Div. List, No. 60.)

MR. CHANCE: On a point of Order, Sir, may I ask if my Amendment, of which I have given you Notice, will not come in after line 11, before the Amendment next on the Paper?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman has been good enough to give me the words, but they would not be in Order; they deal with a point the House has already decided. The hon. Member for North Meath (Mr. Mahony) has given notice of an Amendment after line 11, but there are several objections to it; it is not consistent with previous parts of the clause; the first part has already been decided by the House, and the second portion deals with the point raised by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), who has precedence, seeing that his Amendment has been on the Paper for some time, while the hon. Member for North Meath has only given Notice just now.

MR. PARNELL: Will it not be competent for one of us to move, previous to the end of the Rule, an Amendment providing that Amendments that are shut out from discussion by the adoption of the Rule in its application to a clause in Committee on a Bill, may be put from the Chair, but without debate, as was done under the Rules of Urgency in 1881? I would respectfully submit that is a point not yet decided—the question of putting Amendments which are on the Paper, and which may be shut out from debate by the application of the closure. It is a novel question not yet decided by the House. I venture to think it would be fair to afford us the opportunity of raising the question whether the Rule shall or shall not provide that such Amendments as I have described shall be put from the Chair.

MR. SPEAKER: It would not be competent for an hon. Member to move that, inasmuch as the House has decided that the Question may be put, disposing, no doubt, of the following Amendments. The words of the Rule have been modified by the Amendment just agreed to, and do not preclude substantial Amendments, and it would be competent for the Chair to put the Question in such a shape, that “such words stand part of the Clause” as to preserve substantial Amendments. This will cover the exact point to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

MR. PARNELL: My point, Sir, is this. The Rule, so far as we have proceeded, has reference to the stopping of debate; that point only has been decided. But the further question as to putting the Question in reference to Amendments after the debate has been stopped, has not yet been decided. That is my point, and I submit we ought to have some opportunity of asking the House to decide that this Rule should not be more stringent in its application than were the Rules of Urgency in 1881.

MR. SPEAKER: That is precisely the question that I have just now decided. The Amendments standing next on the Paper in the name of the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) are out of Order. They are four in number. The hon. and learned Gentleman proposes, in line 12, after the word “Motions,” to insert “if they have been discussed for one hour,” which Motions, or Closure Motions, the House has decided are to be decided without debate. The first Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman proposes one hour's discussion of such Motions; but the House would stultify its previous decision by entering upon this Amendment. The second Amendment to the same line is to leave out “shall,” and insert “may in the discretion of the Chair.” To adopt this would seem to impose on the Chair a different liability to that proposed by the first stage of the Rule. The first stage reads “shall,” and if in the second place it be in the discretion of the Chair to do or not, then these two directions seem to be inconsistent the one with the other. The whole question of the discretion of the Chair is settled by the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, and the House would stultify its action if it were to allow a discretion to the Chair in the latter case not allowed on the previous stage. Again, the hon. and learned Member proposes to insert after the word “decided,” the words “by a Division but.” At present two Members may call a Division; but the effect of the hon. and learned Member's Amendment would be that a Division must be taken whether there is a wish for it or not. The last of the four Amendments I rule out of Order for the same reason that the first one is out of Order. The House has decided that the leave of the Chair may be asked, or rather the veto of the Chair challenged, without any debate; therefore the Amendment would be contrary to what the House has already decided.

Mr. Speaker

MR. T. M. HEALY: With reference to the second Amendment, Sir, may I ask whether you have considered the fact that my words, “may in the discretion of the Chair,” have reference to the putting of the clause, not to the putting of the clôture? The Question, “That this Clause stand part of the Bill” has no reference to the Previous Question of the clôture. My point is that in the putting the clause some discretion should be allowed to the Chair. You might have a Bill consisting of one long clause. A new system of draftsmanship may arise in which you have not the divisions of sections and sub-sections, and what I wish to draw attention to is that in a Bill of this character the Chairman should have a discretion. I submit to your ruling; but I ask your attention to this point, that the discretion of the Chair would be in regard to what I will call a new system of drafting; it is wholly detached from the putting of the clôture with which the first part of the Rule deals.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Gentleman will see that his Amendment affects "such Motions," not such Motion; it affects the whole of the Motions. I can assure the hon. and learned Gentleman I have considered the point, and for the reasons I have given rule the Amendment out of Order.

MR. T. M. HEALY: To obviate the difficulty I will make my Amendment in the singular, not the plural.

MR. SPEAKER: That would be inconsistent with the reference to the several Motions in the second paragraph.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is quite right, Sir. I will ask you later as to the introduction of a Proviso to the second portion of the Rule. I think we are entitled to ask the judgment of the House on the question whether a Division should be allowed on putting the clause under the Clôture Motion.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): In the absence of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), I beg leave to move the Amendment standing in his name with reference to the application of the clause in Committee of Supply.

MR. SPEAKER: I am not quite sure—for I have not the words before me—but I think an Amendment the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) desires to move will come first.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): Mr. Speaker, it appears to me it is necessary to have some safeguard in this matter. What I am anxious to press upon the House is this—When, by the action of a Member, the assent of the Chairman not being withheld, the debate upon a clause to which there are Amendments is closed, and there are other substantial Amendments to the clause which are thereby shut out from discussion, then I submit that the Speaker or Chairman should state distinctly why he allows Amendments of that kind to be shut out. I mentioned this suggestion earlier, and I think that at the time it was received with some favour. It would be perfectly impossible now, after 1 o'clock, to discuss this fully; but, with the leave of the House, I will state exactly what the words are of the Proviso which I shall propose to insert at the end of the 12th line—

"Provided that whenever the Chair does not withhold its assent to a Motion of Closure which, if carried, would withdraw from consideration any Amendment of which Notice has been given, the Chair shall declare whether such an Amendment is an abuse of the Rules of the House, or has been sufficiently discussed under some other form."

Now, Sir, that lays down distinctly that Amendments shall not be shut out except upon two grounds, either that they are an abuse of the Rules of the House or that they have been sufficiently discussed in some other form; and I believe that that is as great a safeguard as we can hope to get. I think the House will hardly wish me to repeat the arguments in support of it which I urged at an earlier hour. I ask you to put the Question to the House, and I trust it will receive the support of all who, while admitting to the full the value of the closure, are not anxious to see the exclusion from debate of important Amendments.

Amendment proposed,

In line 12, after the word "Debate," to insert the words "Provided that whenever the Chair does not withhold its assent to a Motion of Closure which, if carried, would withdraw from consideration any Amendment of which Notice has been given, the Chair shall declare whether such an Amendment is an abuse of the Rules of the House, or has been sufficiently discussed under some other form."—(Mr. Childers.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen) (St. George's, Hanover Square): I do not think we can accept the words of this Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman. He said the suggestion had been received with some favour, but I cannot assent to that. The right hon. Gentleman has now put on the Chair the duty of giving reasons for its decision, and the task of declaring with regard to every Amendment why it is shut out. One of the reasons to be given is that it has been sufficiently discussed, but if some of the Amendments to be excluded have not been discussed at all how could the Chairman say they had been adequately discussed?

[Eleventh Night.]

Mr. CHILDERS: The right hon. Gentleman does not seem quite to understand. I want the Chair to give the reasons for excluding Amendments.

Mr. GOSCHEN: Yes; before many of them have been discussed. The right hon. Gentleman is inviting the Chair to say with regard to Amendments not yet discussed, whether or not they have been adequately discussed. Is not that so?

Mr. CHILDERS: Providing that the general principle has already been adequately discussed under some other form. I do not ask that there shall be any statement of reasons on the first application of the closure, but when Amendments are shut out from debate I think we ought to have a reason.

Mr. GOSCHEN: But it cannot be a reason with regard to adequate discussion, because the Amendments will not have been discussed at all. The Chair might say that the Amendments ought to be discussed; but these are not the words of the Amendment. Then the next point is whether the Amendments are an abuse of the Rules of the House. Now, frivolous and superfluous Amendments are not exactly a breach of the Rules of the House, although the discussion of them could only obstruct the progress of Business. A right hon. Member just now alluded to the case of 50 or 100 Amendments being suddenly given to the Chairman in Committee with regard to one clause; and it was asked how a Chairman could possibly discriminate between them. That is just one of the matters we have to deal with, for to allow unlimited Amendments means unlimited opportunities of preventing Business being done. The House has already practically decided in favour of limiting the number of Amendments. I would submit to the House that the Amendment increases the danger and responsibilities of the Chair by calling upon it to give reasons for excluding every Amendment. I venture to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should withdraw his Amendment.

Sir UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has just admitted that handing in a large number of Amendments to the Chair might be an abuse of the Rules of the House. It is precisely at that kind of abuse—the handing in of frivolous Amendments—that the Amendment of my right hon. Friend is aimed. He asks the House to restrict the power of excluding Amendments from discussion to two classes of cases—the first when there is an abuse of the Rules of the House, and the second where the subject of the Amendment has not been adequately discussed.

Mr. GOSCHEN: The Amendment sets forth either that it is an abuse of the Rules of the House, or that it has been sufficiently discussed. It says nothing about the subject.

Sir UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The meaning is obvious; that the subject has been already sufficiently discussed. A great distinction exists between closure after adequate debate and the power of exclusion from debate.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I am not uninclined to move the Adjournment of the House, not merely because of the lateness of the hour, but also because of the difficulty of dealing with an Amendment of such great importance without having had time to consider it. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer a few moments ago spoke of the handing in of a number of Amendments to the Chairman of Committee as an abuse of the Rules; and one reason he gave was that as they were not on the Paper hon. Members would not have an opportunity of considering them properly. I am afraid that if that Rule had been applied with rigidity the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury would have been found guilty of an abuse of the Rules of the House on more than one occasion in the course of these important and complicated discussions; for we have been called upon to discuss several important Amendments without having them in print before us. Why, even the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with his fertile imagination, has failed to grasp the purport of the Amendment before the House. He asks how can the Speaker declare an Amendment to have been adequately discussed when it has not been discussed at all? Surely that is an entire misapprehension; all the Speaker is to be called upon to say is whether the subject raised by the Amendment has already been adequately discussed. The words of the Amendment are—"Sufficiently discussed in some other form." Surely that is a reasonable proposition. What would be the operation of the Rule as at present framed? Suppose the House is discussing a clause with three sub-sections. There is a long debate on the first sub-section, which deals with one matter. To the two next sub-sections which each of them deal with different matters, there are Amendments. Does the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer mean to contend that because the first sub-section has been sufficiently discussed we are not to have the right to discuss the different subjects raised by the second and third sub-sections? Yet that is the logical and inevitable issue of the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) whether my interpretation of the Amendment—that the point is that the subject has been discussed in some other form—is not correct.

MR. CHILDERS: The words are, "Under some other form."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite will see I was justified in saying there was a difference of opinion as to the meaning of the Amendment, which I say is a perfect safeguard against two evils. It is, on the one hand, a safeguard against frivolous Amendments which raise the same question over and again; while, on the other hand, it prevents the exclusion of Amendments raising wholly distinct and substantial issues to those which have been already discussed. I say we require these safeguards for the protection of the liberties of the House and the liberties of discussion, unless indeed we are to understand that the Rules are to be made as tyrannical and as oppressive as possible, and in the calm and comforting assurance that they will be used only against the Irish Members.

MR. GEDGE (Stockport): It seems to me that this is a clever attempt to induce the House to reverse what it has already done, and to go back upon itself. We have already decided that the clôture is only to be applied if the Chair does not withhold its assent—that is if it is silent; and now to ask the Chair to state its reasons for not allowing certain Amendments to be discussed is, to my mind, to ask the House to give a decision contrary to the one it has already arrived at.

MR. CHILDERS: The Amendment I have proposed is not one to the part of the Rule the hon. Member is dealing with. It only affects the discussion of a clause in Committee.

MR. GEDGE: But the second part of the Rule takes its power from the first. The words are, "The assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld." The words "as aforesaid" clearly refer to the first part.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): This is evidently a very important Amendment, and every word has its importance, and although we have been discussing it some time, very few of the hon. Members seem to agree as to what it means. I hardly think that persons of average ability, like myself and many others in this House, can grasp the Amendment unless we see it on paper. It is now half-past 1, and it seems to me to be desirable that the debate should be adjourned. I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Labouchere.)

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I hope that the House will not adjourn this debate. The right hon. Gentleman opposite stated his Amendment two or three times in the course of the evening, and therefore it does appear to me that the House is in a position to give a decision on the subject. I do not wish to undervalue its importance, but it has been stated to the House, the House thoroughly comprehends it, and I think that in justice to the House itself it ought now to be decided.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I think the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury ought to consent to the adjournment. He should remember that we sat up till 2 o'clock last night and voted away £500,000, and that we gave £100,000 for an invention. We do not wish to obstruct the Government, and we think the Government should reciprocate our kindness and not keep us out of our beds after half-past

[Eleventh Night.]

1. I put it to the House, if one-third of the Members on the Government Benches do not look as if they would be much better in their beds? I took an active part in Committee last night, and I find myself quite incapable of properly weighing the merits of this Amendment, particularly as it is not on paper. I think the request of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) is a reasonable one, and I would remind the First Lord of the Treasury that a little courtesy is due to the Front Bench opposite. This is an Amendment brought forward by a leading Statesman on the Opposition side of the House, and it ought not to be decided at an hour when hon. Members are worn out with fatigue. I hope the First Lord of the Treasury will consent to the Motion.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): I am quite sure that we on this side of the House are completely willing that the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Galway (Colonel Nolan) and his Party should go home to bed. However, I hope that the House will not adjourn because an Amendment has been proposed which nobody can understand. If the House consents to adjourn on such grounds, I do not see how any progress can possibly be made with the Business, for every hon. Gentleman who takes it into his head can propose impossible Amendments. If hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House retired to bed, we should make considerable progress. But I think that this side of the House is determined, if possible, that the Business of the country shall be advanced; and, therefore, I urgently appeal to the Government that they will not consent to the adjournment of the House, but will proceed with the Business which the country expects them to do.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I would urge upon the Government that in regard to the question whether the House should now rise, there is some consideration due to the Front Opposition Bench, recollecting the late hour of night at which we have now arrived. It is not at all likely that an Amendment of this character should be disposed of to-night; but even if it could, I must say before I could consent to go on with the Business the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) would make me hesitate. In his speech, instead of going into the merits of this matter, he intimated that whereas the Amendment had been received with some favour now, he ventured to predict that it would not be received in a Division with such favour. If it were not for the secret treaties between certain right hon. Gentlemen on this side and on the other side, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have no means of stating beforehand how an Amendment not discussed would be likely to fare in a Division. I trust that the Government will consent to an adjournment, in order that we may have the whole merits of this case discussed. Those who, as a matter of right, have Amendments on the Paper should receive some little consideration, instead of having their Amendments extinguished wholesale.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): It was absolutely out of my power to put the Amendment on the Paper till this afternoon; for it was only suggested in an early part of the debate to-day, and I lost no time in bringing the Amendment up. I did my duty in that respect, and I can do no more. I am now entirely in the hands of the House. Everyone knows the inconveniences of adjournment, but that is for the House to decide. I, personally, am quite prepared to go on.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Everyone knows the great importance of this Amendment, and everyone will admit the great difficulty there is in understanding it. I submit, as one further reason why the debate should be adjourned, in order that the Amendment should be adequately discussed, that the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington) may come, if time is given, to see that this Amendment is desirable, just as he came to see a few days ago that a certain other Amendment was desirable. It is of the highest importance that these Rules should not be considered merely on the spur of the moment or hurriedly. Every time the Rules are under discussion new light is thrown upon them, and it is right that we should have the fullest acquaintance possible with their effects when they become law. As to this case, a man of large official experience proposes an Amendment, which we have not had an opportunity of studying; and are we to be told that the Amendment is unworthy of having a reasonable adjournment, when we know very well that the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) had more consideration shown to it? Are we to be told that though the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) is willing to support some change in the Rules proposed by the hon. Member for Cork, he would not support some modification of this Rule, which everybody admits to be of an extremely novel and, perhaps, of an extremely dangerous character? Hon. Members below the Gangway opposite confessed that they could not understand the Amendment; and that is because they have not had an opportunity of studying it. I appeal to them not to exhibit impatience, but to accept the adjournment, in order that they may have time to clearly understand these matters; and I ask the Government to remember that we are entitled to have a full and fair discussion of this important Amendment. I appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), who, after all, Sir, is willing, so far as he is able, to approach in a candid spirit the conduct of the affairs of this House, to say whether it is an unfair thing that we should have the opportunity we seek?

Colonel Nolan

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): It is difficult to see how there can be any misunderstanding of this Amendment. I consider, indeed, that hon. Gentlemen opposite under-rate their own intelligence in thinking that they do not understand the Amendment. I propose that the adjournment of the debate be withdrawn, and that we should be allowed to continue the discussion—at all events—for a short time, in order to see whether we can discover any meaning in the Amendment. I think myself that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) is totally unnecessary, and as simple to be understood as it is unnecessary.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I do not, Sir, deny to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) any satisfaction he may derive from being the heavy father of Her Majesty's Government; but I would suggest to him that we on this side are the best judges of our own intelligence. At the same time I am inclined to think that the right hon. Gentleman over-rates his own intelligence, if he makes it a little superior to that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen). I am not one of the personal or political admirers of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but I regard him as a man whose intelligence bears no comparison in this House. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) declares that the Amendment is extremely simple; but I would call attention to the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer entirely misunderstood the whole bearing and purpose of the Amendment. I would not accuse the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) of misrepresenting the Amendment, for he is a candid and relentless debater; but he either misrepresented or misunderstood it. In regard to the speech of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson), I must say that I would have expected a more sober and more impartial tone from him with the mantle of paulo-post future Office hanging over him. The hon. and gallant Gentleman—the future official—considers that the Business of the country should be conducted in the absence of one of the Parties of the State. As to the arguments of the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), when he complains that we have made very slow progress, besides being disposed to deny that, I would point out that we are now discussing questions more grave and momentous than any raised about any previous part of the Rule. If the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) had been able to say that the debate to-night had been confined to one section of the House, and especially to this section, I could understand some reason for the complaint; but, as a matter of fact, the debate has been either initiated or participated in by every, and some of the most important sections of the House.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somersetshire, Wells): I rise to Order. I want to know whether the hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) is justified, on a Motion for the adjournment of the debate, to discuss the whole question and subjects already discussed?

MR. SPEAKER: I do not think that if the hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) reviews the debate on this Motion he would be in Order.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Certainly, Sir; I thought I had not been making any references of that sort.

[Eleventh Night.]

Mr. SPEAKER: It is my opinion that is what the hon. Member has been doing.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR: I will not then, Sir, proceed any further in that way. I was arguing that the progress in the House was not slow in comparison with the gravity of the questions raised. It seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) thinks it his duty to make an appeal not to the reason of the House, but to Party passion. I do not think that that way of meeting his political opponents adds to the dignity of the House or the good feeling and temper of debate.

Mr. A. R. D. ELLIOT (Roxburgh, N.): I do not think that the Business to-night has been one bit slower in progress than the Business during the last three weeks. We have got through 14 lines after sitting three weeks. This sort of thing is becoming very serious, and I think it is absurd that the Business of the House should be conducted in this manner. I hope that the Government will to-night, and on future nights, press forward these Rules of Procedure. I protest against the slowness of progress, and I think that the Government should be determined to see that the Business in this House is done well and quickly.

Mr. PARNELL: The hon. Member (Mr. H. Elliot) has thought proper to treat the House to a lecture as to the way the Business of the House should be conducted; but I submit, inasmuch as the hon. Member has not been remarkable for his attendance during this evening, that he is not a particularly good judge as to the way in which the Business of the House has been carried on this evening, or as to the grounds upon which an adjournment of the debate is sought. What is all this clamour and outcry raised about by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and by hon. Gentlemen who have deserted their Party sitting above the Gangway on this side? It is raised for a purpose not connected with the subject under discussion. It is raised for a political purpose outside the question. It is raised to prejudice the position of the Irish Members in this House. It is raised for the purpose of making an attempt to close our mouths before there is power to do it. And what is the Party that raises this outcry—an outcry which is premeditated? It is a Party which in 1882—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must say that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Parnell) is wandering from the immediate point. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to be more relevant.

Mr. PARNELL: I submit that if the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Ayrshire (Mr. H. Elliot) is entitled to get up and make the speech of the character he has made, that I am entitled to reply.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for North Ayrshire has merely referred to the length of time which the debate has taken, and urged that as a reason why it should be brought to a close.

Mr. PARNELL: I am merely desirous, Mr. Speaker, of showing, as a reason in support of the adjournment of this debate, that a debate in a previous year, on a similar question, occupied a very much longer time. In the debate during 1882, on the Rules of Procedure, a Rule, not nearly so stringent as the one now under consideration, occupied 19 nights to discuss.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman knows that the sole question is whether the debate should be adjourned.

Mr. PARNELL: Yes, Sir; and the length of the discussions which have already taken place has been brought forward as an argument by the hon. Member for North Ayrshire as a reason why we should not be allowed the adjournment in question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. Gentleman to Order. [Cries of "Oh!" and "Name!"] Order, order, order! I must ask the hon. Member not to be wandering from the subject under consideration. I must beg him to confine himself to the subject immediately before the House.

Mr. PARNELL: I shall do my best to do so. I submit, Sir, that neither the time which we have taken this evening, nor on any other evening, is an argument why we should not be allowed further time to discuss the Amendment brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers). I earnestly submit that we are entitled to further time for the discussion of this question. So far, we have occupied 11 nights only over this Rule; and I submit to the House that 11 nights is not an excessive time for a discussion on a question of such great, grave, and urgent importance, giving, as it does, to the Government stringent powers in regard to the government of Ireland. We ought to be very careful how we allow our mouths to be shut, before we have put before the House our reasons for asking hon. Members to accede to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers). I believe that proposal, Sir, to be a most valuable and important one. I believe that if we have further time for its discussion—

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London): I rise to Order, Sir. I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. Member is in Order in discussing the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh on a Motion for Adjournment.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member was not, at the time, discussing the Amendment.

MR. PARNELL: I thank you, Sir, for protecting me from interruptions which are not now made for the first time. I was saying, when the hon. Baronet interposed, that if we were afforded more time for the discussion of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh, it would be made apparent to the sense and judgment of the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith), and of the Government generally, that the Amendment is one on which some concession ought to be granted to us. It is not reasonable to ask us to take an Amendment of this character at this hour of the night. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has himself put down a proposal, in a subsequent Rule, to close all Business in this House at 12 o'clock at night. Is it consistent, then, on his part, to ask us to carry on Business at 2 o'clock in the morning—two hours after the time fixed by himself for the stoppage of all opposed Business? I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, as a man of business, and as a man of common sense, to be consistent in this matter. I would ask him what he expects to gain by the course he is now pursuing? Does he think that scenes of turbulence—I will not say scenes of disorder—are going to benefit his Government? I do not believe that he can think so. Surely, in the discussion of a Closure Rule, more than in the discussion of anything else, he should do what he can to facilitate that freedom of debate which he is going, by this Rule, to put an end to. It is not at a time when the House of Commons is turning its back on all its ancient traditions that the right hon. Gentleman should make an attempt to fetter and infringe upon the liberty of debate, as he is doing to-night, by attempting prematurely to conclude the discussion upon the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh. Even culprits under the lash are allowed to say what they please when the punishment is being inflicted. Surely, the Members of this House, during the process of shutting, and padlocking, and double-locking their mouths, should be allowed to say what they think ought to be said on such an Amendment as this. Then, Sir, we have now reached that portion of the Rule where the Proviso comes in. Everybody knows that the beginning of the end has been reached, and that the Minister in charge of the Rule is able to look forward to the near conclusion of his labours and responsibilities. The right hon. Gentleman is certainly putting on an unnecessary spur when he adopts the attitude he has taken up to-night, in asking the House, when we are within sight of the conclusion of these debates, to go on at such an unreasonable hour, and in exciting the two sides of the House to irritation, anger, and frenzy against each other.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I hope, Sir, we may be able to settle this question without anger or frenzy, or any serious difficulty. I would submit to hon. Members opposite that it is a sufficient reason for going forward that we have arrived at such a point that we have only to dispose of this single Amendment to get to the end of an important paragraph in the Rule. This Amendment disposed of, we shall all be able to go to bed at our ease. I think, Sir, that the difficulty which has been raised is entirely owing to the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) who is responsible for the Amendment. Though it is quite true that it may have been difficult for him to have given Notice of it earlier, it must be remembered that it comes at the conclusion of the discussion on the Amendment of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), which is on the Paper, and that there is no question of surprise, except that to which we have been treated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers). But, Sir, surely we know this question by heart. We have studied it day after day. And it does not require a high degree of intelligence to appreciate the effect of the Amendment. I hope that hon. Members opposite will allow us, in a friendly way, to go forward; that this Motion will be withdrawn, and that we shall get to Business, and show the country that we are in earnest, and do not intend to be turned into a laughing-stock.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Mr. Speaker, before you put the Question, I wish to raise a point of Order. I wish to ask you, whether the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Eccleall Division of Sheffield (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) and the Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) are in Order in shouting "Question!" from below the Bar?

MR. SPEAKER took no notice of the Question.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 94; Noes 223: Majority 129.—(Div. List, No. 61.)

MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish, Sir, to make an appeal to the House again. ["No, no!"] Some hon. Gentlemen sitting below the Gangway at once say "No;" but I hope that they will be convinced, by what I am about to say, that it is, on the whole, desirable that some decision should be taken on the Amendment moved by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Childers), and that then we should conclude our labours for to-night. I think, Sir, the House will feel that, the right hon. Gentleman having had an opportunity of repeatedly stating his views during the course of the evening, we are really in a better position to arrive at a decision on the question he has raised than we should be if we were to adjourn before doing so. I therefore hope that the House will accept the suggestion I make, that we should divide at once, or, if necessary, discuss the Amendment further, and avoid further delays by way of Motions for Adjournment, which certainly do not conduce to the credit of this House, and which only result in wasting the time that might more properly be used in discussing the Amendment.

MR. CHILDERS: There is no Question strictly before the House; but I hope I may be allowed, by the courtesy of the House, to follow the right hon. Gentleman. I said before, that, speaking for myself, I was quite prepared to go on; but that it was for the House to decide whether we should go on or not. Now, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith) has made a proposal that the present Amendment should be discussed and disposed of, and that the other Amendments should be postponed till Monday. I am given to understand, Sir, through the usual channels, that it is very likely that our Sittings may be greatly prolonged to-morrow. If that be the case, I can only appeal to the House and to my hon. Friends, after the last Division, which has shown such a large majority in favour of concluding this Business now, not to persist further, or to keep us up till a very late hour to-night.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): Mr. Speaker, I, for one, cannot follow the advice of the right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed us. I think, Sir, that the present issue is so exceedingly grave that I must protest against carrying on this debate at so utterly unusual and unreasonable an hour. I beg, Sir, to move the adjournment of the House. I will make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith). The right hon. Gentleman ought not to be surprised if, in endeavouring to carry Rules of this kind, he should meet with a considerable amount of difficulty. I do not think he should be surprised, because we have not succeeded, after 11 nights' debate, in disposing of this matter. What does he expect when our nervous systems are so utterly exhausted? ["No, no!"] I speak for myself; but the conduct of hon. Gentlemen opposite looks as if their nervous systems were exhausted. I would beg the right hon. Gentleman to think better of the matter, and to allow us a little more time to consider the issue before us, and to recollect our somewhat scattered senses.

MR. McLAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): Mr. Speaker, I beg to second the Motion.

Sir Richard Paget

I also am not able to follow the advice of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh, who is taking the lead on the Front Opposition Bench at the present moment. If it were possible to dispose of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman in a short debate, it would be another matter. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) has asked us to go on with the debate. I should like to know how long it would last? If the Amendment could be disposed of in half-an-hour's debate, I should say we had better go on. If, however, it is to be debated at the same length as have been other proposals of similar importance, it is obvious that it will require a discussion of a couple of hours, and, that being so, I think we ought to adjourn. There are many hon. Gentlemen who would not stay until the debate had concluded, and, therefore, when we took a Division, we should have only a very small House. I think we shall really gain time by adjourning now, and coming fresh to this subject on Monday or Tuesday. I may say that I think it would facilitate debates very greatly if the Government were willing, as a rule, to adjourn at about 1 o'clock; because the only effect of resisting Motions for adjournment after that hour is to waste time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
 (Mr. Pictou.)

Mr. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I join in the appeal which has been made to the Government to allow us to go home. Half-past 2 o'clock in the morning is far too late, or rather far too early, an hour at which to discuss any subject whatever. I know, Sir, from communications I have received, that my constituents are of opinion that 11 o'clock is the hour at which the proceedings of this House ought to close, and I am perfectly certain that they would entertain a very poor opinion of my character if they knew I was here at half-past 2 in the morning. It is a well-known physiological fact that, after 12 o'clock at night, the emotional centres of the brain are unduly excited. That is a sound reason why we should not fly into the face of nature, and attempt to carry on discussions at these preposterous hours. There is also an especial reason, applicable to the present occasion, why we should not go on any longer. We have arrived at a very interesting and a very important point in a very important Rule. We have discussed the closure under this Rule, and we have now come to the treatment of Amendments. Hon. Members on both sides must recognize that the mode of dealing with a multiplicity of Amendments must be a very different one to that required to deal with an undue prolongation of debate in the House; it is a question of very great difficulty and delicacy. The Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) is of a very important character. It is attended with some difficulty, and it requires to be studied in relation not only to its own terms, but to every word of the Rule into which it is proposed to be introduced; and, not having the words of the Amendment in print, it is impossible for us to form a judgment of the whole effect. These are abundant and adequate reasons why we should not attempt to continue the discussion now.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I hope I am correct in thinking I detect some gleams of a compromise in the manner of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith). I am quite sure he will consider a suggestion I can offer in a reasonable spirit. It is wholly impossible for us to continue the debate to-night on this particular point. I think hon. Gentlemen will take that as conceded. On the other hand, if we go to a Division immediately, and the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) is negatived, we shall have lost all chance of impressing the minds of the Government and of the noble Marquess, who has shown himself open to the consideration of this point. We shall lose a valuable opportunity, for it is rather a hard case to go on with the discussion now. Will then the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) consider with his Friends—I put it to him tentatively—Suppose the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh withdrawn, instead of being negatived, will the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord consider the point raised between now and the next occasion when this Rule is under discussion, and in a responsible spirit? The noble Marquess has shown himself reasonable so far as his views go, though we do not agree with them. I have no right to make the suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment (Mr. Childers); but if he does agree to it, will the Government undertake to consider in a reasonable spirit before the next occasion what is at the bottom of this contention for which we have been struggling? I do not know whether the idea finds favour with those around me; I hope it may, and it will show we have no desire to prolong this discussion, while we desire, as everybody must who has had experience of these things, the evils of a prolonged Sitting. We desire to spare ourselves and the officers of the House as much as possible; do not let us stay here over a profitless wrangle. I know there has been some interchange of views in the Lobby between Members of the Government, the right hon. Gentleman and the noble Marquess, and I hope they have seen their way to indicate some release from our disagreeable position. I appeal to the Government, under the circumstances, seeing that this proposal has come from a distinguished and authoritative source, seeing the great amount of feeling that is manifested by a great many of us, and seeing that we have arrived at this late hour, I am not unreasonable in making the suggestion in which I hope the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) will participate, that the Amendment, instead of being negatived, should be withdrawn, allowing the matter to germinate in the minds of the Government for the next day or two. I offer the suggestion in no factious spirit, but in a spirit of conciliation and a desire for a reasonable release from the impasse in which we find ourselves.

[Eleventh Night.]

MR. CHILDERS: I have had no communication with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. T. M. Healy), and his proposal comes before us without any suggestion from myself. I can only say I desire to be entirely in the hands of the House. I regret sincerely the sort of impasse we have reached, and I will do anything in my power to release the House from this position. I am quite prepared, if the House desires it, to withdraw my Motion, trusting to the Government to consider, between this and Tuesday, in what way they can deal with the very important question to which I have endeavoured to draw attention. I fully admit that the Amendment is of a character that requires Notice; but I have explained it was out of my power to put a Notice on the Paper. I would propose then not to postpone, but to withdraw my Motion, and it would, I think, be unusual to refuse to allow me to do so. I beg leave to ask to withdraw my Amendment.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. SPEAKER: There is a Motion for Adjournment before the House.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not quite sure if I am in Order in referring to another Motion the right hon. Gentleman has intimated his intention to make. The right hon. Gentleman seeks to withdraw his Amendment; I offer no opposition; but it must not be understood that we enter into any engagement with regard to that Amendment, simply because I do not see my way to meet the object the right hon. Gentleman desires, and it is not my way to hold out expectations that I do not see my way to fulfil. I offer no opposition to the withdrawal of the Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I would suggest after what the right hon. Gentleman has said, my hon. Friend (Mr. Picton) may withdraw his Motion for the Adjournment.

MR. PICTON: I beg leave to withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CHILDERS: I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, as amended again proposed.

Debate arising.

Debate further adjourned till Tuesday next.

MOTIONS.

CORONERS' ELECTIONS.

On Motion of Mr. Wootton Isaacson, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Election of Coroners, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Wootton Isaacson.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [10.11.10.]

MERCHANDISE MARKS LAW CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr Attorney General, Bill to consolidate and amend the Law relating to Fraudulent Marks on Merchandise, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Attorney General, Baron De Worms, and Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 194.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Three o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, 14th March, 1887.

MINUTES.]—SAT FIRST IN PARLIAMENT—The Earl of Chesterfield, after the death of his father.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis)* (43).

Second Reading—Railway and Canal Traffic* (32); Incumbents of Benefices Loans Extension Act (1886) Amendment* (39); Church Sites (Compulsory Powers Repeal)* (22).

Committee—Justices' Jurisdiction* (24).

Third Reading—Truro Bishopric and Chapter Acts Amendment* (33), and passed.

PROVINCIAL ORDER BILL—First Reading—Local Government (Ireland) (Limerick Water)* (42).

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC BILL.

(The Lord Stanley of Preston.)

(NO. 32.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord STANLEY of PRESTON), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said: My Lords, the subject has more than once been brought before Parliament in "another place;" but, owing to certain circumstances this year, it was thought that it would perhaps be an advantage to introduce the Bill this time in your Lordships' House, and to have a certain amount of discussion upon the proposals made, in order to see what is necessary to be done, and what modification may become advisable, and whether any further application may be made for the safety and welfare of the community. As this is the first time the subject has been introduced into this House, I will ask your Lordships' permission to refer to the legislation that has taken place with regard to it in past times. I think, in connection with this subject, it is important to remember that the starting point of Railway legislation was somewhat different from the point of view in which we regard it now. Railway legislation started upon the assumption that the Railway was a common highway for the public, and that it replaced and represented the ordinary high road; and Railway Companies were therefore regarded rather as owners than carriers, and they were dealt with in that respect. But they gradually acquired the whole of the carrying way, as well as the ownership; and, therefore, legislation has to deal with them in the double capacity—first, as owners of the road; and, secondly, as carriers on their own lines. I believe that, by Common Law, it was the duty of a carrier to accept and carry all goods offered, according to a particular agreement and for reasonable compensation; but he might carry for payment passengers at a low rate, or even gratis. In fact, there was nothing whatever to prevent him from adopting a preferential tariff. Therefore, when Railways superseded other modes of transit, we had to consider how far restrictions should be made beyond those imposed by Common Law on persons who had come to be regarded as common carriers. Consequently, it was first done by the insertion of special clauses in any new Act. Next, the Chairman of Committees in this House required clauses to be inserted in every Bill, giving the names of the carriers, and in 1845, the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act embodied in a general Act the clauses it was thought expedient to retain in all Railway Acts passed by Parliament. In order to show the spirit in which these Acts deal with the Companies, I may refer to the 86th clause of the Act of 1845, which shows clearly the double capacity in which the Railway Companies at that time acted, and which after empowering the Companies to use locomotive engines, and to acquire carriages and waggons to be propelled thereby, and so forth, further empowered them to make such reasonable charges as they might determine in respect of them, not exceeding the toll authorized by their special Act. Railway legislation may be broadly divided into two parts—first, that of construction; and, secondly, that of combination; and the dividing line may be drawn between the years 1845 and 1848. Between those years various Committees sat, and one of them led to the Bill which was introduced in 1854, and which really forms, to all intents and purposes, the starting point of Railway legislation. That dealt with two matters—namely, it endeavoured to prevent undue preference, and to facilitate the forwarding of traffic. That Act continued in operation from 1854 to 1867, during which there was no general legislation, and, so far as I understand, no inquiry. Various charges and complaints having been made, the Railway Commission was appointed in 1865, under the Presidency of the Duke of Devonshire. That Commission went in great detail into the various matters that came before it, and it specially addressed itself to the inequality of the rates and fares, and the inequality of treatment under similar circumstances; and, especially, it considered the question of the restrictions which might be necessary or advisable to impose on the Railway Companies in respect of fares. The Commission found themselves face to face with a problem that was one of great difficulty, as to how far the inequality of rates and fares established under the Railway Act affected the Railway Companies on the one hand, and the rights of the public on the other. There was no doubt that the carrying trade brought the Railway Companies into competition with carriers by water and on the high roads, and frequently Companies had to reduce their rates below what they were obliged by their Acts to do, in order to bring the traffic on their own lines. The Commission reported, and the effect of their Report was that they did not consider it would be expedient, even if practicable, to adopt any legislation that would abolish the freedom Railway Companies enjoyed, to charge what rates and fares seemed expedient to them. In 1872, a strong Joint Committee was appointed of the Members of both Houses. They made a voluminous and interesting Report, and one of the chief results of that Committee was the Bill introduced, under which the present Railway Commission was appointed. That Commission, it is right to say, has, under great difficulties, discharged its duties thoroughly well; and, so far as I am aware, in all the proposals that were made in regard to Railway legislation, no proposal has ever been made to abolish the Commissioners in the sense of doing away with their duties. So far, up to the present time, the Act of 1872 is amply justified. The next time when the question of Railway legislation was brought before Parliament was in "another place," before the Committee presided over by Mr. Evelyn Ashley. That Committee sat in 1881 and 1882, and made numerous recommendations, many of which your Lordships will find embodied in the present Bill. I perhaps ought not, in this short review of Railway legislation, to pass by a Bill, introduced also in "another place" by Mr. Chamberlain, founded on somewhat more ambitious lines than those which preceded it, and which was withdrawn for reasons which it is not necessary here to specify; but I am bound to say of that Bill that it was carefully considered, that it was a bold attempt to arrive at a solution of the subject, and perhaps it was the fact of the dimensions of the Bill that somewhat prejudiced its passing in "another place." That Bill dropped, and the following year the Railway Companies introduced Bills of their own regulating the charges and rates, and dealing with the general question of traffic again; but there was a general feeling on the part of the House of Commons that that was not work which should be done by Private Bills, but that it should rather be done by a general and comprehensive Bill introduced on the authority of the Government in power. I come, then, to the Bill which was introduced in "another place" by my immediate Predecessor in my present Office (Mr. Mundella). Though that Bill met, on the whole, with a favourable reception, and was read a second time, events of which we are all aware prevented its further progress, and the subject up to the present time has remained undetermined. In presenting this Bill I cannot but acknowledge the assistance which I have received in the discussions that have taken place, and the negotiations between the various parties concerned. Whatever may be difficult or unsatisfactory, in connection with the subject, it is at least satisfactory to feel that there practically have been no difficulties of Party and no other consideration, save an earnest desire to arrive at an honest opinion in regard to the various provisions of the Bill; and that the same general policy appears to have been underlying the proposed action in all the Bills proposed, though it may have differed in detail, and to a certain extent in degree. I have said that the Commission of 1873 has worked well. I believe that is the general opinion. On the whole, it has done good service, and has been productive of good. It has checked a good many evils, and it has also, I believe, in some respect acted as a deterrent to extreme measures. The decisions have, in the main, given satisfaction to the trading community; and if it has not done all that was expected, that was because, in the first place, its jurisdiction has been limited by the Courts of Law acting by certiorari, or by prohibition, and it has been extremely difficult for the Commissioners to follow any fixed line of construction upon which the various Courts have acted. In the Bill which I ask your Lordships now to read a second time, though the constitution of the Commission will be somewhat altered, we propose to renew it, and we hope to strengthen it. The Bill differs in many essential details from the Bill introduced in "another place" last year; but it follows the same subject, and, together with that Bill, it follows the principle of excluding questions connected with safety, or with passenger traffic. We think, on the whole, if the Bill is to pass through Parliament at present, it is perhaps wise to limit its provisions to the establishment of a Commission, and to the question of rates and other similar matters, and to postpone, or at all events to put aside at the present time, any idea of the larger questions relating to passenger traffic, which I am afraid are thorny enough in themselves. As I have said, we renew the Commission, though we slightly alter its constitution. The Bill introduced by my Predecessor established a Commission, consisting of one Judge of the High Court in each country—that is, in England, Scotland, and Ireland—who was to act as the President of the Commission, and who was to be assisted by two permanent Commissioners. It had been suggested that the Commission should be established with two Commissioners, and with the Chief Commissioner having legal experience. There was much said for that proposal; but the arguments on the other hand were not without weight. There were those who held that the Chief Commissioner, even though technically of legal experience, might not have sufficient weight to define questions of law which might be far-reaching in their effect, and which might vitally affect the Railway legislation and the general legislation of the country. We thought there was weight in these objections. On the other hand, I did not feel that the greater portion of the work of the Railway Commission would be such as would justify and render it desirable for us to use the power of one of the Judges of the High Court on matters which, in some cases, might be almost administrative. We thought we should best meet, on the one hand, the desire that there should be the power of dealing with matters on the spot, and regulating any small detail; and, on the other hand, we thought we should best meet the arguments of those who urged, as we felt very truly, the necessity of bringing in the power of a Judge in the larger cases, by constituting the Commission as we have constituted it in the present Bill, and thus to a certain extent getting the advantage of both views. Your Lordships will therefore observe that the Bill abolishes the existing Railway Commission, and establishes in its place a new Commission, to sit in England, or, if the case require it, in Scotland or Ireland. There will be three permanently-appointed Commissioners and three ex officio Commissioners. The three appointed Commissioners will consist of a Chief Commissioner, to be appointed on the recommendation of the Lord Chancellor, who is to be a lawyer of experience, and two lay Members, to be appointed on the recommendation of the President of the Board of Trade, one of whom, at least, is to be experienced in Railway business and management. Of the ex officio Members, one is to be for England, one for Scotland, and one for Ireland, and these are to be Judges of the Superior Courts of the respective countries. Whenever a case of importance is to be heard, one of the ex officio Commissioners for the country in which the case is being heard is to attend and preside. I hope it will not be out of place if, in passing, I express my regret that the qualifications that will be required of the new Head of the Commission are unfortunately not possessed by the present Chief Commissioner. During all the troublous times that the Railway Commission has had to deal with, I think it cannot be said too strongly that Sir Frederick Peel, the Chief Commissioner under the Act of 1873, has exhibited a great amount of painstaking care, a desire to acquaint himself thoroughly with the duties he has to perform, and an earnest wish to do justice between the parties which, valuable as these may be in any public servant, have been of double value in the position which Sir Frederick Peel occupied. Though, naturally, his decisions, like decisions of other Judges, have not passed unchallenged, it has, I believe, been felt, even by those who differed from him, that his decisions have been characterized by a spirit of fairness and impartiality. With regard to the Commission itself, I need say very little in addition to directing attention to the provisions of the Bill; but I wish to point out this, and to emphasize it, that it is the duty of the Commissioners to request that the ex officio Member—that is the Judge—shall attend the hearing of any case in which his attendance is expedient for the better performance of their duty, and that that shall be necessary at the hearing of any case where it appears that the determination of it shall involve points of law. I have been asked whether it might not be found expedient to allow the ex officio Commissioner to attend at the wish of any of the parties who are concerned. That matter was carefully considered, and, on the whole, we came to the conclusion that it was better to leave the question in the hands of the Commissioners, and we feel certain that, acting on their responsibility, if an appeal was made to them by the parties to whom they thought they ought in justice to have regard, they would act in a way that would give satisfaction; and we considered it was better to leave the matter in the hands of the Commissioners than with the parties. We have also given power to the Commissioners to award to the complaining party who is aggrieved, such damages as they think just. I believe that, up to the present time, a curious anomaly has existed—that a complaint may be brought before the Commissioners, that it may be shown that it was perfectly well established, that the practice complained of might have to be discontinued, and an order given by the Commissioners that it would be discontinued; but, notwithstanding all that, in respect to any damage which accrued there was no remedy before the Commissioners, and the party aggrieved had to go and seek a remedy elsewhere. That we have now remedied. With respect to the question of appeals, we have thought, on the whole, that it was best that no appeal should lie from the Commissioners on questions of fact or questions of locus standi; but, subject to that qualification, there is to be an appeal direct to the Court of Appeal of the county in which the case is heard, with the further right of appeal by leave to the House of Lords. I know there are some who are against allowing frequency of appeal. It is thought that victory may rest with those who have the longest purse, rather than with those who may have right upon their side. But I believe that a great change of opinion in that respect has taken place in the minds of many of the trading community, formerly most opposed to those frequent appeals. Whether there is not an advantage on one side as well as the other, I am not prepared to say; but I believe that this provision is freely accepted by the public at large. I now pass to another part of the Bill, which more directly affects our Parliamentary procedure. Clause 24 deals with revised classification of traffic and preferential rates. It provides that every Railway Company, 12 months after the commencement of this Act, shall submit to the Board of Trade a revised classification of traffic and Schedule of proposed maximum rates and charges. When the scheme has been submitted to the Board of Trade, and made public in such a way as may be directed, the Board of Trade will then consider that classification and the maximum rates of charge, and any objections thereto which they may receive. If, after hearing all the parties, the Board of Trade come to a satisfactory agreement with the Railway Company as to the classification and Schedule, they are to embody the classification and Schedule in a Provisional Order, and make a Report thereon to Parliament; and as soon as possible after making the Provisional Order, they are to take care that a Bill is introduced into either House of Parliament, and this Provisional Order will, if approved by Parliament, pass into law without any further opposition. Up to this point my Predecessor and myself are agreed; but as I found matters as they were left in the draft of the Bill and in the amended Bill, if the Railway Companies and the Board of Trade did not come to an agreement as to the Company's classification and Schedules, the Board of Trade will determine what, in their opinion, should be the classification and Schedule, and will make a Report to be submitted to Parliament on the subject. I submit to your Lordships that that is a position of affairs which does not appear to be very satisfactory. It was thought that public opinion would have sufficient weight to make the Railway Companies come to an agreement with the Board of Trade; but I am bound to say that it seems a procedure derogatory to the dignity of Parliament that a dilatory or recalcitrant Railway Company should have power to bring matters to a deadlock by avoiding a duty which Parliament has put upon them. I am by no means anxious, if it can be avoided, that the Board of Trade should take the initiative in this matter; and as far as possible it has been our object that the initiative should be taken by the Railway Company; but as some one must act, it is better that the initiative should be taken by that Department than that it shall be a matter of uncertainty. The Bill provides that after the lapse of one Session, during which the Board of Trade Report will have been before the public, it will be open to the Railway Company to apply to the Board of Trade to embody the scheme proposed by the Board of Trade in a Provisional Order; or if the Railway Company did not take action in the matter, the Board of Trade may embody the scheme prepared by them in a Provisional Order, which, when introduced into Parliament, will be referred to a Select Committee, before whom the Railway Company or any objectors will be able to appear in order to oppose, as in the case of a Private Bill. In any case, the classification and Schedule ultimately approved by Parliament will become the classification and Schedule of the Railway Company in place of its existing rates and charges. One word to remove a misinterpretation which has come to my knowledge, and that is, that it has been supposed that from time to time the Railway Company would be subjected to a re-classification of rates. This is not the way in which we view this Bill. We think, and it is provided in the Bill, that the rates and Schedules might be proposed on the assumption that it is a fixed classification and a fixed maximum, until, at all events, Parliamentary powers are given to supersede them. Now comes a clause—25—on which I am afraid a great deal of discussion will necessarily take place, and that is with regard to the question of what constitutes undue preference. We have provided in that clause, that inequalities of charges to different traders and districts, and difference in treatment of goods forwarded on the goods being British or foreign, are to constitute prima facie an undue preference and to be prohibited; but the tribunal which deals with any such case is to have power, in addition to other circumstances which are now held to justify inequality, to take into consideration whether the preferential rates and charges, or the difference in treatment, are necessary to secure traffic. I am aware that we are introducing a vexed question when we admit the words—“preferential rates in order to secure traffic.” I am aware that, from the one side, it will be pressed upon us that this should be omitted from the Bill; and, on the other hand, that it will be held that Railway Companies should have the greatest possible freedom in carrying on preferential rates. I may, however, point out that there are not only the producers and the Railway Companies to be considered, but that there is a third and more vital interest than either—namely, the interest of the consumers, and we have, at all events, endeavoured to provide that, as far as possible, there shall be similar rates in similar circumstances. Practically, however, it is satisfactory to observe that on the representations made on this subject on the part of the trading community, a great deal has been dropped, and there seems on all sides to be a spirit of conciliation which I think augurs well for the success of this Bill. Equality of mileage is no longer pressed. It also seems to be tacitly admitted that there must be different terms for wholesale and retail goods. In other words, a person forwarding, or agreeing to forward, 1,000 tons, or 500 tons, for a lengthened period, or under particular circumstances, or on a particular line, has a fair claim to be placed on a preferential footing to those who, though they might send their traffic on the same line, do so in small quantities and at irregular intervals. This is in the interest of the consumers, which must not necessarily be left on one side; and I therefore think it is only right to allow the Commissioners to take such matters into their consideration. We also think that preferential rates, in order to secure traffic, is a matter which, in the interests of the consumer, cannot be left out of sight. It must not be forgotten that in this country there is hardly a Railway which is not, in one form or another, subject to the severest competition by sea. If we are not to allow this competition sea-rate to be taken into consideration, two things would follow. In the first place, the Railways in many cases would not allow such through traffic; they would not, in fact, be enabled to carry the traffic; and, therefore, that important channel of communication between the producer and the consumer would be blocked up; while, on the other hand, the sea traffic, in the absence of competing lines, would be left to increase its charges. Practically, the consumer would, in either case, be placed in a worse position for receiving his goods than at the present time. Similarly, the producer, at a great distance, would find himself utterly excluded from a market where he now, at all events, competes on fair terms of equality, to the general advantage. It must be granted that in some of these instances there is a great appearance of hardship. When people see through traffic carried at a special rate, which is not granted to them, naturally there is a feeling of hardship produced in reference to the granting of special rates, and the Government have thought it right to give the Commissioners under the Bill a discretionary power. There can be no doubt that the first consideration in this matter is to be given to the interests of the general public; and if the words I am here dealing with are thought, when the Bill is in Committee, not to be sufficiently clear or strong to define this object or interest, I shall be ready to adopt any suggestion to make them clearer. The next clause to which I wish to refer is the Arbitration Clause, the effect of which will be that any officer, or number of officers, of a Railway Company, if they feel aggrieved, may complain to the Board of Trade; that the Board of Trade will make a representation to the Company, and the Company will give a public explanation, and in that way an effort will be made to bring about an amicable settlement of the grievance. This system has been found to work satisfactorily in America and elsewhere, and I believe it will be beneficial in this country. I must, however, point out that the Bill differs in one respect from that which was introduced in "another place" last year. In dealing with the traffic of the country, the Government feel that they cannot leave out the question of Canal traffic; and, therefore, clauses have been introduced into the Bill dealing with various questions affecting that traffic and Canal Companies. In some places in the country Canal traffic has fallen off through special circumstances, and cannot be revived; but there are many other places where it may be revived and encouraged, and where, with proper facilities, Canals may be made to serve the public interests much more than at present, especially in parts of the country which are not now adequately served by the Railway Companies. That was also the view of the strong Joint Committee which sat in 1873, and the object of this part of the Bill is to give facilities for the development of Canal traffic where it can be revived in the public interest. Many of the Canals are held by Railway Companies, and it is an evil which must be guarded against. The Railway Companies have not felt themselves prohibited by the existing law from acquiring such a predominating interest in the Canal Companies as practically to place the Canals under the control of the Railways. Therefore, we have introduced a clause on the subject providing that no Director or officer of a Railway Company shall, without authority, use, or permit the use, of any part of the Company's funds for the purpose of acquiring any Canal interest, &c. As regards the provisions of the Bill, I cannot think that much objection will be made to them as to matters of principle. One argument which, however, may be used against the Bill is that the introduction of such a measure is an act of confiscation—that it is dealing with property which ought to be held entirely sacred. It is argued that Railways derive their rates and Schedules as concessions, on the faith of which they have invested their money, and that, therefore, it will amount to confiscation in altering them adversely. On the same grounds, it may be said that any Bill affecting the interests of a Railway Company is one of confiscation; but your Lordships will hardly think it necessary that I should, either on behalf of myself, or those who sit near me, disclaim and repudiate any intention of that kind, or deny that the Bill before us has been introduced with any such object. It is simply based upon an earnest desire to remedy a state of affairs which has grown up, and which the Government does not think should be continued. It can hardly be supposed, for a moment, that the Government, in the infancy of the Railways, before traffic was developed in the slightest degree—before it was known or thought to what this great interest should grow—that, under those circumstances, the Government could hand over the whole traffic of the country to private persons, blind to the general interests, without any power of alteration whatever hereafter. Further than that, there has been taken, in almost every Private Bill that comes before Parliament, powers that nothing contained in that Bill shall affect the provisions of any general Act. If I want further evidence, I might cite the Standing Order of this House, which provides that no Company shall alter its maximum rates until a Report of the Board of Trade thereupon has been laid on the Table of this House. Assuming that that Report is not meant to be entirely valueless, it is clear that there is intended to preserve to Parliament that general controlling power which I contend Parliament has never in any way given up. But there is another argument. It may be said that these powers having once been granted ought to be regarded as unalterable. But how can Railway Companies make use of that argument if they come to Parliament and ask that their maximum rates should be increased? Several Railway Companies—for instance, the London and North Western, the Midland, and two smaller ones—have come to Parliament with that request. Surely, those who have made such claims upon Parliament cannot, in any way, conscientiously object to corresponding claims being put forward by traders upon equitable grounds to a judicial tribunal. The Bill, therefore, is not founded upon the principle of confiscation; but it has been framed with an earnest desire to remedy, and a belief that it will remedy, an unsatisfactory state of affairs that has grown up, and that it will terminate a controversy between the trading and agricultural classes on the one hand, and the Railway Companies on the other. We hope that by passing this Bill, or passing a measure in this direction, that Parliament will put an end to a state of affairs that cannot continue longer with advantage. One word of caution, by way of conclusion, I would give to the great Companies concerned. These are not days in which any direct powers—any great monopoly can go unquestioned; and certainly the changes that have taken place of late years have been such that Representatives in “another place” are brought more distinctly and clearly into contact with the wishes and desires of those they represent. In such a state of affairs it does not seem wise that this controversy should be prolonged. I believe, at the present time, there are many favourable causes which contribute to render the passage of this Bill more probable, more sure, than would be the case at any other time; and I cannot but feel that I am speaking in the interests of the great Companies who believe they are affected by this Bill, when I say they would be wisely persuaded to use the opportunity offered them at the present moment for a fair settlement founded on justice, and calculated to conduce to the prosperity of the country. The Bill is not the measure of one Party or the other; it raises no question of political controversy. Its general principles have been adopted by both sides of the House, and in “another place” it has been accepted with little more than perfunctory opposition from the Railway Companies. It is true that it is the first measure of the kind that has been initiated in your Lordships’ House; but circumstances seem to render it desirable that it should be so introduced, there being an earnest desire at present to legislate on this matter on the principle of equity and justice; and, therefore, I hope this Bill may receive a second reading, and, after full and careful consideration, that it may emerge as a measure which will be at once sound in principle, and one that may be worked so as to promote the benefit and prosperity of the country.

Lord Stanley of Preston

Lord Stanley of Preston

Lord Stanley of Preston

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Stanley of Preston.)

LORD BRABOURNE said, he had been asked by gentlemen who represented a large proportion of the Railway capital invested in this country to state their views upon this Bill. He accepted with gratitude, on behalf of the Railway Companies, the word of caution which had just been addressed to them; and he could assure their Lordships that there was no desire on the part of any one in the Railway world to discuss this question in anything but a conciliatory tone, with a view to arriving at a friendly settlement of the disputed points. He was happy to think that after what had just been said it would not be his duty to disabuse their Lordships' minds of an idea, which seemed to prevail in some quarters out of doors, that the Railway Companies were the natural enemies of the public. He imagined that few would disagree with him when he said that Railway Companies might be fairly considered as bodies which had supplied a great public want, and that by means of private expenditure they had relieved this country of a large amount of public taxation. If we had applied public funds to the construction of railways, it could hardly be doubted that during the last half-century a great weight of additional taxation must have been laid upon the people. In that case no one could have questioned the legal and moral right of Parliament to regulate and control all matters of Railway traffic and regulation. But when Parliament deliberately determined to trust to private subscription and to private enterprise for the creation of a Railway system; it followed that legal rights were acquired by those who subscribed the capital and promoted the enterprise; and Parliament became bound to uphold and support the rights it had itself created, and upon the faith of which capital had been subscribed and works of great public utility constructed. He did not deny the power of Parliament to legislate upon the lines of this Bill; but he would urge that in considering the details of legislation they were bound to keep three things specially in view. The first was that, however much we might cry down Railway investors as people who would not have obtained the privileges they had if things had been originally as they were now, we were dealing with men who held capital which had been subscribed on the faith of Acts of Parliament, and who had acquired definite legal rights. The second was that the average of Railway dividends had scarcely reached 4 per cent, and therefore it could not be contended that railway investors had made enormous profits, or that they had obtained under their Private Acts anything which had savoured of unfair advantage to themselves or which had been unduly burdensome to the public. The third thing to keep in view was that it was the direct interest of every Railway Company to carry the largest possible amount of remunerative traffic, and that any Company which by a prohibitory tariff excluded traffic or offended customers must be acting contrary to its own interests. The remarks he desired to make upon the Bill might be classified under three heads. These were—the constitution of the Court it was proposed to establish; the parties who were to have the right to appear before the Court; and the manner in which Railway Companies were to be dealt with by the Court. The Bill professed to abolish the present Commission, but so far as he could see there was nothing to prevent the re-appointment of the same Commissioners the day after the Bill passed. One of them was a gentleman "experienced in the Law;" another had at one period of his life "experience in Railway matters;" and the third was not qualified by any clause in the Bill. Moreover, the ex officio Commissioners, who were to be judges, were only to be summoned when required by the appointed Commissioners, so that Railway cases would still be left to the discretion of hon. Gentlemen, of whom only one need be learned in the Law. Why, he would ask, were Railway Companies to be the only bodies in this country who were to have a special tribunal appointed to see that they obeyed the law? If the cases in which they were concerned were of special importance, why not appoint two Judges to try them as was done in the case of election petitions? The Railway Companies were desirous of having nothing better, and were entitled to have nothing less, than the highest legal tribunals to decide whether they were acting legally; and as to the limitation of appeal to questions of law, the fact was that in these cases questions of law and of fact were so inextricably mixed up that it was almost impossible to separate them. There was no reason why the disputes in which Railway Companies were concerned should be settled by any inferior tribunal or with more limited appeal than were the disputes of the rest of the community. As to the parties who were to have a right to appear before the Court, it was an old maxim of English law that a man must have a personal grievance before he could summon another into a Court of Law. But this clause directly controverted that maxim and expressly declared that the complaining authority need not have been aggrieved. The only protection which the Bill gave to a Company was that of a certificate of the Board of Trade that the body making a complaint was a proper body to make such complaint. This was quite an illusory protection. Under the present law the Board of Trade had to give a certificate that the case was a proper case to be brought before the Commissioners; but under this clause they would discover some objection to the constitution or character of the body which brought the complaint; and this, of course, they would never do. Then these authorities would sometimes have rates to expend to which the Railway Companies had largely contributed, so that they would be fought with their own money. In other cases the authorities had no funds. The only fair way in which to put this clause was to provide: first, that the complaining authority should be bound to prove that it, or those whom it represented, had been aggrieved by the action of the Railway Company; and, secondly, that it should give security for its share of the costs of the hearing and determination of the complaint. There was much more to be said on this point, but he would leave others to deal with the legal aspects of the case. Now, he came to the manner in which the Companies were to be dealt with before the Court and otherwise under the Bill, and he wished first to call their Lordships' attention to the Report of the Committee which sat in 1882—a Committee which made a very exhaustive inquiry. That Committee was composed of 27 members, of whom, he believed, only seven were Railway Directors. It could not, therefore, be said that the Railway interest was over-represented, and especially since two draft reports were presented; and that which the Railway representatives supported was rejected. But when the other and more hostile report had been considered and thoroughly thrashed out, let their Lordships mark what happened. On the general issue, the Committee returned a verdict acquitting the Companies of "any grave dereliction of duty towards the public." Then, as regarded the particular contentions urged against the Companies, the most important of them broke down and came to nothing. One great contention had been in favour of equal mileage rates. The Committee pointed out that, as regards the interests of the public no less than in that of the Companies, equal mileage was impracticable, and its very principle was destroyed by the exceptions which its supporters allowed to be necessary. As regards terminal charges, which were stated to be unjust and illegal, the Committee reported that, subject to publication by the Companies, terminal charges ought to be recognized. As to preferential rates, the Committee reported that they were sometimes to the advantage and not the disadvantage of the public; that they were only illegal when unjust, and when unjust the law already provided a remedy. He (Lord Brabourne) could go at much greater length into all these points, but he mentioned them now only to show that as the complaints upon which legislation was demanded before the appointment of the Committee of 1882 were proved before that Committee to have been greatly exaggerated or altogether unfounded; so the defects which were sought to be remedied by the present Bill might turn out, on investigation, to be either no defects at all or such as might be remedied under the existing law. Therefore he submitted that the proper course to pursue would be to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. As to the clauses, he would mention the 9th, which, taken with the 17th Clause, constituted the Commission sole judge on all points contained in the special Acts of the Companies. The Commission would sit as judge and jury, just as the Judges sat in the Courts of Equity. Why was the Commission not to be subject to appeal similar to the appeals against the decisions of the Judges? No doubt the Commission was one of an extraordinary character. It cost the country about £10,000 a-year in salaries, and the average was 18 cases a-year. If it were to be a really strong Court, and composed of Judges of the High Court, he should not object to the limitation of the right of appeal; but two out of the three Commissioners were to be laymen; and, therefore, he held that it would be a monstrous thing to limit the right of appeal. The amount of property placed under the control of this Commission was enormous, and he thought the Commission ought to be a really strong Court in legal knowledge and ability, or else the widest right of appeal should be given. He came next to the 24th clause, which was the most important in the Bill. This clause proposed calmly to set aside all the Companies' special Acts under which they had heretofore classified their traffic and settled their rates. As far as he could read the clause, the Board of Trade had the power to reduce the maximum rates just as it pleased. The special Acts were the charters of the Railway Companies, on the strength of which their capital had been subscribed. He did not wish to say one word against the Board of Trade. In the debate in the House of Commons last year there was a speaker who had said that the Board of Trade was a most incompetent tribunal to deal with these questions. That speaker was Sir R. Assheton Cross. He (Lord Brabourne) did not agree with that estimate of the Board of Trade. In his official experience he had known much excellent work done by permanent officials, and he had no reason to doubt that those of the Board of Trade were as good as any others. Nor did he believe that any President of the Board of Trade would seek popularity by urging his subordinates to a reduction of Railway rates. He was ready to believe both the political and permanent element in the Board of Trade to be perfectly immaculate and entirely capable. But had their Lordships any idea of the work which this clause would impose upon the Board of Trade? Many of the Companies had some millions of rates, and the work of classification and arrangement of rates was one of enormous labour. He did not seek to appeal to anything so obsolete as the observance of Parliamentary faith, but to the practical difficulties before them. The rates were settled and determined by skilled men, the whole of whose time was given to their classification. They had no possible motive for injuring the public, and competition had shown them that they must cut their rates as low as they could in order to carry the traffic consistently with the traffic being remunerative. Interference with those men was very dangerous, and could not be successful. He did not say there was not room for improvement, both in the classification and the rates; but if by an arbitrary interference with managers of Railways their Lordships altered rates sanctioned by Acts of Parliament so as to make traffic unremunerative, they would go very near to the ugly word confiscation. It was absolutely impossible that the officers of the Board of Trade, in addition to all their other work, could do this work in the same efficient way in which it was now done by specially trained men, who devoted their whole time to its performance. But even if they could do so, there was an enormous difficulty behind. Upon what principle were they to proceed? Was it upon that of equal mileage rates? That had been condemned by the Committee of 1882. Was it with regard to the cost of service? Was it with reference to the value of the articles carried? Was the existence or non-existence of competition to be taken into account? No principle was indicated in the clause, because, in truth, there was no one principle of universal application in the matter. One principle alone could be applied, and that was the principle of elasticity, the application of which was absolutely necessary to the successful administration of Railway traffic, and which could only be applied by leaving a wide margin of discretion to those most capable men who now acted as Railway managers. He would point out, moreover, that not only did Railway Companies very rarely charge their maximum rates, but the whole tendency of recent years had been towards reduction—competition with other Companies and with water traffic having secured to the public the advantage of low rates. Any action of the Board of Trade which would make traffic unremunerative would recoil upon the public. In Section 7 of Clause 24 it was provided that when the Railway Companies and the Board of Trade had failed to come to an agreement, a report should be made to Parliament, and the Board of Trade might bring forward a Provisional Order to force their views upon the Railway Company. The Railway Companies would very much prefer that matters should not be brought to that pitch, because, in the case of a Provisional Order brought forward by a Government Department, there would be very little chance of resistance. He (Lord Bra-bourne) believed that if the Railway Companies were given time and opportunity, very few of those questions would remain unsettled. He did not wish to deprecate the friendly interference of the Board of Trade, but arbitrary interference would only lead to misfortune and confusion. By Clause 27, any person who fancied himself oppressed or treated unreasonably, might complain to the Board of Trade. There were a great many unreasonable persons who fancied themselves oppressed, and who now came to the Railway Companies and had their grievances settled in a quiet way. But now it was proposed that the Board of Trade should hear their complaints, and, what was worse, might appoint and pay any other person to receive communications upon the matter. The Board of Trade was but human after all, and there would always be plenty of people anxious for such a job, whom they would be urged to appoint. He thought that nothing but mischief would result from such a provision, and the trouble which would be given to the Railway Companies by this clause could hardly be conceived by those who were unacquainted with the practical working of those Companies. All that the Railway Companies desired was to be allowed to settle their own differences with their own customers; and, if they acted illegally, those customers had their remedy at law. As to the complaint that individuals could not contend against the long purse of a corporation such as a Railway Company, that would apply to all other corporate bodies, and there could be no reason why Railway Companies should be subjected to a special law more than any other bodies of the same nature. Clause 28 provided for what was practically an unlimited power to order returns from the Railway Companies. The returns now asked for by the Board of Trade imposed a great deal of labour on the staff of the Companies, and this further demand would be attended with great inconvenience. Clause 29 contained Provisions of a most extraordinary character; it provided that at every station of every Company there should be placed certain lists of their rates. There was one Company, whose terminus was in London, which required no less than 1,500 books to keep its various rates. The effect of this clause would be that at each of the 670 stations on this Railway there would have to be a copy of its books, and upwards of 1,000,000 books would be required to comply with this clause, the information contained in which would never be of the slightest use to anyone. The Railway Companies were at present compelled to supply all persons desiring to use the railway with the information they required, and, on proper notice, to show how their rates were divided, and what was the proportion which was a "terminal charge." With regard to the general objects and nature of the Bill, it appeared to him that the principle underlying it was the interference by the State with one of the greatest industrial undertakings of the country. No such interference could take place without running grave and serious risks. If their Lordships impeded commerce, fettered trade, and imposed shackles upon industrial enterprise, they struck at the root of that freedom of action which was the life and soul of industrial success. As regarded success in an industrial enterprise, whether it was the maintenance and management of a Railway, the business of a shipowner, or that of a merchant, success was more likely to be achieved by the free action of those men who were trained to the business, and whose interest lay in its development, than by the hard-and-fast rule of Government regulations or the restrictive supervision of a Government Department. But here there was something more in question than mere commercial success. The power of State interference was one which their Lordships would always regard with jealousy; but their jealousy would be increased when that interference took the form of encroachment upon legal rights. That was a dangerous principle, which might lead to grave and serious results. Up to the present time, whenever any sound commercial undertaking had been projected in this country, there had been no want of capital to carry it out. This had been the case because the public had confidence—they believed that Parliamentary faith would be kept; they had had some rude lessons in recent years as to Parliamentary faith and the reliance to be placed upon Parliamentary enactments. But if these lessons were to be carried further: if people were taught that the conditions on which they were to subscribe, and those upon which they had subscribed their capital, were to be set aside at the first convenient opportunity, for the sake of gaining popularity, the supply of capital might be considerably diminished. Moreover, if they impeded trade enterprise by restrictive legislation, it would not be long before those classes who lived by manual labour would rise up against that class of legislation which restricted the supply of one great class of employment, they would have to reckon with other classes also. If by that legislation the railway interest was going to be attacked, he wanted to know whether their Lordships were going to give any consideration to the claims of the Railway shareholders. It always seemed to be forgotten that it was not the well-paid chairman, or the holders of debenture and guaranteed stock, but the holders of ordinary stock, who suffered from any diminution in the earnings of the Railway—and they had a right to complain if their legal security was diminished, and if they were robbed by legislation of the dividends which they would otherwise have received. It should be remembered that out of £800,000,000 of money invested in Railways, something less than £300,000,000 was in the hands of ordinary shareholders, upon whom the diminution in profits would exclusively fall. There remained yet another and still more important class with whom they would have to reckon. If any noble Lord would look into the complaints made against Railway Companies, he would find that they were not of overcharges upon the persons complaining, but they were made, for the most part, by traders, because they alleged the charge upon the goods of somebody else was too low, and that this somebody else was thus enabled to compete with them on equal terms in the market. There was another aspect to this question. If they were going to tamper with Railway rates in the interest, or supposed interest, of traders, they would limit competition and restrict the area from which supplies were brought into the market, and it would not be long before consumers lifted up their voices against the rise of prices which would ensue. A great deal was said about the Railway Companies enjoying a monopoly. They were monopolists only in the sense that they had provided a better, more convenient, and a cheaper method of transit than others, and had thus driven other carriers out of the field as far as long routes were concerned. Their very excellence was now used as a weapon against them. Moreover, there was scarcely a line anywhere at the present moment to which there was not some competition either by another line or by water. Railway Companies frequently incurred a large expenditure, and then in a few years Parliament let in a competing company which rendered all their expenditure unproductive. Therefore Railway Companies had no real monopoly—only a restricted monopoly, regulated by Act of Parliament, and used in the interest and for the advantage of the public. It might be said that because he had criticized some of the details of this measure he ought to move its rejection. That by no means followed. Railway Companies had no quarrel with traders, and as sensible men only desired to see this subject dealt with in a sensible manner. Still less had they any quarrel with the public, whose servants they were and whom they desired to please. They knew that there had been a demand from the public for Railway legislation, and they could not shut their eyes to the fact that three Governments had proposed legislation. Railway Companies were perfectly ready to remedy any complaints that might be well founded and to use their best endeavours to satisfy the public. There were remedies for certain defects which the Companies were anxious for. That they readily admitted. The classification of goods was, in a great measure, obscure and obsolete, and Railway Companies were as desirous as anyone else for its revision. The uniformity of rates was, no doubt, a delicate and difficult subject, but, wherever possible, Companies had no objection, in all cases where it could be done without sacrifice of their shareholders' rights, to rates being dealt with. The consolidation of statutes was also desirable, and the Companies were most willing to promote it. Moreover, as to terminal charges, they were ready to simplify the matter and make it as clear as possible to the public. There were many points in the Bill which would be much better discussed before a Select Committee than in the Whole House. He believed it would be found that those who represented Railway Companies were most anxious and desirous to give every possible assistance in the promotion of the legislative settlement of all disputed points. What the Railway Companies did object to was that they should be continually harassed by unfounded complaints and prejudiced by extravagant statements which had been again and again refuted. They asked, within the limits given them by the Acts of Parliament controlling them, to be allowed the freedom to act as they chose and not to be interfered with in the management of their own business; above all, they asked not to be continually exposed to harassing legislation and vexatious enactments, which would have no other effect in the long run than that of retarding the development of the industry and resources and of restricting the prosperity of the country; while at the same time they inflicted undeserved injury on men who had subscribed their money to carry out these great undertakings in full reliance on the good faith, honour and justice of the British Parliament.

Lord Stanley of Preston

LORD HENNIKER said, he had taken a great interest in this question, and for some time had been Chairman of a Committee which represented all sides of politics. This was no Party question. The Committee consisted of Members of their Lordships' House, Members of the House of Commons, and agriculturists and traders from all parts of the country. He believed that all the important Corporations, the Chambers of Agriculture and Commerce, and Trade Societies were represented upon it. He, therefore, thought he might claim to speak with more authority than his own individual opinion could possibly command. The policy of the Committee had been throughout in no way to be vindictive against the Railway Companies, as they were fully aware of all the country owed them, and not to ask for anything which they did not consider reasonable and right. He was glad to find his noble Friend (Lord Brabourne) had spoken in a way which showed he was quite ready to deal with the question in a conciliatory spirit. He could assure him that his Committee fully reciprocated this feeling. It was the policy of some people to ask for a great deal more than they wanted. This practice his Committee had thrown aside. They thought the question one of great importance, and they were prepared to stick to their proposals as far as they were able. First of all, he (Lord Henniker) must thank the Government for their attempt to deal with this question, and particularly his noble Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Lord Stanley of Preston). A measure brought in by a responsible Government was what was wanted; and he personally hoped his noble Friend might be successful in passing a measure which was much needed, and would, in these distressed times, be welcomed by agriculturists and traders, and, he hoped, would be for the benefit of the Railway Companies. He (Lord Henniker) would not attempt to go into the details of the Bill, but he would touch merely on some of the main points. He hoped the Bill would pass a second reading, and details could then be gone into in Committee. The first point he wished to call attention to was the composition of the Railway Commission. The great point here was that its composition should be strong, and easily available to suitors. As to the strength of the proposed Commission, he hoped it would be strong, as it stood in the Bill. Last year the traders thought—and he agreed with them—that the appointment of a Judge as Chief Commissioner would not be desirable, but that the present Court, with more power, would be best. However, the proposal made in this year's Bill was not at all the same, and he had no objection to make to the composition of the Court. The Railway Companies, no doubt, wished for a Judge as First Commissioner. In the proposal made in the Bill, the Railway Companies had all they wished for in every important case, and the Committee had no objection to make to this. As to the Commission being easily available, he had been always anxious that, whatever the law was, it should be as little as possible Judge-made law, with proper latitude—not tying down the Commission too much—that certain rules should be laid down, as far as they could be, for the guidance of the Commission and the Court of Appeal. When in Committee on the Bill, this could be considered. His noble Friend (Lord Brabourne) asked why the Railway Companies should have a special Court at all, and not be dealt with like other litigants. He might remind him that the Act of 1873 was brought in because the ordinary Courts were unable to deal with these Railway questions satisfactorily. The Railway Companies prided themselves on the fact that very few cases came before the Commissioners; but was not this often from the fact that the Court, as at present constituted, was not easily available? The Railway Companies held the purse strings, here as well as in appeals, and traders were too much handicapped to be able to hold their own. For this reason he hoped Sub-sections 3, 4, and 5 of Clause 17 would be altered. This Clause gave an appeal from the Commissioners to a higher Court, and, by leave, from the higher Court to the House of Lords. Surely if the Commission Court was a strong one, one appeal—of course, on questions of law only, and that by leave of the Commission—would be quite sufficient. There was already a Judge on important occasions, and to multiply appeals was only to cause unnecessary expense, and, he thought, unnecessary pressure on traders. Again, he hoped there would be only one Court of Appeal for the whole country. If they had one decision in England, one in Scotland, and one in Ireland, there would be no uniformity in railway policy. What he had said as to the traders being handicapped by the superior power of the Railway Companies would apply to sub-Section 8 of Clause 24, where there was a reference to a Select Committee. This proposal was popular even in a more extended form in some quarters. His noble Friend who had spoken last had suggested the reference of this Bill itself to a Select Committee; but the traders were often greatly handicapped on Select Committees. Railway experts were the witnesses, and many of their Lordships knew what this meant.

Lord Henniker

He would pass on to Clause 24, which was the point of controversy last year. The Railway Companies talked of confiscation of their property then, and they did the same now, saying they relied on their old Acts. At all events, the Committee over which he presided were not in favour of anything of the kind. They were many of them shareholders in railways, and they would hardly wish to confiscate their own property. However, he would pass this rather unfair contention by. Clause 24—it was Clause 24 of the Bill of last year too—was improved as far as the Railway Companies were concerned, and for the traders as well. Uncertainty must ruin every trade. In last year's Bill the question of classification could have been reopened at any time. This point he held to be one of great importance, both for the Railways and the traders. They wanted as much certainty as possible in any arrangement made, but if Clause 24 was looked at this year, what prospect was there of any immediate settlement? A year was to be first given to the Railway Companies to send in their proposals as to classification; then a clear Session if there was no agreement. The Railway Companies looked on the clause as confiscatory. Surely this position would hardly lead to a satisfactory or a speedy solution of the question. The Railway Companies prepared a schedule of rates in 1885; there was all the help to be given by Government experts, traders, by the guide of the Clearing House rates, and so on, at once available. In fact, there was no insurmountable difficulty in coming to an immediate settlement of the classification of rates. He held strongly to the opinion which he had often expressed, that a small Commission would deal far more satisfactorily with this question than it could be dealt with in any other way. The Committee over which he presided were of this opinion, and he pressed this upon Mr. Mundella last year. The Commission could be formed more or less of experts; and he thought if Clause 24 were taken out and a Commission appointed, with a provision that a Bill should be brought in within a year to carry out their Report, that the question would be settled without much difficulty, or delay, or half the trouble which the 24th Clause as it stood would cause. Last year his hon. Friend (Mr. Barolay) proposed that the Commissioners should deal with classification, with assessors. He confessed he objected to this now, as he should like to see a general Bill passed, and the Commission get to work at once to make the Act really effective. To give them the work of classification of rates as well as their own duties would delay them in carrying out the general Act. Should the small Commission he suggested be appointed, it could set to work at once, and they would have some prospect of a speedy solution of the question, as well as a prospect of the general Act being put into working order without delay. There was no reason to delay the Bill for classification. This could be done afterwards as well as now, if there was a guarantee in the Bill that classification would follow. Should he (Lord Henniker) find his views supported, he should be prepared to move the omission of Clause 24, and to bring up an Amendment to carry out the proposal he made for the consideration of the House. It would perhaps be convenient to touch here on the question of terminals, although the definition to which he wished to refer was in Clause 43. This definition was the same as in the Bill of last year, and the Committee strongly objected to this. The Committee thought it too wide. This point—that of terminal charges not being included in maximum rates—was one of the greatest grievances they had; and the position on this part of the question was far more strained than it was two years ago when he brought the question before the House. There were then nine Bills brought in by the Railway Companies, which gave a new classification of rates; there was strong opposition to them, and they were withdrawn. The Railways then went to a Court of Law, and in June, 1885, obtained a decision in their favour—that was, to charge terminals over and above the maximum rates. The Railway Companies talked of their old Acts, which to alter was confiscation; but they did not doubt about going to a Court of Law to upset the whole of the railway legislation which had hitherto prevailed, and against every decision which had been given by the Railway Commission and every other Court of Law, that terminals should be included in the maximum rates with very few exceptions. The position was therefore far more unsatisfactory than it was, particularly as the last decision made it impossible to appeal, reversing all former decisions—as the Judicature Act of 1873 was passed on August 5 of that year, and came into force at once. Whereas the Railway Regulation Act of the same year was passed on July 21, and did not come into force till September. To make the matter clear, the operation of the Judicature Act was postponed till November 1, 1875, but became an Act of Parliament on August 5, 1873. The 45th clause allowed an appeal from the inferior Courts then existing. The Railway Commission was not in legal existence till September, 1873, so although one Court was at work before the other, the result was that an appeal—which the Judges of the Divisional Court said they would gladly grant if they could—was impossible, and this was about the only instance in which an appeal could not be given. This might be thought inconsistent after what he had said about appeals; but their Lordships must recollect that he was dealing with the existing law, and what was fair for one side was fair for the other. The Railways had the advantage here. Under these circumstances, he should have been glad of some more distinct dealing with the question, and a better definition of terminals in a Government measure. A Railway could not work its line without stations, and so on; and again, the present maximum rates were fixed, as a rule, on the understanding that they should include terminals. If this was correct, as he thought it was; if terminals were to be charged extra for the first time in Railway legislation, the whole question of maximum rates should be reconsidered, and probably reduced rather than increased, as was proposed in nearly every instance in the nine Bills of 1885. The Railways said they did not ever charge their maximum rates. Why, then, raise them? They thought this question one of great importance, and it was one which he hoped his noble Friend would again consider most carefully. As to preference rates, he was aware this was a difficult and delicate matter. It was quite unnecessary to quote instances of this; how to deal with it was the question. His Committee strongly objected to Subsection 2 of Clause 25, which laid down that Railways might be allowed to plead that they could only secure traffic by giving preference rates. This was the only way in which Railways could justify preference rates, and this sub-section would tell most strongly to prevent a satisfactory settlement if it remained in the Bill. Although a settlement was much desired, he felt sure that those interested would rather have no Bill passed than one with this provision in it. Why should a rule be laid down in favour of the Railway Companies and no rules in favour of the trader? The traders had many points on which they could complain; but at the outset the one point most clearly laid down was the only one on which the Railways could rely. It might be said that the traders had their protection in Sub-section 1; but the traders were the weaker party, and such a provision must tell against them. He hoped this part of the question would be reconsidered by his noble Friend, and that, at all events, Sub-section 2 of Clause 25 would be omitted. Clause 26 his Committee thought unnecessary, and likely to mislead. He had touched on some of the important points in the Bill; but although his remarks were in the nature of strong criticisms, he trusted his noble Friend would understand that he was anxious to give him any support he could personally in the difficult task he had undertaken; that there was a great deal in the Bill for which he had nothing but praise, and that he was sure the Committee over which he presided had but one wish, and that was to bring this question, if possible, to a satisfactory conclusion, and to give any assistance they could in that direction.

LORD BRAMWELL said, he did not intend to oppose the second reading—in the first place, because it would be perfectly useless, as their Lordships would no doubt read it a second time; and in the next place, because it was a Bill with many miscellaneous provisions, some of which might be good; and it was brought in under auspices and introduced in such a way as to disarm opposition. There was one matter on which, though they would have an opportunity of referring to it in Committee, he should like to say a few words, especially after the argument which had been used in relation to it. The shareholders of this country had subscribed £800,000,000 for making Railways, and they had done so upon the faith of a bargain made with the State, made with the public, made, at least, with Parliament, that they should have the right to make certain charges. It was now proposed to take this right from them, not in so many words, because they were at liberty to diminish their own rates. But if the rates they proposed were not sanctioned by the Board of Trade, the Board of Trade might suggest other rates which certainly would not be larger—and which might be considerably smaller—and then the Board of Trade would bring their proposition to Parliament, and if sanctioned by Parliament the rates which the Companies had at present would be taken from them. He did not deny the power of Parliament to do this. Parliament was omnipotent; it might take an acre from every ten their Lordships held, and reduce 3 per cents to 2½. But he entirely denied that Parliament had reserved to itself as part of the bargain the right to do so. He wholly denied the validity of the argument presented in support of such alleged right. That argument was that in modern Railway Acts there was a clause that nothing therein contained should be deemed to exempt railways from the provisions of any general Railway Act now in force, or which might hereafter be passed, or from any revision of rates and charges authorized by such Acts. But what the Railway Companies relied on was nothing in the particular Act which contained that clause, but upon the Act which gave them the right originally to make those charges. That clause, in modern Acts, came into existence by virtue of their Lordships' Standing Order, and the first time this Standing Order appeared was in 1844. From that time down to the present this clause had always been introduced into Acts of Parliament which gave power to Companies to make branches. By an Act of 1844 it was provided that when any future Company—not one of the old Companies—was earning more than 10 per cent there might be a reduced rate of tolls, but that that reduction should be accompanied with a guarantee that if that reduced rate did not produce 10 per cent the Treasury should make up the difference. It was further provided that such reduced scale should not be again revised otherwise than with the consent of the Railway Company for 21 years. That was thought to be the fair and legitimate way of dealing with Railway Companies at that time. He had no doubt that it was to prevent new Companies saying they were not within this Act of Parliament because they came into existence after it was passed, and therefore their new Act being subsequent to the general Act, repealed it. It was to preclude such an argument as this, doubtless, that the Standing Order was made which provided that every Railway Bill passed after that date should contain the clause that nothing in the Act should exclude a revision of the maximum tolls. But the clause did not bear the interpretation which the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Preston) had put upon it; he said so confidently, speaking as a lawyer. The Bill introduced by the noble Lord was a proposal to interfere with rights for which the Railway Companies had bargained, and for which the shareholders had subscribed their money. Was it conceivable that those people would have been foolish enough to subscribe the amount they did if they had known that the tolls which they bargained for could be reduced? The matter was one of great importance not only to the Railway Companies and the shareholders, but generally. He was not going to talk of plunder or confiscation, for he was sure there was no such idea in the mind of the noble Lord who introduced the Bill. An expression was very often used in the present day that "there was plunder in the air;" and he would ask their Lordships not to set an example of lightly taking away from people rights to which they were clearly entitled. Land was to be nationalized; leaseholds were to be enfranchised; copyholds were to be enfranchised; or the landlord was to forfeit his interest. The Tithe Question was to be settled again, and other rights were to be interfered with; and he (Lord Bramwell) would ask their Lordships carefully to consider whether they would not by this Bill be taking away from the Railway shareholders that which they had purchased, which unquestionably belonged to them. He had been told by one, than whom there was no higher authority, that the difficulty in raising capital was on account of the general distrust that existed. There was scarcely a thing or an interest which was not now assailed with the object of taking from it rights that the law had given. Their Lordships might suppose that he had some interest in the matter. Yes, he was a Railway shareholder, though only a small one. His personal interest in the question was small; he was provided for as long as he lived; and before this scheme was brought into operation he should probably be provided for in another way. He was chiefly interested in the matter in the way that thousands of other persons were; he and they wished to make safe provision for those who came after them; but this Bill made railway property unsafe. He believed the Bill to be an unjustifiable attack on the rights of Railway shareholders. There were many other observations he might make on the Bill. For instance, why should the Railway Companies be referred by the Bill to a tribunal inferior to those which existed for other matters. The magnitude of the questions which arose was an argument in favour of having the best possible tribunal. Why, if there was a mistaken decision on matter of fact, should it be as it is in the ordinary Courts of Law the subject of any appeal. He believed, however, it was impossible that a Committee of the Whole House could properly deal with all the questions that were raised by the Bill, and, therefore, that it must be considered by a Select Committee.

LORD HERSCHELL said, it was not convenient to discuss the details of the Bill at the present stage; but he desired to criticize one or two alterations which had been made in the Bill since last year, and which it was desirable should be more fully explained than they had been. As to the argument of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Bramwell) that the Railways did not possess a monopoly, it appeared to him that they did possess a considerable monopoly, because the Railways had been constructed under special facilities which were given to the Companies, and which were not given to any other of Her Majesty's subjects. In the compulsory taking of land for the making of lines, no one could compete with the Companies. Parliament had therefore given them a monopoly, and that monopoly could be destroyed only by allowing anyone else to do what they had done, which was not a practicable remedy. In these circumstances there might be interferences with the Railway Companies in the carrying on of their business which would be justifiable, while they would not be justifiable in the case of those upon whom Parliament had conferred no special rights. On the other hand, it would be unjust that money had been subscribed for the construction of railways on the faith that Companies had power to take certain tolls. These could not be revised simply in the interest of the traders without involving that confiscation which the traders themselves did not desire. He objected to the change in the constitution of the Court, and though that change had been supported by the noble Lord opposite who represented the traders (Lord Henniker), he did not regard it as in any sense a change for the better. He could understand a desire on the part of traders to have a tribunal which should disregard law altogether and determine questions on abstract principles of justice, and against whose decisions there should be no appeal. That would be an intelligible proceeding. But if questions of law were to be determined upon legal principles, he should have supposed that a tribunal presided over by the best lawyer available, would be even better for the traders than it would be for the Railway Companies. The better the tribunal from which you started the less likely was it that there would be appeals. He was at a loss to understand why a Court should be preferred that was presided over by a presumably inferior lawyer. As the Railway Commissioners had sat only from 20 to 30 days a year, there was apparently no room for the separation of the more important from the less important cases. If the opinion of the legal Commissioner was to be set aside by the opinions of two laymen, nothing could be more likely to provoke a number of appeals against the decisions of the Commissioners. On the whole, he thought a better tribunal would be obtained by reverting to the proposals of the Bill of last year, for they would only by the present proposal be multiplying appeals and giving general dissatisfaction. As to Clause 24, he thought there was something in the drafting of it that rendered it unintelligible; certainly it was obscure. It had been suggested that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee; but he hoped it would be a Joint Committee of both Houses, so that there might be only one Inquiry. There was, he noticed, a considerable change in the Bill as to undue preference, and he wished to have an explanation as to the omission of the word "mileage." The Bill gave the Commission considerable powers, which the Commission, he had no doubt, would use with advantage to the parties concerned, and that was the spirit in which the matter ought to be dealt with.

Lord Herschell

LORD GRIMTHORPE said, he wished to supplement the argument of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Bramwell) about this Act and the Standing Order of 1844. The Act provided that the State might buy future railways for 25 times the average profits of three years, and might reduce rates when those profits had reached 10 per cent, but must guarantee the Companies against any loss thereby. The Standing Order guarded against future Railway Companies thereafter slipping any words into their special Acts to interfere with that revision. And now we are asked to believe that Parliament was so absurd as to pass an Act for revision with a guarantee on reaching 10 per cent, and, at the same time, to provide for revision without a guarantee while the average dividend is not half of 10 per cent; and also to believe that shareholders have been such fools as to go on finding money all these years with an unlimited power of reducing rates hanging over their heads. He had read in some newspaper last year that some Board of Trade official said that he had always intended the revising words to have the effect the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Preston) now said they had. If he did he had played a trick not unknown to lawyers—namely, trying to get an advantage by putting in vague words not calculated to excite alarm; which trick almost always failed, because Judges held that rights and property are not to be taken away by obscure words. There had been complaints against the Railway Companies as long as he could remember—certainly since 1846. There was a Committee in 1853 which produced the Cardwell Act, and then there was a Committee in 1865-6-7, and there was a Joint Committee of both Houses in 1872. After that was the Committee to which his noble Friend (Lord Brabourne) referred, which produced a great volume of evidence. The grievances of 69 witnesses against the Railway Companies were heard, and six witnesses on the part of the Railway Companies gave evidence. If anybody in the world might be expected to suggest a Bill of this nature, giving the Board of Trade power to reduce rates, surely it would be a Committee who had been so engaged. But that Committee said not a word to that effect. The Duke of Devonshire's Commission of 1865-6-7 was specially appointed to consider the question of the purchase of Railways. If they could have found the means of purchasing the Railways cheaper than on the terms prescribed in 1844, they were the Commission to do it; but if anybody would take the trouble to read their Report he would find that they said it was impossible to do so, because of the terms of the Act of 1844; in other words, it said that the Railway shareholders who found the money knew that it could not be taken away except by mere confiscation, contrary to the Act and Standing Order of 1844. The fact was that from 1844 down to last year no one ever dreamt that Parliament had a right to revise rates. Not even Mr. Chamberlain's Bill did that. The noble Lord therefore had to make out that it was good faith to reverse the understanding of 42 years and the Report of Mr. Gladstone, who introduced the Act of 1844, and used the most solemn words about the importance of doing nothing that would even have the appearance of a breach of Parliamentary faith. The noble Lord might be a clever man, but he was not clever enough to do that. The Joint Committee of 1872 had the same thing to deal with; but the Act of 1844 stood in the way again, and this happened over and over again. By Clause 11 of the Bill, the Board of Trade, through the Railway Commissioners, or the Board of Trade without the Railway Commissioners, might order any Company to spend any sum of money which they like to pronounce necessary for the public convenience and interests. This extraordinary power was now proposed to be given for the first time, and he asked their Lordships to consider to what this might lead. They might order Companies to spend hundreds of thousands of pounds without a penny of profit for it. And that is not even a question of law, on which alone the Bill allows an appeal. Anything more ruinous to shareholders could not be imagined. Parliament had but to revise Railway rates with the object of reducing them to such a point that the State might acquire the Railways at an almost nominal price. Were their Lordships aware of the amount of money that some of the Railway Companies had spent on their stations? He had a station in his mind where there was considerable inconvenience owing to a level crossing. It was a station used by eight Railway Companies. The problem of getting rid of the level crossing had never been solved yet, because of the enormous cost which would be required. It could not be done without the waste of an unknown sum of money, and yet the Railway Commissioners might order this expense, saying it was extremely convenient for the public to make the alteration. A Commission of three gentlemen—containing a gentleman of legal experience, another of railway experience, and another of no experience—might order a Railway Company to spend that money. The net profits of Railway Companies, taking off working expenses, were only 47 per cent of the gross earnings. The ordinary shareholders held 37 per cent of the whole capital, and the net income was 0·47 of the gross. If they multiplied the 0·37 by the 0·47 they would find that every penny they took off the gross income of the Company, to give it to their customers, as the Duke of Devonshire's Commission said, as near as possible sixpence was taken off the ordinary shareholders. As to the Commission, the common pickpockets and burglars have a right to be tried by the best Judge in England, and a woman with an action for breach of promise could appeal through all the Courts on points of law. By the Bill the Railway Companies were treated throughout as hostes humani generis. It had been said that a strong Court was wanted. Yes; one strong enough to override law and justice, and do whatever they think will be popular, or which the customers of Railways are pleased to think fair, as the noble Lord (Lord Henniker) said. In this Bill every possible presumption was made against the Railway Companies. His noble Friend (Lord Brabourne) had spoken on behalf of the Directors; he (Lord Grimthorpe) was afraid that the brevity of his remarks might not be altogether satisfactory to the Railway Defence Association, of which he was made President some years ago. That Association was called into existence because the shareholders generally found that they could not trust the Directors to act for them collectively. Each Chairman and each Manager—who generally managed the Chairman, and had a fixed salary for it—looked after his own interest. If they could so go to the Board of Trade and get some nice little thing for their own Company they would sacrifice everybody else. This was not his opinion only, because the Committee of 1872 said just the same thing. They said that Railway shareholders were practically sheep, without any real control over their managers, to whose speculations, ambition, and passions the Committee attributed a great deal of the past misfortunes of shareholders. At that late hour he would say no more, but hoped that the remarks of his two noble Friends (Lords Brabourne and Bramwell), if not his own, would make a due impression on the Government, and show them the real nature of this Bill.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he could not agree that the Railway Companies ought to be regarded as ordinary traders, because they undoubtedly possessed monopolies, and it was therefore necessary from time to time to inquire into their proceedings. With regard to the jurisdiction of the Commission, when he first read Clause 27 of the Bill, he was a little in doubt as to whether it would not be desirable to transfer the arbitration which was rendered possible under that Clause to the Commissioners, rather than to the Board of Trade. He felt that it was desirable to make that Commission as strong as possible, and he thought also that, dealing as they did with matters of litigation, they would be the best persons to deal also with arbitration. On further consideration, however, he thought it would be better to leave it to the Board of Trade, because the Commissioners would have to sit as Judges, and it would therefore be very difficult for them, having acted as arbiters in the first instance, to be called in as Judges to settle matters which they had failed to settle as arbiters. The Board of Trade also had in Parliament a responsible Member of the Government, and, therefore the Railway Companies had a better means of sifting any alleged injustice on the part of the Board of Trade, and of obtaining an appeal against their decisions, than they would have if this matter were committed to the Commissioners. With regard to revision of the rates, it was by no means certain that a revision of the maximum rates would necessarily mean a diminution of the ordinary rates charged by Railway Companies. Respecting short distances—a very important part of their traffic—it should be borne in mind that revision might lead to an increase in the charges. With respect to terminals, express recognition was for the first time given to them by this Bill. So far, it was a concession to the Railway Companies. As to Clause 25, he should postpone his remarks. One matter to be considered in Committee would be, the objection taken by producers that Railways—which annihilated distance—had artificially cheapened goods brought from certain portions of the United Kingdom and from abroad, at the expense of goods produced in the localities less favourably placed. That was the strangest argument that could be put forward for a charge of that character, as if the consumer were the only person interested. Moreover, the consumer, if benefitted by goods being carried cheaply for long distances, would also be benefitted by lower charges for goods carried a short distance.

Lord Grimthorpe

THE EARL OF JERSEY said, he hoped that there would be no objection to the Chairman of the new Commission being a Judge. It could not be for the interests of anyone connected with trade or agriculture that any injustice should be done to the Railway Companies. As to the revision of the classification of goods, that was desired both by the Companies and the traders. In his opinion, if the Companies were to take advantage of the Clearing House classification, they would be able to review their rates much more quickly than in any other way. He did not believe, however, that the terminals definition in the Bill would meet with the assent of either the agricultural or the commercial classes. He was sure that what had fallen from the noble Lord the President of the Board of Trade (Lord Stanley of Preston) on one point, would be received with great regret by all traders; for the noble Lord indicated that he had given up the home producer in favour of the foreigner. In his opinion, it was impossible to suppose that any settlement of the question of preferential rates would be satisfactory to the home producer as long as the foreign producer received a bounty in the shape of lower Railway rates than had to be paid by the producer at home. As to the Appellate Court, he thought that there ought to be no objection to only one appeal, and he hoped that the measure would become law this Session, and that it would be of advantage to the country.

THE MARQUESS OF TWEEDDALE said, that what the Railway Companies desired, as regarded the constitution of the Court for dealing with preferential rates, was that it should be a strong Court. According to the proposal of the Bill, the Court would sometimes be strong and at other times weak; sometimes an inferior Court, and at other times a superior Court. It was most undesirable that Parliament should leave it an open question whether a Judge was to be called in or not. The Commission itself would be unwilling to show their inferiority in dealing with matters of law and fact by sending for a Judge. The proper thing was to constitute a Court under the presidency of a Judge. He thought that the Conciliation Clauses of the Bill would, in certain cases, develop a most mischievous kind of litigation, inasmuch as they provided no protection for the Railway Companies against harassing claims of all descriptions. He should prefer a strong fixed Commission to an oscillating one, which would be sometimes strong and sometimes weak, so that it might give a promise of consistency and continuity in its decisions. The clauses relating to the revision of rates appeared to give the Board of Trade unlimited powers of revising rates in such a manner that they might practically extinguish the property of the Railway shareholders. He thought that the Bill ought to contain some instruction to the Board of Trade that in revising rates they should have due regard to the legal and equitable rights of all parties interested. With regard to the clauses dealing with undue preference it should be remembered that three-fifths of the whole rates of Railway Companies were practically ruled by the keen competition of shipping interest and the Steamship Companies, and that the greater part of the remaining two-fifths were determined by Railway competition. It was said that this Bill legalized terminals for the first time, but he pointed out that this was not so. He hoped that their Lordships, if they read this Bill a second time, would not ignore the fact that whatever injured the Railway interest would injure the country at large, and that it was much more probable that they would get low rates and efficient service from rich and prosperous Railway Companies than from poor and struggling ones hampered by unwise legislation.

LORD STALBRIDGE said, one part of the community that had not been represented in the debate was the consumer. In fixing their rates the Railway Companies had been doing their best in the interests of the consumer as of any others, their object having been to bring food within the reach of the consumer as cheaply as possible. Taken as a whole, Railway arrangements had been very fairly carried out. It must be remembered that it had been intended originally that Railway rates should be revised only when the shareholders were receiving a 10 per cent dividend, whereas the average dividend now paid was only 4½ per cent. If the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Preston) and the Board of Trade should pass this Bill they would have taken a great responsibility off the shoulders of the Railway Companies and put it upon their own, which would not be able to bear it, and deal with the work properly.

LORD STANLEY OF PRESTON, in reply, said, he would postpone to another time much that he had to say. With regard to the argument of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell), he must observe that, however honourable the intentions of the Railway Companies, their claims, on grounds of public policy, could not be admitted to the full extent. As to the constitution of the Court, the noble and learned Lord (Lord Herschell) asked a good many questions about points which were rather matters for Committee, than for dealing with at that stage of the Bill,

He quite admitted that the stronger the Court the less likelihood there was of appeals. He had been asked what the position would be if the legal Commissioner and the Judge took one view, and the two lay Commissioners another? He believed the usual course was, if the Court was equally divided, that the junior withdrew his judgment, and that, in point of fact, no difficulty was found in adjusting a matter which at first sight might seem to present some. He believed that after some questions were decided, the right of appeal would be rarely exercised. Parliament had, in many cases, recognized the necessity for classification; and he did not believe that the great difficulties which some noble Lords anticipated would be likely to arise. He fully acknowledged that Railways in this country were well managed, and that we had not much to learn from foreigners on that subject; and he believed that in dealing with the question of classification, the Board of Trade, with the assistance of the Railway Companies, and something like the Clearing House classification to guide them, would not find the task so difficult as the noble Lord seemed to suppose. A noble Lord had spoken of the second part of the 25th clause as offering a bounty in favour of the foreigner. But the foreigner had really nothing to do with the matter. With reference to the Conciliation or Arbitration Clause of the Bill, a noble Lord opposite had spoken of it in sarcastic tones; but he (Lord Stanley of Preston) was quite ready to discuss the clause on its merits, believing that if grievances could be adjusted without recourse to litigation, it would be an advantage to all parties interested. He thanked their Lordships for the spirit in which they had received the measure, and earnestly trusted the Bill would lead to useful legislation. There were some points of difference between them which were merely nominal; but he recognized that there were others of principle for which he feared there was no half-way house, and in regard to which they must agree to differ. Still, speaking of the Bill as a whole, and not of particular provisions, he was glad to find that there were important points in it on which they were all agreed; and, bearing in mind the spirit in which the Bill was framed and introduced, he strongly hoped that it would lead to the passing of a useful and satisfactory measure.

Lord Stanley of Preston

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 29th instant.

INCUMBENTS OF BENEFICES LOANS
EXTENSION ACT (1886) AMENDMENT
BILL.—(No. 39.)

(The Duke of Buckingham and Chandos.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Duke of BUCKINGHAM AND CHANDOS), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that its purpose was, in consequence of the agricultural depression that had prevailed, to enable the Queen Anne's Bounty Board to extend, with the consent of the patron, the time for the repayment of mortgages and to provide that extension might be made, notwithstanding extensions made under the Act of 44 & 45 Vict., introduced by the Bishop of Peterborough, and fixed under a previous Act to a period not exceeding 20 years in all from the latest date fixed at present.

*Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Duke of Buckingham and Chandos.)*

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

CHURCH SITES (COMPULSORY POWERS REPEAL) BILL.—(No. 22.)

(The Lord Bishop of Lichfield.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it explained itself; and seeing the lateness of the hour and the paucity of attendance, he would reserve the observations he had to make to a later stage.

*Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Bishop of Lichfield.)*

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY) said, that in his opinion, the measure was very objectionable, and, if not considerably amended in Committee, he should feel bound to move its rejection.

tion altogether. Its effect would be to repeal previous Acts of Parliament to a considerable extent, and he should have some remarks to make upon it. The right rev. Prelate, however, had agreed to introduce a section in Committee, stating what Acts he proposed to repeal, and he should reserve what he had to say until he saw the section. Subject to that, he made no objection to the second reading of the Bill.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (LIMERICK WATER) BILL.

A Bill to confirm a Provisional Order of the Local Government Board for Ireland relating to waterworks in the City of Limerick—Was presented by The Lord Privy Seal; read 1^a. (No. 42.)

SMOKE NUISANCE ABATEMENT (METROPOLIS) BILL.

A Bill to amend the Acts for abating the nuisance arising from the smoke of furnaces and fireplaces within the Metropolis—Was presented by The Lord Stratheden and Campbell; read 1^a. (No. 43.)

House adjourned at Nine o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 14th March, 1887.

MINUTES.]—New Writ Issued—For Derby (Ilkeston Division), v. Thomas Watson, esquire, deceased.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Commons, appointed and nominated.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES, 1887-8, Votes A and I.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Copyright (Musical Compositions)* [195]; Criminal Law (Scotland) Procedure (No. 2)* [196].

Second Reading—Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Acts Amendment* [198].

Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—Merchandise Marks Act (1862) Amendment* [142]; Merchandise (Fraudulent Marks)* [179], referred to Select Committee on Merchandise Marks Act (1862) Amendment Bill. Select Committee—Rating of Machinery [148], nominated.

Committee—Metropolitan Open Spaces Act (1881) Extension* [171]—R.F.

Committee—Report—County Courts (Expenses)* [177].

Withdrawn—Foynes Harbour (Transfer)* [169].

QUESTIONS.

THE COPPER CURRENCY—FRENCH BRONZE COINS.

Mr. ATKINSON (Boston) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he can arrange in any way to obviate the inconvenience resulting to some tradesmen in the Provinces, who are obliged in the way of business to receive French bronze coins as equivalents for English pennies, and find themselves unable to pay them away at the Public Offices such as the Post Office?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): The Government is doing all that can be done to prevent the circulation of foreign bronze coins in this country by issuing a Proclamation under the Act of last year forbidding their importation. The hon. Member will, I am sure, recognize that it would be impossible for Government Departments to receive payment except in coins of the realm.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—OMAGH POST OFFICE.

Mr. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether two of the female clerks attached to the Omagh Post Office have hours of duty assigned to them which do not necessitate their attendance at either an early or late hour; whether the duty of the third clerk is so arranged as to compel her to attend both at early and late duty; whether the Inspecting Telegraphist of the Northern Postal Division is aware of the existing arrangements in the Omagh Post Office; and, whether independent inquiries will be instituted as to the mode in which business generally has been conducted in the post office referred to?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): From inquiry which I have made, it appears that the duties at the Omagh Post Office are, on the whole, fairly distributed between the hours of 7 in the morning and 8 at night amongst the three female clerks there with due intervals of rest for each. If any one of the female clerks wishes to make a representation with a view to the alteration of her present hours of duty, her proper course is to submit it in the usual manner, when I should look into the case. The Inspecting Telegraphist exercises no control over the office hours. The duties at the Omagh Office are performed satisfactorily, and there are very few complaints against that office.

NAVY—THE CHANNEL SQUADRON AT LISBON AND GIBRALTAR.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, in face of recent accidents to some of the ships comprising the Channel Squadron at Lisbon Harbour and Gibraltar, he considers the ground-tackle of the Navy sufficiently satisfactory for the safety of the ships; and, whether he has received a Report, and, if so, what, from Admiral Hewett regarding the accidents to some of the vessels under his command?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): Although there have been some accidents recently in connection with ships of the Channel Squadron, it is considered that the ground-tackle of the Navy is sufficient for the safety of the ships. The Reports received from Sir William Hewett do not suggest that the ground-tackle is too light for the ships, it being of the same size and weight as that which has been established for our largest iron-clad ships, and is in general use by them.

SEED SUPPLY (IRELAND) ACT—REPAYMENT OF LOANS.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What percentage of the money advanced for seed in Ireland has been repaid; if the balance is due by unions situated in the poorer districts, and with a large population; if he would institute an inquiry to ascertain if such balances were chiefly uncollectable, from causes arising from hurry in issuing the seed; and, if an inquiry would also be made as to the possibility of remitting a portion of said balances?

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If Government will consider, with respect to the trifling balance of the Seed Rate now unpaid, that it is due from the poorest and most distressed districts, upon which enforcing the collection would entail distress entirely out of proportion to any good to be gained by the Treasury by the receipt of the sum in question; and, if, seeing how punctually the vast bulk of the Seed Rate has been repaid, he will recommend that Government shall forego its claim for the small balance still due by the very poor districts?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): In reply to these questions, I may state that something over 7 per cent of the Seed Loan, chiefly due from the poorer districts, is still outstanding. The question of the possibility of remitting a portion of the balance is one rather for the Treasury than for me. We are in communication on the subject; but, in saying this, I must not be understood to make any promise of remission.

THE MAGISTRACY (SCOTLAND)—MR. STIPENDIARY GEMMEL.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the acceptance by Mr. Stipendiary Gemmel, Glasgow, of the appointment of Assessor to the Dean of Guild Court, Glasgow; and, whether this latter appointment interferes with the due fulfilment of his duties as stipendiary magistrate; and, if so, whether the Government intend taking any steps in the matter?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I am informed that the appointment of Assessor does not interfere with the proper fulfilment of Mr. Gemmel's duties as stipendiary magistrate. Mr. Gemmel informed the Lord Provost and magistrates before taking the appointment; and intimated that if at any time they should be of opinion that it did interfere with his other duties he was prepared to resign it.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND)—REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) (for Mr. MAHONY (Meath, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Report which was presented on 1st May, 1886, to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, on the subject of the Bankruptcy Court, by a Committee consisting of the Vice Chancellor, Judge Flanagan, and Mr. Richard Mills; also a Copy of the Letter which the Treasury Remembrancer in Ireland wrote with reference to this Report?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I must ask the hon. Member to be good enough to postpone this Question for a few days, to enable me to make some inquiry I have not hitherto had opportunity for.

LAND PURCHASE (IRELAND) ACT— APPLICATIONS FOR ADVANCES.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) (for Mr. MAHONY (Meath, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, The number of applications for advances of purchase money under Lord Ashbourne's Act, which the Land Commissioners have refused to sanction, and the amount of money applied for under these applications; and, the number of applications subsequently sanctioned, in which the Land Commissioners have recommended a modification of the terms of purchase and the amount of the said modifications?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners report that up to the 10th of this month they had refused 434 applications for loans, amounting to about £317,000. Of these, 67 were subsequently sanctioned, the amounts of loans being reduced from about £61,000 to a little over £50,000.

MR. MAC NEILL asked the number of cases in which the Land Commissioners had recommended a modification of the terms of purchase?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must have Notice of that Question.

MR. MAC NEILL: It is on the Paper.

PROCLAIMED MEETINGS (IRELAND)— NATIONAL LEAGUE MEETING AT ASHGROVE, CO. CORK.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in consequence of the proclamation of a National League meeting which was to have been held at Ashgrove, Kilnamartyra, County Cork, on Sunday, the 6th March, Mr. Stokes, a Resident Magistrate, prevented the local band in Macroom from playing in the Square as usual;—whether the report in The Cork Daily Herald of Monday, 7th March, is correct, namely—

"That on the band making its appearance in the square, Mr. Stokes issued out of the police barrack attended by about fifty constables, principally from Cork, some of whom had removed the numbers from the collars of their jackets to prevent discovery;"

and, if this report is true, whether he will call the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the matter? And I should further like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether it is a fact that he has applied to the police authorities and the people who are incriminated by this Question for information on the subject?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Yes; I have applied for information to the police. In reply to the hon. Gentleman's Question, I have to state that in view of anticipated disturbances, Captain Stokes, the Resident Magistrate, had on the morning of the day referred to, warned the band that he could not permit them to proceed or play through the town, and on their subsequently attempting to do so, he very properly prevented them by means of the police. It is not the case that any of the police removed their numbers from their collars. Six of the party employed upon the duty are members of the County Force, and as such, do not wear numbers.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Arising out of that Question, I should like to know by what authority magistrates, resident or otherwise, are entitled to prevent bands playing in the streets?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On this occasion the Resident Magistrate had reason to believe the band was proceeding to a proclaimed meeting at Kilnamartyra, and he was strictly within his duty in preventing them doing so.

DR. TANNER: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether he is aware that Macroom is three miles from the place of the prohibited meeting; and, whether he is also aware that the band plays every Sunday in the Square at Macroom; and whether Captain Stokes is not also aware of this fact?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: From the information I have I have reason to believe the band does not play in Macroom every Sunday; and there is reason to believe that on this day the band was going to march three miles to the proclaimed meeting.

DR. TANNER intimated that he would repeat the Question on a subsequent day.

WAR OFFICE (SMALL ARMS)—MARTINI-HENRY RIFLES.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked the Secretary of State for War, What was the cost incurred by the production of the Enfield-Martini rifles lately issued and condemned or abandoned; and, whether the Lee-Burton and Lee magazine rifles will be submitted to independent criticism before being manufactured?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Although the accounts have not yet been made up in detail, it is estimated that the Enfield-Martini rifles cost 45s. each. They have neither been condemned nor abandoned. The Lee-Burton and Lee magazine rifles are about to be issued for thorough trial by the Army and Navy before either pattern is adopted.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—PROSECUTION OF DISTRICT INSPECTOR MILLING—ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Upon what grounds he vetoed the prosecution of District Inspector Milling, Royal Irish Constabulary, for an assault for which he had been committed for trial; and, whether there is any statute entitling Mr. Attorney General thus to veto prosecutions?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): Before a bill of indictment is found, the Attorney General neither exercises nor claims the right to veto a prosecution. As Public Prosecutor he is entitled to direct that a prosecution be conducted by the Crown officials; and I have declined, in the exercise of the discretion which I thus possess, to give such a direction in the case of District Inspector Milling. After a bill of indictment is found, the Attorney General, as representing the Queen, has had, as the hon. Member must be aware, from the earliest times, the power to enter a nolle prosequi.

MR. CHANCE: May I point out to the right hon. and learned Gentleman

Mr. A. J. Balfour

he has not answered the last paragraph of the Question—whether there is any statute entitling the Attorney General to veto prosecutions?

MR. HOLMES: The Attorney General never does veto a prosecution; the only thing he does is to enter a nolle prosequi—a power he has possessed from the earliest period of our law.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, AND THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1885—SHORTHAND WRITERS' NOTES.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will take steps to enable Members of this House to inspect the original notes and transcript of the shorthand writers employed to record the proceedings of the Cowper Commission; and, whether contradictory reports of the evidence of one of the witnesses examined before that Commission have already appeared in the newspapers?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The hon. Member suggests a most unusual course, and one which could not, in my opinion, be properly complied with. In any event, it does not lie within my power to comply with it, as the documents referred to are not in the possession of the Irish Government.

MR. CHANCE: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether he has any reason to suppose that the evidence now published has been in any way condensed from the original notes?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I have no reason whatever to make any such supposition.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say how it is that not one word of certain witnesses who were examined at Killarney appears at all?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware of that, nor does it come within my province.

POST OFFICE—SALE OF STAMPS TO RAILWAY TELEGRAPH CLERKS.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the Postmaster General, Whether he is prepared to re-introduce the system of commission on sale of stamps to railway telegraph clerks as allowed until October, 1885; and, whether he is prepared to compensate those clerks who were in 1885 deprived of this portion of their income?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that I do not see my way to re-introduce the payment of commission on the sale of stamps; but I am glad to add that the Treasury have authorized certain terms of compensation, and I am in communication with the Railway Companies on the subject.

LAND ACT (IRELAND)—WICKLOW TENANTS.

MR. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that a great many tenants in the County Wicklow are anxious to get their rents fixed under the Land Act; and, whether anything can be done to expedite the matter by sending a Sub-Commission to the county speedily to hear their cases?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I understand from the Land Commissioners that about 56 cases from Wicklow are pending, and they expect that a Sub-Commission will sit in that county about July. I may add that the Government have at present before them the question of increasing the number of Sub-Commissions.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (CHANCERY DIVISION)—AN ADDITIONAL JUDGE.

MR. F. W. MACLEAN (Oxford, Woodstock) asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been called to the unanimous recommendation contained in the Report, dated 7th August, 1885, of the Committee appointed by the Lord Chancellor (the Earl of Selborne) relative to the subject of the business of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice—

“That an additional Judge be appointed to the Chancery Division, and that the same staff of clerks be attributed to each of the Judges.”

And to the unanimous Resolution of the Committee—

“That an additional Judge be appointed, to be a Judge of the Chancery Division.”

And, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take such steps as may be necessary to give effect to the above Recommendation and Resolution?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): The matter referred to in the Question of the hon. and learned Member is engaging the attention of Her Majesty's Government; but, at present, no final decision has been come to.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT—LOANS OF WORKS OF ART, &c.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether, considering that the works of the Schools of Art sent up for the National competition can only be exhibited at the South Kensington Museum in a gallery imperfectly lit, owing to the want of space at that Museum, he will provide space in one of the numerous galleries by circulating some of the duplicate and triplicate specimens of furniture, china, pottery, metal work, glass, embroidery, and other objects which now crowd up the Museum, to different parts of London, and other centres of dense population, and so assist to supply that local demand for the loan of circulating collections, which the Science and Art Department's last Report, at page xvii., states is now a severe tax on the resources of the South Kensington Museum?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): My hon. Friend has practically converted into a Question a Motion which has stood for some time upon the Notice Paper. I believe that the system of loans is now carried out to the full extent of the present resources of the Department. So long as the practice is adhered to of exchanging the objects lent every year, and in the case of loans to temporary Exhibitions at shorter periods—a course which is greatly preferred by the localities—it is obvious that the temporary removal of different objects from distant parts of the Museum would not supply the space in any given part of it, which is assumed in the Question. Twenty-six thousand one hundred and sixty-four objects were in circulation last year, through 32 Provincial Museums (not including Bethnal Green), 26 temporary Exhibitions, and 260 Science and Art Schools; but the number of duplicate and triplicate specimens is comparatively small.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—MR. E. RYAN, COMMITTED FOR CONTEMPT.

MR. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Edmond Ryan, P.L.G., Oahircanlish, County Limerick, was committed for contempt of Court eight months ago by Judge Boyd; whether Oahircanlish has been, and is now, one of the most peaceable districts in the County Limerick; and, whether, under those circumstances, the Government will request Judge Boyd to order the release of Mr. Ryan?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It would clearly be a most un-Constitutional proceeding for the Government to make such a request to the Judge as is here suggested. It is, of course, open to the prisoner himself, or to his friends, to petition the Judge for his release.

EVICIONS (IRELAND)—NOTICE TO RELIEVING OFFICERS.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether, having regard to the fact that 48 hours' notice of an intended eviction, from a landlord or some one on his behalf, must be given to the relieving officer of the union in which the property is situated, and that at any time within a year the landlord may proceed with the eviction without further acquainting the relieving officer, he will consider the advisability of amending the law, so as to compel owners of property, or their agents, to inform the relieving officer of the exact dates of evictions, to ensure that provisional relief should be administered to the persons evicted?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): Although I have not heard that any actual inconvenience has arisen from the state of the law mentioned in the Question, I should like to see it, in some respects, altered; but I fear that any change that could be suggested would cause considerable difficulty. I am, however, at present engaged in further inquiring into this subject.

Sir William Hart Dyke

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—THE HERBUSTA CROFTERS—MRS. M'MILLAN.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to the following medical certificate concerning Mrs. M'Millan, one of the Herbusta crofters, ordered for trial at Edinburgh on 4th January, but not proceeded against:—

"I hereby certify that Mrs. Alexr. M'Millan, presently residing at 284, Crookston Street, S.S. Glasgow, is under my professional care, and has been for the last three weeks. She is suffering from chronic metritis, following an acute attack of the same illness caused by an abortion, which, in my opinion, was brought on by exposure and mental excitement.

"(Signed) R. Pollock,

"M.B. and O.M., &c.

"Febry. 24th, 1887."

Whether it is a fact that on or about the 18th ultimo Mrs. M'Millan, while under medical care in her sister's house in Glasgow, was ordered to present herself at the office of the Procurator Fiscal, and, on her pleading inability to walk, was on the following day visited by that official, and subjected to a long and inquisitorial examination, the result of which was to aggravate her illness; and, on what grounds Mrs. M'Millan was subjected to this interview?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): Mrs. M'Millan was ordered to be tried, along with eight other prisoners, for mobbing, rioting, and deforcement. Before the trial, but after she had arrived in Edinburgh, I was informed by her counsel of her condition, and I accordingly did not proceed with the case against her. As she had not been tried, it was considered an exceptional case, in which her expenses might be paid, and £5 was given to her for that purpose. She left Edinburgh without applying any part of the £5 to pay her lodging expenses there; and shortly after a request was made by a Mr. Cowan, who, I understand, is the Secretary of a Highland Land League, for payment of these. Directions were then given to the Procurator Fiscal in Glasgow to see Mrs. M'Millan, to ascertain whether this application was made on her behalf, and what expenses she had already paid. It is not the fact that she was ordered to present herself at the Procurator Fiscal's office. The chief officer who called on her had instructions from the Procurator Fiscal that if she expressed any doubt about being able to come, or if he himself thought she seemed to be in delicate health, he should so report, and the Procurator Fiscal would call. This was accordingly done. There was no long or inquisitorial examination. The interview lasted only 10 or 15 minutes, and no complaint was made. I am further informed that that interview did not aggravate her illness. As it was found that she had been detained in Glasgow some time by the after effects of her illness, it was thought proper to allow £8 additional, and the order to pay this sum was given before I received Notice of the hon. Member's Question. The ground on which the interview took place was, that until I had ascertained how the facts stood I could not, consistently with my duty, entertain the application for more money.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (IRELAND)—NORTH ANTRIM ELECTION—MALICIOUS INJURY TO PROPERTY.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in The Belfast Morning News of the 25th February last, from which it appears that malicious injuries were inflicted on the properties of several persons who had supported the Liberal candidate, Mr. M'Elroy, who stood in opposition to Mr. Lewis at the last North Antrim election; whether stacks of corn and hay belonging to a Protestant Liberal (Mr. Daniel M'Mullen, of Mullahduff), near Armoy, were maliciously burned; whether the windows of houses belonging to two Catholics (Mr. Thomas Burns and Mr. Patrick Quin, of Castlebawn) were broken, and other outrages committed in the district on the same night; and, whether any steps have been taken by the Constabulary to bring the offenders to justice?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): There is no reason to believe that feelings caused by the recent election had anything to do with these occurrences, which, moreover, are exaggerated in the report quoted from. The burning of Mr. M'Mullen's stacks is believed to have been accidental. A shilling's worth of damage was done to the windows of a man named Burns, who did not mention the occurrence to the police. No other so-called "outrage" has been reported in the district.

MR. M'CARTAN asked, whether it was not the fact that these occurrences took place on the very night of the election?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he could not give the date.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—SACRILEGIOUS INJURY TO ATHEA CHURCH, CO. LIMERICK.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the statement in The Times of the 9th instant that—

"The Protestant church which was built at Athea, in the west of the County Limerick . . . was entered on Sunday night . . . the memorial stained-glass window, erected by Archdeacon Goold in memory of some of his family, smashed with stones. . . . The Bible was also torn from the lectern, the seats knocked about, and the interior of the building disfigured and outraged;"

whether, if this report is true, he can give any information as to the cause of these outrages; and, what steps have been taken to bring the perpetrators to justice?

MR. ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that Question, I wish to know whether he has received a copy of a telegram received from the parish priest, in which he states that the utmost indignation prevails among the Catholic inhabitants of the town; and, also, whether a public meeting was held yesterday, at which strong resolutions were passed condemning this outrage, and offering a reward for the discovery of the perpetrators; also, whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the utmost cordiality has prevailed among the Catholic and Protestant inhabitants for the last 50 years?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have received the telegram referred to, and which I thank the hon. Member for having sent me. I also heard of the meeting which was held yesterday. The outrage is believed to have been the work of some drunken boys. I am happy to say that the police authorities do not think it has any political or sectarian character. Four persons are in custody, and will be brought before the magistrates this week.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS — BOATS AND LIFE-SAVING APPARATUS ON PASSENGER SHIPS.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether the Committee which sat last year on the question of boats and life saving apparatus to be carried by passenger ships reported in October last; whether the Report was signed by all the Members of the Committee; what has become of the Report; and, whether, considering the interest taken by the public in the means taken to preserve life at sea, he will cause the recommendations of the Committee to be made known by publishing their Report?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): Yes, Sir; the Departmental Committee referred to by my hon. Friend reported in October last. The Report was signed by all the Members. It has been sent to the Royal Commission on Loss of Life at Sea, in accordance with a promise made to that effect; but as we think the question should be dealt with at once, without waiting for the Report of the Commission, it is proposed forthwith to move for a Select Committee of this House to inquire and report on the whole subject. The Report of the Departmental Committee will be presented as a Command Paper, and will be referred to the Select Committee if they so desire.

POST OFFICE — NEWSPAPER WRAPPERS AND "VANITY FAIR."

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is the fact that, immediately upon the reduction in price of Vanity Fair newspaper from 1s. to 6d., the Post Office Authorities peremptorily required the publisher to discontinue the use of a printed wrapper which had been in use for the transmission of the newspaper through the post for over 18 years, without any complaint being made of it?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The Regulation to which the hon. Member refers is in no way connected with an alteration in any newspaper. It was considered necessary "some time back," for the due performance of the sorting duty, to restrict the printed matter on newspaper wrappers to the title and the address of the publisher, and the Warrant prescribing this has been in force since July last. From time to time a question has arisen as to what is really a part of the title of a newspaper. But I should state that an application from the publishers of Vanity Fair was made a fortnight ago; and that, under the representations made, a consent was at once given to the wrappers hitherto used passing unchallenged. I am anxious that the Regulation should not be enforced in a vexatious manner.

SHIPPING—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, When the Report of the Royal Commission on Shipping will be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): I understand that the Commissioners are now considering their Report, and that they hope it will be laid before the House in the course of the present Session?

ARMY—SENTENCES BY COURTS MARTIAL — THE RECENT RULES AND REGULATIONS.

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT (Roxburgh) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in order to carry out the object of His Royal Highness Commanding in Chief, manifested in the Regulations and Instructions recently issued, enjoining sentences by courts martial of much less severity than heretofore, the cases of those convicted and sentenced previously have been, or will be, considered, with the view of shortening their imprisonment; and, whether this has been, or can be, done in the cases of sentence to penal servitude without the stigma of a ticket-of-leave or licence, or will require a Royal pardon?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): In order to carry out the object of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, manifested in the Regulations and Instructions recently issued, enjoining sentences by courts martial of much less severity than heretofore, every sentence passed within the last 12 months which has seemed severe has been inquired into, and remission made in cases which appeared worthy of it. Under an arrangement with the Home Office, all cases of soldiers sentenced to penal servitude are brought forward for consideration after certain periods of the sentences have been served; and when the interests of discipline will not suffer remissions are granted without licences or tickets-of-leave.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

PROCLAIMED MEETINGS (IRELAND)— RETURNS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in view of the importance of accurate information on the subject, he will give a Return of the public meetings proclaimed, or attempted to be suppressed, in Ireland from 1st August, 1886, to 28th February, 1887, inclusive, with Copies of the placards calling the meetings, and of the Proclamations prohibiting the holding of the same?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The House has already been informed that eight meetings were prohibited within the period from August 1 to February 28. It may be of interest to state in this connection that in the same period considerably over 100 meetings were held without any interference on the part of the Authorities. I do not think it necessary, or would be expedient, to put in the form of a Parliamentary Return the placards with regard to the proclaimed meetings; partly because, having been posted over the districts concerned, they are already matters of notoriety; and partly because they might be taken to represent the whole case on which the Government acted, and might, therefore, be misleading.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Would the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to give the specific dates of the eight meetings suppressed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, I cannot give them at this moment.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)— FATHER KELLER, YOUGHAL.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON (Devon, South Molton) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Executive will, without further delay, make the fullest use of such powers as they are already possessed of to enforce the warrant of Judge Boyd upon Father Keller, of Youghal, who is defying the orders of Her Majesty's Courts?

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that Question I wish to supplement it by asking whether the only act of defiance of the orders of Her Majesty's Court which the rev. gentleman has been guilty of is refusing to proceed to Dublin to disclose in Court the secrets the parishioners confided to him in his capacity of parish priest?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I believe the summons was issued for contempt. In answer to the noble Viscount, I may say the Executive will give every assistance to the Court in carrying out the order.

MR. LANE: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, if he is not aware that it is announced in the papers this morning that the summons and proceedings to induce this clergyman to go to Dublin have been withdrawn altogether?

[No reply.]

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS — COMBINED DEPARTMENTS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

SIR JOHN DORINGTON (Gloucester, Tewkesbury) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in consequence of the Report of the Inspector of Reformatories and Industrial Schools as to the objections he entertains to combining departments for boys and for girls in the same industrial school, he intends to take any action in the direction of closing one of such departments in such industrial schools?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I share the opinion of the Inspector, that it is desirable, if possible, to place boys and girls in separate industrial schools; and I am now considering whether it will be possible to effect this separation, having regard to the number and situation of industrial schools in different parts of the country.

WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—CONTRACTS—CARTRIDGES—MESSRS. KYNOCH AND CO.

SIR FREDERICK MAPPIN (York, W.R., Hallamshire) asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether the present contract for cartridges is the first Messrs. Kynoch and Company, of Birmingham, have entered into with the British Government; if not, whether the rejections have exceeded 20 per cent, or what has been the percentage; whether Messrs. Kynoch and Company have previously supplied the British Government with any other articles or materials other than cartridges; and, whether the rejections in any case have exceeded 20 per cent of the contract?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL (Mr. NORTHOTE) (Exeter): There have been three previous contracts with the firm, all for solid-drawn cartridge cases, to a total of 1,700,000. Of the first of these contracts for 500,000 cartridges, 40 per cent were rejected as not according to pattern, and of the two others 8 1·3 per cent were rejected for failure at proof; and a large number were withdrawn by the contractors after being sent in as of the same sort as those which had failed at proof. No articles other than cartridges have been contracted for with the firm.

WAR OFFICE—WARRANT OFFICERS—REGIMENTAL SERGEANT MAJORS.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will take into consideration the case of Regimental Sergeant Majors, who have been deprived of the relative rank and privileges granted to them as Warrant Officers in 1881, and enjoyed by them up to the date of the Queen's Regulations issued in November, 1885, and also of Army Warrant Officers of the second and third class (including Regimental Sergeant Majors), who, not being mentioned in the General Order, No. 28, of the 1st March, 1886, only rank when on board Her Majesty's Ships with Chief Petty Officers, and have thus been deprived of the advantages and position due to their Warrant rank; and, whether he will take steps to restore Army Warrant Officers to the position in which they were placed in 1881?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The question of the relative rank with the Navy to be allowed to Warrant Officers of the Army is extremely complicated, and I can scarcely deal with it within the limits of an answer. If, however, the hon. Member can make it convenient to call upon me at the War Office, I will explain to him the position of the question, and will consider any specific grievance he can adduce.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will renew to all Warrant Officers in the Army the privileges enjoyed by them in 1881, and which in 1885 were limited to two classes—namely, conductors and first and second class master-gunners?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am not quite sure which are the privileges to which my hon. and gallant Friend refers. If, however, he alludes to that of being permitted to appear out of uniform—which, as the hon. and gallant Member is aware, does not extend to non-commissioned officers or private soldiers—I would observe that, before 1881, the Warrant Officers were very few in number, and almost necessarily serving away from other Warrant Officers. In those circumstances, no inconvenience was felt in allowing them the same undress privileges as are accorded to officers. When, however, by the Royal Warrant of 1881, the rank of Warrant Officer was very largely extended, and was subdivided into many classes, it was anticipated that there would be military disadvantage in allowing them such great liberty in the matter of dress; and the new classes of Warrant Officers were limited for plain clothes to times when on pass, or furlough, and leaving the place where they are stationed. So far as I can learn, no ground exists for any relaxation of this rule.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—EVICTIIONS AT ENNISCORTHY—EMPLOYMENT OF THE CONSTABULARY.

A POINT OF ORDER—ALTERING QUESTIONS.

The following Notice of a Question stood on the Paper:—

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Wexford, N.)—To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the proceedings which took place at certain evictions in the town of Enniscorthy on 15th February; whether the following account of some of the proceedings, taken from a local paper, is correct:—

"The police, of which there were about 40, with some horsemen, and who were under the command of District Inspector Mulock, were told off in twos to enter the houses and demand possession. They were told to take possession. It may here be mentioned that with such aversion are those evictions regarded that no bailiff could be got to undertake the work, and therefore the police were ordered in the name of the law to act as bailiffs. The tenants and the members of their families having almost without exception refused to stir from the houses until every article of furniture was removed, the police set about their work. Four or five police together entered each house, and proceeded to carry out the effects which the tenants had left in the houses. A scene of indescribable commotion was caused when a policeman was observed carrying out the cradle from which the infant child of three weeks old had just immediately before been taken out ;"

and, whether it is legal for the police to act as bailiffs at evictions?

MR. J. E. REDMOND: Before asking this Question, I will ask permission to submit a Question to you, Sir, on a point of Order. It is with reference to the practice, which is becoming common, of altering the terms and substance of Questions handed in by Members at the Table. The Question I have to put is this—If the Question handed in is irregular, should not the Member be communicated with? That used to be the course adopted, but that is not the course now; and, with reference to this particular Question on the Paper, the last inquiry I put was whether the practice of the police acting as bailiffs at evictions was approved of by the Government? That was entirely struck out, and an entirely different Question, which I have no desire to ask, substituted. The Question I have to ask is, whether it is by your authority that my Question was struck off the Paper, and an entirely different Question substituted?

MR. SPEAKER: The reason why the Question was partly struck out was that the hon. Member asked the Government a Question on a matter of opinion, which was entirely without the scope of a Question. The hon. Member is not entitled to ask a Question as to a matter of opinion. With regard to the other point the hon. Member has raised, I may say that, as a general rule, hon. Members consult with the Clerk at the Table as to whether their Questions are in Order or not; and, as a rule, everything is done in an amicable manner. The Questions, however, are now so numerous that it is almost impossible for the Clerk at the Table to communicate with hon. Members by letter. I assure the House that no Question is struck off which is not palpably against the Rules of the House.

MR. J. E. REDMOND: I would ask permission to ask you whether in your recollection almost the identical Question was asked of the late Chief Secretary and answered by him—whether he approved of police acting as bailiffs at evictions? He said he did not approve of it. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary if he holds the opinion his Predecessor held; and unless you rule me out of Order in putting that Question I will put it to him.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the only Questions which hon. Members were entitled to ask were Questions of fact, not of opinion. The Question to which the hon. Member said the late Chief Secretary had replied ought not to have been asked, and he regretted that it had escaped the usual ordeal.

MR. J. E. REDMOND: Then I will add to the Question as it stands on the Paper—whether it is a fact that the present Chief Secretary approved or sanctioned the action of the police acting as bailiffs at evictions?—if that will make it more in Order.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): With regard to the rider to the Question which the hon. Gentleman has just asked me, I may point out that as the incident occurred on the 15th of February, and as I became Chief Secretary rather less than a week ago, it has never come under my personal cognizance; but I entirely endorse every word that fell from my right hon. Friend the Member for West Bristol (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), who spoke in the name of the Government and in the name of his Colleagues. As to the details stated in the Question, I understand that the goods had to be removed from the house, and in one instance a cradle was included; but I may point out that this case was not an agrarian case. The eviction was from a town house.

MR. J. E. REDMOND: Does the right hon. Gentleman intend in future to sanction the employment of constables as bailiffs at evictions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In the case to which the hon. Member refers the magistrates were acting under statutory powers; and, in such circumstances, it would be impossible for me to interfere legally.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—DISTRICT INSPECTOR SMITH, OF MACROOM—THE PROCLAIMED MEETING AT ASHGROVE, CO. CORK.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to the action of District Inspector Smith, of Macroom, as reported in The Cork Daily Herald of Monday's, 7th ultimo, issue, that Smith stated to the Representative of that journal, on his inquiring on Saturday evening as to whether the proposed meeting at Ashgrove would be proclaimed—"Why should it, there is no necessity for such a step;" whether Smith was aware on the said Saturday evening that the meeting was proclaimed; whether he had been engaged that day in perfecting details in connection with the matter; at what time was the notice that the meeting was proclaimed forwarded to Smith from Cork; and, whether he will inquire into the circumstances of the case?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): District Inspector Smith denies that he made the statement attributed to him. He was, of course, aware that the meeting had been proclaimed, and he was properly discharging his duty by making arrangements accordingly. I see no ground for further inquiry into the circumstances.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ACT—LABOURERS' DWELLINGS—NOTICES ON THE CORK UNION.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in October, 1885, all the necessary notices were served in the Blarney District of the Cork Union upon the ratepayers and all whom it concerned; whether all the forms of application were correctly filled and sent to the clerk of the Cork Union, who placed them before the Board of Guardians; whether all the other necessary preliminaries were duly executed for the erection of 13 labourers' dwellings in the said district, and if, notwithstanding the lapse of a year and a half, nothing has been done towards the erection of those houses; whether the cabins in which the 13 applicants lived were condemned by the sanitary officer as unfit for habitation in October, 1885, and if it is true that since then no attempt has been made to improve those condemned dwellings; whether some of the labourers have on several occasions gone before the Board of Guardians, and were told the Local Government Board blocked the way; and, whether he will call the attention of the Local Government Board to the alleged grievances?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Any delay which may have occurred in the preliminary proceedings was on the part of the Local Authority. The Local Government Board were not furnished with the necessary documents until August last. They proceeded as quickly as possible; but the scheme for the Union was exceptionally heavy—embracing 349 proposed houses. The Board issued their order two months ago.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—HOURS OF OFFICIALS.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether clerks to prisons in Ireland perform on week days from 12 to 16 hours' duty, and on Sundays eight hours; whether these periods are in excess of the time during which similar officers in England are engaged; and, whether he will cause inquiry to be made, with a view to the reduction of the present hours?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Sunday duty is, of course, unavoidable in the Prison Service. From the Report submitted by the General Prisons Board, I find that the average length of attendance is not so great as from 12 to 16 hours' duty on week days, and on Sundays eight hours, as stated in this Question. I am not aware of any ground for general inquiry into the subject; but if the hon. Member has before him any particular case which he thinks is one of hardship, and will mention it to me, I will undertake to look into it.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—AFFRAY AT DRUMSNA, CO. LEITRIM.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, on the 2nd March, a bailiff named Frank Cooke passed through Drumsna, County Leitrim, in a drunken state, and, without provocation, drew his revolver on a resident of the town named Simpson; whether, on the attention of the police being drawn to the matter, Sergeant Henry merely shook hands with Cooke, and told him to put his revolver in his pocket; whether, in consequence of this, Simpson was obliged to swear information against Cooke, and a car had to be got, at the public expense, to follow the latter to Mohill; whether, on the next day, instead of adopting the usual course of lodging Cooke in gaol, in default of finding bail, Sergeant Henry accompanied him back to Mohill; whether, on the following morning, Cooke threatened and brandished his revolver at some small boys; and, whether the Government will consider the propriety of inquiring into the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The official Reports submitted to me by no means bear out the view of the case here suggested; but as informations have been sworn against Cooke, and the case is pending for hearing at the next Petty Sessions, I cannot make any detailed statement on the subject.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—ALLEGED MISCONDUCT AT MACROOM.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to a report in The Cork Examiner of Tuesday the 8th ultimo, as to the conduct of the constabulary in the streets of Macroom on last Sunday evening the 6th March, which stated that on Sunday evening, when the Cork Forces were on their way to the station, they were preceded by a dozen policemen with drawn batons, who first jostled and then indiscriminately batoned the people; that Mr. Smith, District Inspector, on returning from the station, as if in reply to one of his men, was heard to say, "Sweep the devils down," when another policeman then said, "Wait till they come from prayers;" that a man, named John Murphy, of Mawstow, was felled to the ground by the blow of a baton, and had his head cut open; that the city police, who wear numbers on their collars, turned up the collars of their overcoats to avoid detection in their assaults on the people; that a young man, named Cotter, when knocked down, was brutally kicked while on the ground by the policemen, because he did not immediately get up when ordered, he being insensible; that Constable John Neill, of Macroom, followed a young girl off the street into a house, beating her on the staircase, and would have dragged her into the street to more justifiably beat her, but was prevented by the owner of the house; whether this report is true; and, whether the Government will order an investigation into the conduct of District Inspector Smith, and the police under his command, on the occasion in question?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It appears that the police, while on the way to the station, were stoned by the mob and had then to use their batons, and that John Murphy, who was a member of the crowd, received a blow on the head. All the other allegations in the Question appear to be untrue, and the Government see no reason to order an investigation.

DR. TANNER: Is the right hon. Gentleman certain about Constable John Neill not beating this girl?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed, Sir, that the statement is untrue.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—THE RIOTS AT LURGAN.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, during the recent riots in Lurgan, District Inspector Bigley assaulted and knocked down a Catholic drummer at M'Geown's Corner, Lurgan, and struck the drum with a blackthorn stick after the drummer had fallen; whether the assault was committed before Mr. Bigley had given orders to the police to fire, and whether the drummer was doing anything illegal at the time; whether Mr. Bigley swore at the magisterial investigation that Shankhill Street, into which the police fired by his order, was an exclusively Catholic street; whether there was any opposing crowd in the street at the time of firing; and, whether Mr. Bigley took the advice of, or had any communication with, the Resident Magistrate in charge of the district before he gave the orders to fire on the people?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): During the riots referred to, a drumming party was endeavouring to force its way into a hostile district. The police, in endeavouring to prevent them, were severely stoned. The District Inspector may, in self-defence, have struck one of the rioters, or knocked another down; but it is right to say that at the Assizes now proceeding 16 of the rioters were tried and 14 of them convicted, and that at no time during the trial was any act of imprudence or illegality imputed to the police. The answer to the third portion of the Question is yes, and to the fourth portion, no. The Resident Magistrate was five miles away on the occasion of the riot, and, therefore, could not be consulted.

MR. M'CARTAN: Can I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether or no the drummer assaulted by the Inspector was charged with any illegal act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I presume he was part of the crowd who were acting illegally.

MR. M'CARTAN: I shall put a further Question on this subject.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACTS—THE ROYAL COMMISSION—EVIDENCE AS TO EVICTIONS.

MR. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If his attention has been called to the Minutes of Evidence taken by the Royal Commission on the Land Acts (Ireland), on the subject of evictions; whether he has noticed the following Question (16,480), put by Sir James Caird to Sir Redvers Buller:—

"Do you desire some Court that should have power of staying evictions, or that discretion should be given to an existing Court, which, upon satisfactory proof to it, that Court should be enabled to stay evictions," to which Sir Redvers Buller replied in the affirmative; and, whether, in view of the sufferings entailed on helpless women and children by being evicted from their homes in winter time, some means can be devised to put a stop to evictions temporarily, or at least till fine weather approaches?

Mr. M'Cartan

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Government have under their consideration the provisions of a Bill dealing with certain aspects of the Irish Land Question; but they are not at present prepared to enter into any details, or make any statement on the subject.

RUSSIA — RUMOURED ATTEMPT ON THE LIFE OF THE CZAR.

MR. PULESTON (Devonport): I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government can give any information as to the reported attempt to assassinate the Czar of Russia?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Sir, Her Majesty's Government have, with deep regret, received information that some persons were arrested with explosives upon them on the road by which the Emperor of Russia was expected to go to the anniversary service for the late Emperor; but I am glad to say that it does not appear that any attack was made upon His Majesty.

HORSES—SUPPLY FOR MILITARY PURPOSES.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) inquired, Whether the Government were prepared to consent to the appointment of a Select Committee of the House to examine into the question of the supply of horses for Army purposes?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle), in reply, said, the Department was at present considering various schemes put forward for improving the horse supply of the Army. They had before them a great number of suggestions, including one or two for which they were indebted to the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir William Crossman). He understood that the hon. and gallant Gentleman, by his Question, rather contemplated a more general inquiry. Before giving an answer on that subject he must consult his Colleagues; and perhaps the hon. and gallant Gentleman would be good enough to postpone his Question.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN: In consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman I will postpone the Notice of Motion which stands on the Paper in my name for to-night.

MEMORANDUM OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

RELATING TO THE

ARMY ESTIMATES, 1887-8.

(Presented to Parliament by Command of Her Majesty.)

The Estimates of 1886-7 showed an anticipated expenditure of £15,156,900 for effective, and £3,076,300 for non-effective services, making a total of £18,233,200. But, in introducing them to the House, the Secretary of State (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) explained that, unless the Army in Egypt could be reduced during 1886-7 to 8,000 men, it would be necessary to ask for a Supplementary Vote. This Army was in fact maintained for some months at a force considerably above this strength, and accordingly Supplementary Estimates have become necessary. The total amount is £459,000, of which nearly £200,000 is due to the increased demands of the Navy, and the greater part of the remainder to Egypt. The Estimates, which are now submitted to Parliament, show an expenditure of £18,393,900, of which £15,305,700 is for effective, and £3,088,200 for non-effective services. It will thus be seen that, as compared with last year's original Estimates, the amount now required for the service of the Army shows an increase of £160,700. But this does not represent the true state of the case. As the House is aware, the War Office supplies the armaments and warlike stores of the Navy, and the cost is borne by the Army Estimates. For 1887-8 the Army Estimates have to provide for an increase, on account of the armaments of the Navy, of £292,000 on the previous year.

Nor is that all. Certain other increases in charge are altogether beyond the control of the Secretary of State, and may be summarized as follows:—

(1.) Indian Contribution to Vote 1 (the additional strength of the Indian Army having been nearly provided in the current year) is reduced by.. ..	£100,000
(2.) Leap year causes an additional expense over all the Votes of	30,000
(3.) Deferred Pay has increased by	20,000
(4.) Retired Pay by	45,000
(5.) The Army Reserve—by the increase of numbers—requires in addition	25,000
	<hr/>
	£220,000

These two sums, amounting altogether to no less than £512,000, show that, instead of an increase, the present Estimates show a reduction of expenditure, even without taking into account the Supplementary Votes for 1886-7.

Increases have also been caused by the rise in the establishments, by the new grants to the Volunteer Service, and especially by the demands for armaments and military stores, which will presently be referred to.

On the other hand, large savings have been accomplished by the withdrawal of half the British force from Egypt, the effect of which is mainly to be traced in the Vote for Supplies and Transport. The Vote for the Non-Effective Services, with the exception of the large automatic increase in the item of Retired Pay (which will be to some extent checked by the new Royal Warrant), shows on all points a diminution of charge.

A small reduction has also been effected in the Vote for Military Education. The general improvement in the education of the country will soon tell upon the special charges necessary for this purpose in the Army, and by greater recourse to civil schools, and the reduction in the establishment of Army schoolmasters. I hope that in future years greater economies can be effected on this head.

Some steps have also been taken by my predecessor, after very careful examination, for the reduction of the General Staff, and of certain permanent appointments.

Leaving these details, I may say generally that, without pretending to have been able, within the limited time at my disposal, to scrutinize personally all parts of these Estimates, the Vote for Armaments has undergone a renewed examination; and I have satisfied myself that, looking to all the circumstances of the present time, the Estimate prepared by my predecessor represented only that necessary demand for this service which any Secretary of State would be bound to make.

But, as attention has been specially attracted to Military Expenditure, it may be well to pass in review some of the great heads of expenditure, though as time has not enabled the Financial Secretary and his Department, who have given much trouble to the matter, to work out the figures in all cases from the present Estimates, the results will be found to be in some cases founded on the figures of 1886-7.

Heads of Army Expenditure (figures of 1886-7).

The whole expenditure of the Army may be divided into three heads, the cost of the "personnel," of general administration, and of supply. The subjoined table attempts to show the total amount under each head.

ARMY ESTIMATES, 1886-87, recalculated, showing approximately the Cost of the Personnel of the Regular and Auxiliary Forces as distinguished from the remaining Expenditure.

1. Charges for Personnel.

REGULAR FORCES.

Estimated annual cost of Regimental Warrant Officers, non-commissioned officers and men, including Pay, Good Conduct Pay, Deferred Pay, Engineer and Departmental Pay, Clothing, Rations, Fuel and Light, Transport, Equipment, Ammunition, Barracks, Barrack Stores, with cost of Medical Attendance and Medicines, Chaplains, Prison Staff, Schools and Libraries, and Regimental Paymasters	£	7,201,000
136,350 men. Average cost, £52½ per head.
Ditto Officers ditto		1,374,000
4,934 Officers. Average, £278½ per head
Total effective cost of "personnel" of the Army		8,575,000
Total non-effective cost of "personnel" of the Army		2,770,300
(Average rate per head, effective and non-effective, £80½ all ranks).		11,345,300

AUXILIARY FORCES.

Average, £11 11s. 8d. per head, 119,356 enrolled Militia	£	1,382,250
" £9 9s. 3d. " 11,590 " Yeomanry		109,700
" £3 13s. 9d. " 218,207 efficient Volunteers		805,200
" £7 8s. 8d. " 56,900 Reserve		423,000
Total charge for Personnel		14,065,450

2. Charges for Administration.

General Staff (Vote 1)	224,960
Commissariat, Transport, and Ordnance Store Department (Vote 9)	149,860
Army Pay Department (District Staff only)	60,000
Educational Services (excluding Regimental Schools, £42,230) (Vote 14)	91,370
Miscellaneous Effective Services (Vote 15)	37,100
Allowances and Transport of above (Vote 10)	216,900
	780,180
War Office Staff (Vote 16)	255,600
	1,035,680
Non-effective Charges of above	308,000
Total charge for Administration	1,341,680

3. Supply Charges.

Purchase of Horses (14,151) and Forage at £25 a-year	464,210
Veterinary Department	345,510
Wages, &c. (Vote 9)	88,000
Rents and Water (except £34,000) (Vote 10)	198,000
Transport of Stores	£2,569,000
" &c., Egypt (excess) £130,000 } (Vote 10)
Warlike Stores, Vote 12.—
Less amount estimated for Barrack Stores £140,000
" " Equipment .. 150,000
" " Auxiliary Forces 202,350
	492,350
Works and Buildings, Vote 13.—	925,800
Less amount estimated for Barracks	437,000
Maintenance of Local Force at Suakin (Vote 1)	58,000
Total Supply Charges	3,719,170

ESTIMATES, 1886-7.

Numbers.

					All ranks.
Regular Army, enrolled	141,284
Reserve	56,900
Militia	119,366
Yeomanry	11,640
Volunteers, efficient	218,207
Total of all forces	547,337

Cost.

Personnel of above forces	£14,065,450
Administrative Departments	1,341,680
Supply services	£3,719,170
Less Navy	1,000,000
				2,719,170
					£18,126,300
Less Indian, Colonial, and Egyptian contributions included in appropriations in aid of Vote 1	908,000
					£17,218,300
Add small sums not included in foregoing figures	14,900
					£17,233,200
Total agreeing with Net Estimates for 1886-7, viz.,				£18,233,200
less £1,000,000 for Navy	£17,233,200

These tables show pretty clearly that, assuming the maintenance of the existing establishment of the Army on the present scale, any substantial reduction of expenditure must be effected either in the cost of administration or in the charge for works, armaments, and stores.

Vote 12 (Stores).

And indeed it is sufficiently notorious that reductions of Army expenditure, while maintaining our existing establishment, have largely been effected in past years by drawing upon our reserve of stores. There have been occasions when considerations of economy have reduced this to a dangerously small amount. But indiscriminate reductions, effected for such an object, are neither safe nor altogether honest, and I hope that the time may soon come when the necessary reserve of stores will be authoritatively fixed in all branches, and rigidly maintained in all circumstances: It is, however, to be observed that the expenditure in Vote 12 comprises not only the sums necessary for the maintenance of our armaments and our reserve of stores, but also large sums which are now being annually voted to strengthen the defences of the country all round. The estimate for the supply, manufacture, and repair of warlike stores (Vote 12)—that is, for the manufacturing departments of the Army—amounts next year to £2,943,500. Of this £1,707,000 is required for Navy armaments. The system under which the Army Votes at present bear the charge for naval armaments has the effect of preventing the true charge for the respective services from being understood by the public, but it is intended next year to make arrangements for separating this expenditure.

The following table illustrates the normal and special expenditure under this Vote:—

VOTE 12.—GENERAL OUTLINE OF ESTIMATE.

Head of Service.	(A.) Ordinary normal expenditure.	(B.) Special Services in addition to A.	(C.) Total amount re- quired to complete Special Services mentioned in B.	No. of years to complete C.
	£	£	£
Maintenance of armaments and practice, including equipments, transport, ambulances, &c. ..	200,000
Gunpowder	50,000
Field Artillery	20,000	80,000	248,000 (4)	3
Rifles	100,000	125,000 (2)	1,190,000 (5)	■
Ammunition	120,000	80,000	240,000 (6)	2
Carbines, pistols, and swords ..	20,000	40,000	50,000	1
Barrack stores	80,000
Accoutrements	40,000	20,000	50,000	2
Harness	21,000	10,000
Machinery	30,000	31,500
Minor items	242,500 (1)	35,888 (3)
Coaling stations, armament of	126,680	358,310	2
Total	923,500	549,068	2,136,310	..
Total, normal (A) ..	923,500
Total, special (B) ..	549,068
Naval requirements to be trans- ferred next year to Navy Esti- mates	1,707,561
Total	3,180,129 (7)
Appropriation in aid ..	236,629
Total	2,943,500 (7)

Remarks.

- (1.) Includes establishments, experimental services, camp equipments, War Department vessels, &c.
- (2.) Less than previously proposed owing to delays of patterns hindering manufacture. 25,000 magazine rifles only.
- (3.) Includes vessels, and miscellaneous.
- (4.) For 31 batteries to complete 60, to be armed with B.L. armament.
- (5.) Includes 375,000 magazine rifles.
- (6.) To get up to 60,000,000 reserve of '4 cartridges.
- (7.) Repayments not included, as they are added to items of Vote and deducted en bloc.

N.B.—The purpose of this statement is to show broadly the appropriations of money to certain general heads of Service. These appropriations will not be traced in the Estimates which are necessarily prepared under the head of Wages, Materials, Contract Supplies, &c.

Vote 13, which deals with works, buildings, and repairs, may be analyzed in a somewhat similar form.

VOTE 13.

GENERAL ABSTRACT OF ESTIMATE.

Total of Vote £862,300.

	Vote for 1887-8	Required to complete.	Remarks.
For Maintenance—	£	£
Ordinary and current repairs ..	353,190	..
For new works (under £1,000, to be completed in this year) ..	117,589	..
For works in progress (begun be- fore 1887-8)—
Barracks	111,249	315,065	Of this, £133,000 is for submarine mining works at military and mercan- tile ports.
Fortifications and Ordnance Store buildings	61,227	200,407
Manufacturing establishments	40,500	4,110
New works (over £1,000 to be begun this year)—
Barracks	29,700	46,120
Fortifications and Ordnance Store buildings	38,957	60,705*
Manufacturing establishments	12,750	27,850
For coaling stations	77,200	201,210
Total	842,362	855,467
Salaries and miscellaneous En- gineer services	125,802	..	Annual charges, subheads A to K, of Vote 13.
Total	968,164	..
Less appropriations in aid	105,864	..
Total	862,300	855,467

* Of the £60,705, the following items are each of £5,000 and upwards, viz. :—

York—New Ordnance Store Establishment ..	£15,500
Portsmouth Hill—maintenance of revetments ..	11,000
Woolwich Arsenal—means for lifting and landing guns up to 240 tons	10,200
Fort Augusta—new powder magazine	5,000

The object of this analysis of these Votes will now be clear. I am anxious to bring prominently forward the fact that the manufacturing and engineering departments necessarily enter into contract engagements extending over several years, and that a sudden curtailment of Estimates may often mean not only the stoppage of a particular work, but the loss of a large part of the money already expended, or it may involve a breach of faith. Take, for instance, the expenditure upon our coaling stations, which is, and ought to be, regulated by the General Scheme laid down in 1884, accepted by the Treasury, and at that time submitted to Parliament. Upon the faith of that scheme we have induced some of our Colonies to vote, and to expend large sums of money, on the understanding that, if they would undertake the cost of the works, the Imperial Parliament would find the armaments. In more than one case the Colony has kept its part of the bargain, while the Imperial Government has not obtained the necessary funds to do so. In all these cases the faith of Parliament is deeply pledged, and, quite independently of the great interests involved, we are bound in honour to provide the necessary funds at least upon the scale laid down in 1884.

Or take the large expenditure occasioned by the introduction of the new rifle and of the new field gun. It has long been admitted that the rearmament of our forces in these respects is a matter of urgent necessity. The above table shows the large sums required to accomplish this result. As soon as a step of this sort has been decided upon by the military authorities, a comparatively small Vote is proposed to Parliament for the expenditure during that financial year; but the House becomes practically pledged to continue similar votes from year to year until the whole sum has been provided. To suspend it for a single year is to cause great waste of public money, or to inflict losses upon the trade only to be satisfied by pecuniary compensation. The system, indeed, has great disadvantages; and it is well worthy of consideration whether some scheme could not be devised which would on the one hand guarantee proper Parliamentary control at the initiation of such expenditure, and at the same time secure the completion of the works or of the armament without being exposed to the fluctuations of Parliamentary opinion. In the time of Lord Cardwell, whose Army Estimates have often been taken as a standard by economists, some part of this expenditure was outside the control of Parliament and not shown in the Army Estimates, and was from time to time borrowed under the head of "Defence and Localization Works." Works of precisely the same character, but in these modern days of far greater cost, cause the large increase in Votes 12 and 13. Perhaps I may be allowed to give an illustration of this increase of cost. The Commission on the Defences of the United Kingdom in their Report of 1860, which proposed works at the cost of 11 millions sterling, thus dealt with the armaments:—

"Upon a general estimate we are led to believe that the works herein proposed will require for armament not less than 2,500 pieces of artillery, in addition to any that are now mounted, or already demanded for works which have been sanctioned previous to this report. Taking them at an average of £200 each, on the supposition that a portion of them will be rifled ordnance, the estimated expense under this head will be £500,000."

It is scarcely necessary to observe that the sum then named as the average price of the guns required, is now about the cost of a single shot from one of our big guns.

(War Office Administration.)

So much for the question of armaments and stores. Coming now to administration, I may observe that the cost of administering the War Office shows an increase of £2,600 due to the increments of salaries, most of the clerks appointed at the reorganization of 1867 having now reached their maximum. It may be not uninteresting to trace the history of this Vote. It shows, as estimated for 1886-7, an increase of £6,700 since 1864-5, and of £33,800 since 1857-8. But in 1857-8, the Army Reserve, and the Volunteers did not exist, and the Regular Army was smaller by £25,000 men. Since 1857-8 the Intelligence Department, which cost £12,300 in the current year, has replaced the small military Topographical Department, supervised by the Director of the Ordnance Survey. Yet the cost of administration, which in 1857-8 was about £1 18s. 4d. to every £100 administered, had fallen in 1886-7 to £1 1s. 2d., a decrease of 17s. 2d. per £100 expended. In 1864-5, the charge for clerks was higher by £10,000 than in 1886-7, though the work has largely increased in the interval. The reduction has been mainly caused by the employment of cheaper labour. The civil clerks have been reduced by 13, while the military clerks have been increased by 65. By these savings the expenditure on the Intelligence Branch, the increase of technical staff from 21 to 43, and of the Works Branch from 13 to 20, has produced a net increase of £6,800 only in 22 years.

(Establishment.)

Having thus examined the Estimates upon the assumption that our present establishment is maintained, it becomes necessary to consider, shortly, the reasons for the retention of that establishment.

The following table shows the force which we are now maintaining abroad and in the Colonies (excluding the Royal Engineers, who are separately treated):—

	Cavalry regiments.	Artillery batteries.			Infantry battalions of the Line.
		Horse.	Field.	Garrison.
Egypt ...	1	2	4
Colonies ...	1	..	1	32	19
India ...	8	11	42	29	53

The force in India is incapable of reduction, and it is hardly possible that any substantial diminution could take place in the force maintained in our Colonies. This leaves us with the following disposable force at home, according to the latest arrangements:—

Cavalry regiments ..	{ Household	3
	{ Line	17
	{ Yeomanry	80
	{ Vol. Light Horse, &c. ..	4
Artillery	{ Horse (Batteries)	8
	{ Field	38
	{ Garrison	38
	{ Militia (brigades)	35
	{ Volunteers (corps)	60
Infantry battalions ..	{ Foot Guards	7
	{ Line	65
	{ Militia	135
	{ Volunteers	207

But, in estimating the military value of these battalions of Volunteers, it must be remembered that in the event of any prolonged anxiety it would be impossible to keep in the field the full strength of our Volunteer Army. A very large deduction must be made for men who, being engaged in civil occupations, will necessarily be absent, except in cases of great emergency. On the other hand, the number of the Army Reserve is gradually growing towards the full number which is required to bring up our Army to its full fighting strength when necessary. At the present time it numbers about 47,000 men. Owing to the change in the term of colour service in 1881-2, there will be a decrease in the Reserve in 1888 of no less than 9,000, unless we can adopt other means for adding to it; but after that date it will again steadily increase under present conditions until it reaches 60,000 in 1894. The desire to utilize this disposable force to the fullest advantage has led to the adoption of various schemes of mobilization, of which I proceed to give a short account.

(Mobilization.)

The success of the Prussian organization in 1870 for the first time drew the attention of this country to the question of the localization of our forces in peace time, and to the means of mobilizing them with rapidity when war was anticipated; and accordingly, in 1874, a plan for the localization of the forces was worked out and adopted, followed shortly afterwards by one for the mobilization of the Army. The former practically applied only to our Infantry. Under it our whole Infantry, whether Regulars, Militia, or Volunteers, was formed into brigades, each attached to a certain portion of the country, and each having a general head-quarters at the depôt of the Line regiments belonging to the brigade. The tie between these Line regiments and their district was at first slight, and consisted only in the fact that their depôt was situated therein; but the Auxiliary troops were really and genuinely local, and belonged entirely to the district with which the localization scheme associated them.

The next step taken was to arrange for the proper mobilization of our forces when war was apprehended; that is, for their assembling, receiving their reserves, their stores, and their fighting equipment, and for their classification into Army Corps, each ready to move to the point where its services might be required, as an organized fighting body complete within itself in all arms of the Service. It was with this object that the mobilization tables of 1875 were drawn out, under which the whole of our land forces were divided into definite brigades, divisions, and Army Corps, each with its local head-quarters and its staff organization; and also, speaking broadly, these tables indicated the place at which each unit was to receive its reserves, its arms, and its stores.

This scheme of mobilization was very carefully devised, but it had the serious defect of aiming too high. It assumed as its starting point that the whole of the Militia, as well as the Regular Army, was available for mobilization, and it passed over the fact that the strength of our Cavalry, Artillery, and other branches of the Service was much below what it should have been, to correspond to the strength of our Infantry. It was, I believe, hoped at the time the scheme was framed that the deficiencies in these former arms would be gradually made good, and on this basis the constitution of eight Army Corps was arranged for, in addition to the garrisons of our fortresses. The materials to complete these Corps were, however, not forthcoming, and hardly any attempt was ever made to fill up the gaps existing. The result was that the mobilization scheme of 1875 never had more than a paper existence. A partial mobilization of two Corps took place in 1876, but the occasion never arose of testing any one of them at a war strength; and after remaining for some years as a sort of academic exercise in military organization, the scheme dropped out of the pages of the Army List and disappeared. When in 1878 it was considered desirable to make preparations for placing an Army Corps in the field, the selection of the troops to constitute it was not governed by the scheme of 1875, but was determined by independent considerations.

The next endeavour to make our standing arrangements in peace, preparatory for war, was made by Mr. Childers in 1881. He carried the localization of our forces considerably further than had been done by Mr. Cardwell. The whole of our Infantry, except the Guards, the Rifle Corps, and the Rifle Brigade, was definitely territorialized, and local designations, and sometimes names of unnecessary length, were substituted for the old titles. The Militia and Volunteers were, of course, already local, and from 1881 it may be said that our Army has had a distinctive territorial constitution.

The preparations for mobilization made by Mr. Childers only extended to providing one Army Corps, which it was intended to be ready to take the field at any time, in any of the small wars in which we are so often engaged. It was to consist entirely of Regulars, and to furnish it, and at the same time meet considerations of expense, the establishments of our battalions were carefully graduated so that those first for foreign service stood at the highest strength. Twelve of these, together with six battalions from the Mediterranean and three battalions of Guards, were to form the Infantry of the Army Corps, which it was considered we should be able to put into the field at any moment.

This scheme, being mainly intended to meet the exigencies of the small wars in which this country is so often engaged, was inadequate to meet the real and permanent requirements of our position ; while, on the other hand, the abortive scheme of the eight Army Corps in 1875 had required larger numbers than our forces at our highest strain could furnish.

The result of all this was that, until 1886, we were no further advanced toward actual mobilization in the event of an European war than we were when the Prussian successes first compelled a consideration of the question. But it may be fairly said that although until recently the arrangements for combining our different military units into larger organizations for the purposes of defence had not materially advanced, the military value of those units is very different now from what it was in 1875. The Auxiliary Forces have been steadily approaching more and more to the standard of efficiency of Regular troops, and short service has given us a strong and available reserve on which we can place our hands at short notice.

It was under these conditions that, in 1886, a third attempt was made to grapple with the question of mobilization. The method followed on this occasion was, however, somewhat different from that which had previously been adopted. In the first attempt to deal with this problem, the proposed organization required larger forces than were really available for mobilization. In the second, the exigencies of our smaller wars had chiefly been taken into account. In 1886 the calculations began with a careful examination of our actual military assets, and the endeavour was made to see how these could be best put into an effective fighting organization with the least possible disturbance and the fewest additions. The problem attempted to be solved on this occasion was not what army we ought to be prepared to put into the field in the event of a big war ; but, how we could get the maximum result out of our existing force with the minimum of change and of expense.

This examination brought very clearly to light one essential defect which has hitherto prevailed in our system. In every army the various arms and the various services, such as the Cavalry, the Artillery, the Infantry, the Engineers, the Commissariat, and the Medical Department, should bear to each other a certain proportion ; and this proportion has been so thoroughly worked out by military experience, that within very narrow limits it may be said to have been practically determined.

But our composite Army has grown up piecemeal, and no real endeavour has ever yet been made to introduce into it any proportion between its various branches. It was at once evident, when stock was taken of our military strength, that in order to extract the full value from our material, a certain amount of conversion was necessary. There was too much of one arm and too little of another. But making allowance for this conversion and for some comparatively minor additions, the results arrived at were as follows :—

Subject to these changes and additions, our present forces might be so arranged that they would be sufficient to provide men for all our home and Colonial garrisons, and also to furnish two Army Corps of regular troops, each stronger by four battalions than those contemplated in 1875, together with a strong Cavalry Division, and the necessary troops to guard their line of communication. After doing this, there would still remain a balance of disciplined troops, which would form a nucleus round which a further army might be collected.

The details of the measures by which the above results would be arrived at are almost completely worked out at the War Office ; and I hope before long to be able to show to every unit of our home forces the precise functions it will have to fulfil should this country be either threatened with invasion, or called upon to take part in a serious war. I feel assured that when our Auxiliary Forces realize what an integral part of our national defence they will form under the new scheme, they will cheerfully submit to any modifications in their present condition that it may require.

I am not going to assert that our land forces have in all respects reached a condition aimed at by these measures. But there are two great points which may be urged in favour of the mobilization scheme of 1886. In the first place, the aim is one well within our reach, without any substantial increase of our forces, or of our expenditure. And, secondly, if this aim can be accomplished, it will give us an enormous advance in the defensive powers of the country. It must, however, be remembered that this scheme can only succeed if a certain amount of finality be attached to it. If it be accepted, as I hope it may be (and it is for this purpose that it is described in this statement), as the standard up to which our military arrangements have to work, all these must steadily be made to fit in with it. The establishment of our Infantry battalions, the raising of a Militia or Volunteer regiment, the strength of all branches of our Artillery, must all be considered and dealt with as part of a general scheme. And, above all, by establishing the standard at which we ought to aim, it will strengthen the hands of the Secretary of State for the time being in resisting, on the one hand, any attempt to enlarge any branch of our establishment beyond the strength so declared to be essential, and, on the other hand, in pressing upon Parliament, as circumstances permit, the additions to, or alterations in, our existing system which are still urgently required.

This scheme of mobilization having been generally accepted by my predecessor (the present First Lord of the Treasury), the steps which are necessary, or are being taken to make it a reality, may be best described by a short reference to each branch of the Service.

I take first those services in which the mobilization scheme mainly contemplates the utilization, and not the extension or conversion, of our existing forces.

(Cavalry.)

It is satisfactory to learn that this country already possesses sufficient regiments of Cavalry to satisfy all the requirements of the new scheme, though in this, as in other branches of the service, the necessary supply of horses is one of great urgency and importance. Both as regards efficiency and popularity, I am informed that the Cavalry never stood higher than at the present moment. On the 1st of January last the Cavalry of the Line was no less than 527 in excess of its establishment, and we have been compelled to suspend recruiting for this arm of the Service in more than one district.

(Infantry.)

Neither is any considerable change contemplated in our present force of Infantry. After providing for the reinforcement of Home and Colonial garrisons, there still remain more than sufficient battalions of Infantry for the proposed establishment of two Army Corps and the necessary line of communications. The present Estimates provide for a small reduction in the numbers of every Infantry regiment from 750 to 730. This reduction is in consequence of the fact that the abnormal demand for the increase of the British Army in India having been nearly satisfied, the necessity for so large an establishment no longer exists.

For this branch of the Service also the reports of recruiting are satisfactory. The Inspector-General states that the great advance made in 1885 has been fairly maintained during last year. The total number of recruits tested and finally approved is 39,409, which, though less than in 1885, was considerably more than in any other year since the introduction of short service. The report also shows that an increasing number of the men recruited for Infantry regiments were born in the regimental district.

The effect of the new mobilization scheme, as regards the Cavalry and the Infantry, may be described as a readjustment of existing forces, but in respect to the Artillery and Engineers, organic changes, and a great deal of new material, are entailed by the requirements of the new system.

(Royal Artillery.)

In the event of war, the demands upon the Royal Artillery, according to the new scheme of mobilization, would be as follows:—

(a.) For Horse and Field Artillery to furnish artillery for two Army Corps, a Cavalry Division, and their line of communication:—

8 batteries of Horse Artillery of six guns each.

24 batteries of Field Artillery of six guns each.

14 Ammunition Columns formed from Field batteries.

The total number of batteries required being 46, and the total number of guns 192.

It may be observed that the proportion of guns to Infantry is larger than that which prevailed in the German Army during the war of 1870. In peace time five of the Horse Artillery batteries and 13 of the Field batteries will be maintained at 1st Army Corps strength, with six guns each; 11 batteries of Field Artillery will be kept at 2nd Army Corps strength, with six guns each, while the three Horse batteries of the 2nd Army Corps, and the remaining 14 Field batteries will be kept up with only four guns each. In war, of course, these Horse batteries will take the field with six guns each.

Comparing this establishment with that of our existing organization, it represents a reduction of two batteries, and the conversion of four batteries of Horse into Field Artillery. No doubt these two additional batteries would have been valuable for home defence, but they are not required for the two Army-Corps which alone we could hope to mobilize, nor for service with the existing Army in India; and for purposes of home defence their reduction is more than counterbalanced by the large increase in the number of guns which will be issued to the Volunteers, and for which provision is made in the Estimates.

The conversion of the batteries of Horse into Field Artillery has been the subject of much comment. It involves, I need scarcely say, no diminution of that feeling of admiration for the condition of this splendid force—a condition which has always done so much credit both to Officers and to men; but, as was pointed out by Lord Napier of Magdala in a recent debate, the existing proportion in our Army of Horse to Field Artillery is larger than that in the German, and slightly larger than that in the French Army. The real value of Horse Artillery batteries is to be found wherever extreme rapidity is required, and in all other cases they possess disadvantages in the large cost which they involve, and in the increased number of horses which are necessary, and which require far more food, forage, and transport in time of war; and when it is remembered that the weight of a horse's daily ration is about the same as that of six men, both having to be carried, the importance of saving every unnecessary horse becomes apparent—all the more when the special difficulty of horse supply in our own country is borne in mind. It is, moreover, represented that the tendency of modern Artillery tactics is against the frequent moving of Artillery when once in action; and therefore, except in the case of the batteries which are attached to, and move with, Cavalry, extreme rapidity of movement is not required.

The simple fact is that we have at present more Horse Artillery than is required for two Army Corps and a Cavalry Division, while we have not enough Field Artillery. If Parliament is prepared to sanction a large increase to this latter force, then it may be ready also to leave intact the former. But I do not think I should be justified in asking the country to bear the additional expense this would cause while the excess of Horse Artillery above the requirements of two Corps and a Cavalry Division remains as now. And short of this—if the mobilization scheme is to have any real existence—there is no alternative but the conversion already decided on.

(b.) In the event of war, the Royal Artillery will also be required to provide garrisons for the fortresses at home and abroad for our coaling stations, and for some of our seaports, besides filling up the batteries in India to full strength.

The careful examination which has taken place has revealed a serious deficiency of men for these purposes, even including the First Class Army Reserve, which can at present furnish only one thousand men. This is a matter of extreme urgency, as to which no avoidable delay can possibly be defended. For home garrisons the Militia and Volunteer Artillery have been utilized to the fullest extent possible; but the latter are not available for foreign service, and the former only partially so, while the necessity for the increase in the Garrison Artillery is mainly caused by the garrisons necessary for the coaling stations and military ports abroad.

It has, therefore, been proposed to raise the establishment of the Garrison Artillery at home to 40 batteries, exclusive of dépôts, and to keep those 40 batteries up to a full strength of 128 non-commissioned Officers and men. This represents an increase of about 1,800 men over those now serving, with an addition of only 16 officers. If carried out it would fill up the great deficit and facilitate the increase of the Reserve. This recommendation is now being acted upon, so far as is possible, bearing in mind the present condition of recruiting for Garrison Artillery, and the probable increase which can be obtained during the coming year. Estimating the total deficiency at 1,800 men, it is not expected that we can get more than half that number this year, and accordingly provision is made in the Estimates for that increase.

Before quitting the subject of Artillery, I may mention that while all the Volunteer Artillery living within a certain distance of our seaports has been utilized for the defence of our fortresses, there are 21 inland corps, some 12,000 strong, situated so far from the forts to be defended that they have not been included in the garrisons. These it is proposed to equip with more guns, and in time of emergency they will form a most valuable supplement to our regular Field Artillery.

(Royal Engineers.)

The effect of the mobilization scheme upon the Royal Engineers is very difficult to explain, especially as some of the questions which regulate it have not yet been decided. It may, however, be shortly stated that there is a large deficiency of Engineers for field, as well as for fortress purposes. In the former case we should require for two Army-Corps and their line of communication, an addition to our pontoon troops, our telegraph battalions, our field companies—in fact, to almost every branch of the corps.

The Estimates of 1887-8 make provision, for the first time, for such an increase of the Engineers as will meet the requirements of two Army-Corps, with the exception that in the case of the Second Pontoon troop the necessary cadre only has been provided.

The exact extent of the deficiency in respect of Fortress Engineers depends upon certain questions, of which I will here mention only the most important. In the defence of our home forts, the one essential condition is that there should be absolute unity of command, so that in the presence of danger there may be no risk of divided responsibility or of difference of opinion. In this view both the Admiralty and the War Office, I need scarcely say, heartily concur, and a Committee is now sitting to consider the best means of promoting this unity, without unduly interfering with the land defence on the one hand, or on the other with that portion of the sea defence which sailors are best qualified to conduct against a hostile fleet. Upon this point I have no doubt that a satisfactory solution will be arrived at, but until it is, there will remain the question as to which is the force to be charged with the supervision of our submarine mining defences, upon the solution of which depends the amount of increase that will become necessary in the Corps of Royal Engineers. It is not, therefore, possible at present to lay down the arrangements for this corps in the same detail that has been done with others.

While upon this point, I may mention that a great deal has recently been accomplished in submarine mining, especially at our military and mercantile ports, for which money has been taken in the Estimates of recent years. This Service is now being rapidly pushed forward, and forms one of the most important of our means of defence.

The ultimate result produced by the change of establishment now contemplated is shown in the following table:—

STATEMENT showing variation in numbers for 1887-8.

	Officers.	Warrant Officers.	Sergeants.	Drummers, &c.	Rank and File.	All Ranks.	Horses and Mules.
INCREASES:—
Royal Artillery ..	37	..	84	8	876	1,006	..
" Engineers ..	2	1	33	6	305	347	82
Infantry Transport	240*
Colonial Corps (Local Artillery) ..	6	..	14	5	194	217	..
Commissariat & Transport Corps	51	17	140	208	68
Miscellaneous	12	..	6	18	..
Total Increases..	45	1	102	36	1,521	1,795	390
DECREASES:—
Cavalry of the Line..	7	1	13	1	..	22	50
Royal Horse Artillery	29	..	45	10	504	588	328
" Artillery	6
Infantry ..	137	..	206	11	3,350	3,704	2
Total Decreases..	173	1	264	22	3,854	4,314	506
Net Increase	14	..	} Decrease	Increase
Net Decrease ..	128	..	72	..	2,333

* Infantry transport.

Turning to the Auxiliary Forces, no change is proposed either in the Militia or in the Yeomanry.

(Militia.)

The Militia has been gaining in numbers since 1883, showing on 1st January, 1887, an increase of 2,202 in enrolled strength compared with the previous year. To complete the establishment 14,000 men are still wanted, but this force gave nearly that number of recruits to the Army during last year. There is still a large deficiency of Officers, though it is satisfactory to note that, in spite of the large number passing into the Army, there has been a gain of 119 Officers during the year. The Militia, indeed, not only fulfils the important function of being, under the Territorial system, the conduit pipe to the Army, but the mobilization scheme assigns to every one of our Militia regiments a necessary place in the home and colonial garrisons.

(Yeomanry.)

The Yeomanry holds its ground fairly well, although no class has suffered to a greater extent from the agricultural depression than that from which this force is recruited. Their efforts deserve encouragement and support, and I may mention that with the assistance of the Under Secretary of State for War, whose interest in the force is well known, I am at present considering whether it would be possible to afford to Yeomen greater facilities at the close of their permanent duty for finding a ready sale for such of their horses as are suitable for Cavalry remounts. If such a system can be devised, it would in itself afford some encouragement to the force.

(Volunteers.)

I come now to the Volunteers, amongst whom it has long been a grievance that too little attention has been paid to them, and that too low a value has been placed upon them by military authorities. That complaint, if ever well founded, no longer exists.

The Volunteer Force has now been included in the mobilization scheme for the general defence of the country. In the event of any necessity arising, every corps within a fixed distance of the harbours and forts to be defended, will be called upon to join the other land services in garrisoning those places; whilst the remaining Volunteers outside those limits will be mobilized at such points as the circumstances of the case require. No greater compliment could have been paid to the Volunteer system, than that it should have come to be recognized as an integral and essential part of the organized defence of the country. But, if the Volunteers are really anxious, as I for one feel sure that they are, that the services they are prepared to render should be turned to account at such a crisis to the greatest advantage, they must be prepared to co-operate with the military authorities in supplying the deficiencies which at present exist, rather than in supplementing those branches of the Service of which the numbers are already adequate, if not excessive.

It was for this reason that my predecessor decided to entertain, this year, no applications for any increase of Volunteer Infantry. The enrolled strength of this force last November was over 226,000 of all arms, leaving only a margin of about 27,000 before the authorized establishment is reached.

It was, in his opinion (one in which I entirely concur), wise to arrest the increase of Volunteer Infantry until it was determined whether an increase in other arms could not be brought about, which would render the defence of the country more perfect. In some parts of the country there exists a strong desire to raise Submarine Mining or Medical Staff Corps, which deserves every encouragement, and a most interesting experiment is about to be tried at Crewe in the formation of a Railway Corps thoroughly fit to render service in the defence of the country, and to furnish a force of Engineers fit to lay a military railway in any part of the world. A certain proportion of this Corps will be passed into the 1st Class Army Reserve, and will be placed on precisely the same footing as the Post Office Corps, who have done such good service in the field.

On the other hand, in some parts of the country, the mobilization scheme has revealed a deficiency of Artillery, of Engineers, or of Submarine Miners.

Our first duty, then, appears to be to see whether the same loyal spirit, which has produced the Volunteer movement and given it that continuity which has so surprised its enemies, will not enable us little by little to supply the gap now existing in our system of defence, without largely adding to the total establishment of the force. In the same spirit, that of recognizing the Volunteer Force as an integral and essential element in the defence of the country, we ought to approach the report of the Committee on the Capitation Grant.

That report, I am sorry to say, discloses, on the face of the returns which have been made public, a most unsatisfactory financial condition. It is only fair to say that the alleged insufficiency of the grant of public money, which was the main reason for the appointment of the Committee, is confirmed by the report. But it shows, in addition, a very large expenditure upon unnecessary objects, which has, in many cases, imposed a burden of debt, threatening the existence of some of our most effective battalions, and which makes the difficulty of obtaining Officers a great and a growing one. It appears, further, that many Commanding Officers, who have long foreseen the danger which is threatening them, find themselves powerless to restrain this expenditure, or to find any successor to themselves willing to assume the burden of a growing debt.

If, therefore, Parliament is to be asked to increase the Capitation Grant, it seems to me that the opportunity should be seized to establish a proper examination of the expenditure of all Volunteer Corps. For this purpose a form will annually be issued from the War Office which will be returned by each corps at the close of the Volunteer year, showing its expenditure under different heads. This will afford an opportunity of examining not only the items of "necessary" expenses as defined by the Committee, which may fairly be charged to the Parliamentary Grant, but will also, as I hope, enable the War Office to strengthen the hands of Commanding Officers in checking unnecessary expenditure, and in gradually reducing the existing debts. Some forms of expenditure must, however, be in future absolutely prohibited, as, for instance, any extra payment for camp allowance, or extra pay for the Permanent Staff.

With these preliminary stipulations, I am prepared to propose to Parliament to increase the Capitation Grant to Volunteers, but in a form somewhat different from that recommended by the Committee. Their recommendation would establish two rates of grant, one of 30s. for each efficient, and another of 35s. for those who shoot out of the third class. This system would in practice be somewhat cumbersome. Reference to the Musketry Returns of the two previous years would be rendered necessary in every case of a Volunteer failing to pass into the second class, in order that the proviso suggested by the Committee, "that those who fail to pass out of the third class during the course of any three years should cease to draw any grant whatever," may be observed.

I prefer to adhere to the present system of one rate of Capitation Grant, and to make its amount 35s. But in return for this we are, I think, justified in endeavouring to obtain from the Volunteers even a higher rate of efficiency with the rifle than that demanded by the Committee. It will not be forgotten that up to the present time no accuracy with the rifle has been demanded of the Volunteers. As long as each man fired off 60 rounds of ball cartridge, he might shoot into the ground or into the air, and yet remain efficient as regards musketry. The great improvement in match shooting which has been so marked in recent years does not appear generally to extend to the bulk of the force, but it is confined to those who are really anxious to improve themselves as marksmen. The first condition of improvement in the Volunteer Force, then, appears to be a general efficiency with the rifle. I propose, therefore, that the first year (1887-8) shall be a year of grace and training, when the Capitation Grant of 35s. can be earned by all men who hit the target 12 times in their 60 rounds, but that in subsequent years it shall be paid only to those who pass out of the third class, with the exception of the recruits; and lest anyone should suppose that the test imposed is altogether excessive, I may add that even at the present time 90 per cent. of the efficient pass out of the third class. This will enable all corps to earn a large sum this year, and to prepare themselves, by weeding out those Volunteers who have no efficiency whatever with the rifle, for greater stringency in the future conditions of the grant.

I may add that special circumstances as to Artillery and Engineers justify me in recommending the increased grant in their case without any such conditions.

Closely connected with this subject is that of ranges, the closing of which in many parts of the country is placing great difficulties in the way of earning the Capitation Grant. Unfortunately, as the country becomes more densely populated, this difficulty is not likely to decrease, and some remedy, even if to some extent an artificial one, becomes urgent. Safety screens have been erected on several ranges by Mr. Morris and the Royal Engineers, with the effect of making them practically safe. The chance of a bullet missing the screens or the butt is reduced to a minimum.

Unfortunately, there are two objections to their use: one the expense (£60 per firing point), and the other that whilst the erection of a safety screen makes the range safe (say) at 200 yards, it obviously renders the range useless at longer distances, owing to the interposition of the screens. It has been suggested that the only way of overcoming this difficulty is to allow the Volunteer to shoot his course, in these exceptional cases, at the safe distance only, the figures on the target being reduced in proportion to the distance at which he is supposed to be shooting. This is, of course, an artificial expedient, to be justified only by the necessities of the case. But we are making experiments in the matter, and it may be desirable to adopt some such system rather than to throw upon the shoulders of the Volunteer Force or upon the public funds a charge for ranges of a very serious character.

Further facilities will, however, be also afforded to Volunteers by the adoption of the recommendations that allowances be paid to Volunteers having to travel long distances to their places of firing. Provision is made in the present Estimates for these allowances, as well as for grants for marching columns, and for knowledge of tactics and signalling amongst Officers.

I am not able to accept the proposal of the Committee for the general provision of greatcoats, which would obviously be liable to abuse; but I hope that Parliament will approve the items, which we have included in the Vote, for giving a grant of 2s. for each greatcoat of approved pattern produced at an inspection.

There remain a few special questions without a reference to which this Memorandum would be even more incomplete than it is.

(Field gun.)

Satisfactory progress is being made in supplying the Artillery with the new field gun.¹ Further experience tends to confirm the very favourable estimate which has been formed of it. It possesses the advantages of rapidity of working, a low trajectory, and great velocity. By the close of the present financial year 19 batteries will have been furnished with it. The Estimates now presented make provision for 9 more batteries, thus completing the equipment of the two Army-Corps.

(Magazine rifle.)

After a series of exhaustive experiments with every description of magazine rifle, the Committee specially charged with this question have found themselves able to recommend two forms of rifles (the Lee-Burton and the Improved Lee) for final trial. If this should prove to be, in either case, satisfactory, as there is every reason to hope, the construction of the new magazine rifle will be proceeded with as quickly as possible.

(Coaling stations.)

It will be observed that provision is made in the Estimates for carrying on the works of defence at our coaling stations, and for providing them with guns; beside the amount to be voted for the work of submarine mining. The sum taken is somewhat in excess of that which has for the last two years been included in the Estimates. It will enable the defences of Hong Kong, Sierra Leone, and, approximately, those of Singapore, to be completed. Some advance will be made in other cases also, but it cannot be denied that an acceleration of this work beyond the rate of progress laid down in 1884 would be eminently desirable, especially as it is well known to everyone who has looked into the subject that more than one station of primary importance still remains undefended. But, at any rate, no Government could possibly justify to itself any less expenditure for this object, because it would involve the neglect of precautions as to the necessity of which there has hitherto existed a very general agreement.

EDWARD STANHOPE.

WAR OFFICE,

28th February, 1887.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

COAST DEFENCES AND COALING STATIONS—THE PROTECTED BARBETTE SYSTEM OF FORTIFICATION.

RESOLUTION.

COLONEL DUNCAN (Finsbury, Holborn), in rising to call attention to the heavy expenditure caused by neglecting to employ the protected barbette or disappearing system in coast fortifications; and to move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the best way of utilizing the protected barbette or disappearing system in coast defences and coaling stations;"

said, that in these Military Estimates there was nothing which was in any way a mystery, or into which the common sense of a Parliamentary Committee was not competent to inquire. Military affairs owed much to the Volunteer movement, which had made all classes in the country familiar with such questions. It was the duty of Parliament to legislate not merely for the laws and liberties, but also for the lives of the people, and he thought that if he could show that the adoption of the system he advocated would minimize the risk not only to our soldiers, but to the whole population in time of war, he would be justified in bringing forward this Motion. He thought that he might take it as a postulate that we were no longer able to feed our people without importing food from abroad. That implied the existence of a Naval Force to protect the food-bringing ships; because the interruption of even one day in our supplies would give rise to panic and distress. But a Fleet for the purpose which he had described would have but an ephemeral value if it had not a protected base. The noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), in his apologia, had said that we flung ourselves into the arms of engineers. We certainly had done so some score of years ago, and the engineers had created frowning fortresses, which had merely invited notice, and the system of which had become obsolete before the mortar was dry. Time had passed, until the demands of the country and the resources of our manufactures showed that it was necessary and possible to make some change, although every obstacle had been for many years put in the way; and in spite of the opinion of a Committee in favour of some system of giving invisibility to our fortifications, and in spite of the opinions of the ablest engineers, every difficulty was put in the way of Colonel Moncrieff, as to the merits of whose invention there could be no doubt, and which consisted in this—and he thought it was the principal—that its adoption would greatly minimize the risk to which life was exposed by the present system. The official mind, however, was an interesting, but very irritating study; and the officials of the War Office had started with the assumption that all change must be deprecated, and detested the very presence of an inventor. But circumstances sometimes proved stronger even than permanent officials, and the recent development in machine and quick-firing guns had shown the absolute necessity of making a change. That necessity had now given weight in the official mind to arguments long neglected, and the angel of common sense had at last troubled the waters of the pool of officialdom. In fact, to make a man stand at a gun in open barbette, in an embrasure or elsewhere, exposed to the fire of these machine and quick-firing guns, was an utter impossibility, with any regard to the end to be attained; for it was simply to pronounce upon him a sentence of certain death. It might be asked why he wished for a Parliamentary Committee and not a professional one. His answer to that was, that although a professional Committee might be very useful for advice, and even as an Executive Body, a Parliamentary Committee had more power as an expression of the opinion of that House. He should like to see Committees of that House studying questions of design and principle, and not only that of paying the bill; he thought that, in such matters, the Representatives of the people ought to take some share of responsibility. The question which he had brought up was becoming more and more important. In various parts of the world besides the Coasts of our own country, on which there were over 1,600, we had muzzle-loading guns which might be efficiently and economically worked by means of this system, by which the guns were absolutely safe, being only exposed at the moment of firing. The system was not only applicable to small guns, as had been thought at one time to be the case; it was applicable to all. All that was wanted now was a little wind to fill the sails of the War Office officials, such as could only be given by that House. The adoption of the protected barbette or disappearing system would save the money which was spent upon the maintenance of the old fortifications, and there would also be a saving as regards garrisons. Great interest was undoubtedly taken by Members of that House in such matters, but this interest must not cease with criticism; they must also accept some responsibility for the consideration of these questions. As a soldier, he wished to see Parliament inquiring into such matters. For two years a movement had been going on quietly in the right direction; but a little incentive was required, and everything should be done to insure that the plan, unlike those of General Trochu, should not be only a plan upon paper. When things were done in a scare and a panic they were always done at great expense; and by the House and War Office officials working deliberately and hand-in-hand the country would be enabled to get more value for its money. Although the Continent was at the present moment quiet, it was a matter of serious concern to think what the position of England would be in the event of a European war, when they looked at the huge armaments of other nations. If a Committee such as he now asked for were appointed, the country, for the first time in its history, would be undertaking the consideration of our fortifications without panic. It was stated that £3,000,000 sterling would have been saved if this system had been adopted some years ago; and he thought that an inquiry by a Parliamentary Committee into a system of defence admirably suited to the conditions of modern warfare might obviate the spending of perhaps many millions more. Let them, at all events, avoid the risk of spending more money uselessly, and this they would do by the adoption of the system which he had referred to. In conclusion, he begged to move the Resolution which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the best way of utilising the protected barbette or disappearing system in coast defences and coaling stations,"—(Colonel Duncan.)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter) said, he wished to take the earliest opportunity of stating to the House the reasons why the Government were not able to accede to the request just preferred by the hon. and gallant Member with so much ability. As regarded one point touched upon, he would only say that, while he had no exception to take to the praise which the hon. and gallant Member bestowed upon inventors, he could not but remember that, when last Thursday the claims of a valuable invention were voted upon by the House, the hon. and gallant Member found it necessary to vote with the opposite Party. With regard to the alleged necessity for Parliamentary inquiries in order to fill the sails of the War Office, he thought, on the contrary, that the War Office was already scudding under quite a sufficient press of canvas. In fact, it was, if further overweighted, in danger of foundering, and none of its officials had any disposition to whistle for a breeze. The Government were unable to accept the Motion for several reasons. In the first place, they could not accept it for the same considerations which prevented them accepting the suggestion to refer the Brennan torpedo to a Parliamentary Committee—namely, that there must be a limit to the devolution of Executive authority, and when the whole question had already been considered by competent and responsible officers, they must throw upon them the responsibility for the advice they gave to the Secretary of State for War. In the second place, it was already proposed that a Parliamentary Committee should be appointed to go thoroughly into the question of the Army and the Navy Estimates, and it was possible that the matter which had been raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman would come within its purview. And, in the third place, there was a special reason why a Special Committee should not be appointed, in the fact that, generally speaking, the War Office had practically accepted the view which the hon. and gallant Member had put forward. They had accepted the principle, as a principle, of the protected barbette or disappearing system of emplacements as against casemates; and, as a matter of fact, out of 48 guns ordered for coaling stations, 32 were on disappearing mountings, and 16 on the barbette system. At present, as the House might be aware, there were in the Service two classes of disappearing mountings—the Moncrieff counter-weight carriages, and hydro-pneumatic mountings, the former being the old type of mounting, the latter the new. Of the counter-weight type they had 79 in position, and five in store at Woolwich unappropriated. Of the 79, 34 were in the Western and Southern Districts of England, one in the South-Eastern District, 11 in Ireland, 19 at Bermuda, 12 at Malta, and two at Halifax. Of the hydro-pneumatic mountings, the War Office had ordered six 6-inch muzzle-loading guns and 28 6-inch breech-loading guns. Eight of those were allotted, temporarily, at all events, to Home Stations, 12 to Aden, nine to Hong Kong, two to Jamaica, and one to St. Lucia. It had not yet been demonstrated that these hydro-pneumatic mountings were suitable for heavy guns; but two experimental mountings were under order from Elswick and Messrs. Easton and Anderson for 9.2-inch breech-loading guns—the gun from Elswick would be ready this month—the latter was complete—and if they were successful, further orders would probably be given. Two orders for 10-inch mountings had also been given to the same firms. There was a proposal now under consideration, made by Colonel Moncrieff, to apply his counter-weight system in substitution for the fixed mountings of the 9-inch and 10-inch rifled muzzle-loading guns now in the Service, and the Inspector General of Fortifications and the Director General of Artillery were now considering the possibility of carrying out Colonel Moncrieff's idea. Such was the exact position of the Service as regards the disappearing mounting system; and he might be allowed to add that, as between barbette and hydro-pneumatic mountings, the former was 50 per cent cheaper. The cheaper way of mounting was, generally speaking, used when the guns were placed in an elevated position; when they could be more or less concealed from the sight of an enemy—the hydro-pneumatic mounting was employed when guns could not be so withdrawn. Already all questions regarding fortifications, including the mounting of guns, went through a seven-fold process of inquiry and report—surely a good reason for not adding an eighth in the shape of a House of Commons Committee. It was upon that ground, and on the further grounds that he was unwilling to relieve officers from all Executive responsibility, and that a Parliamentary Committee to inquire into the Estimates was about to be proposed by the Secretary of State for War, that he ventured respectfully and regretfully to say that the Government were not able to accede to the proposal of his hon. and gallant Friend.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

DEFENCES OF THE EMPIRE—COAST DEFENCES OF GREAT BRITAIN.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR EDWARD HAMLEY (Birkenhead), who had the following Notice on the Paper:—

"That there is urgent necessity to set in operation a complete system for protecting this Country from an enemy's enterprizes, and to provide for it financially by means more adequate than are to be found in the Annual Estimates," said, he was going to venture to call the attention of the House to the defences of the Kingdom, and in doing so he might be allowed to observe that the Memorandum just put forth by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) appeared to him the most satisfactory statement of the kind that had been issued in his time, for it recognized the necessity of a complete scheme of defence, and implied an intention to provide for it. In dealing with the subject he would like to begin by conciliating possible objectors. Many hon. Members regarded all proposals for an increase of our armaments with distrust, as in their minds tending also to increase the probabilities of war. He wished to assure them that he would deal only with matters absolutely and purely defensive, which, far from increasing those probabilities, would tend to diminish them by lessening the chances of invasion, for the most formidable enemy would think twice before invading a prepared Great Britain. He would also ask those hon. Members who attached to all military plans a bellicose and provocative character to believe that officers who occupied themselves with measures of defence must be actuated by the desire to preserve the people of England from those very evils which the most peace-loving of our citizens desired to avert. They had lately heard proposals from a very influential Member of the House to cut down expenditure by the simple method of making it conform to the standard of some former year. But he would remind hon. Members that material of war was becoming every year more and more costly, and also that when expenditure on necessary armament had been for a series of years less than it ought to be, there would inevitably come a time when it would look greater than it ought to be. Therefore, endeavours to rule present and future expenditure by the standard of the past were absolutely irrational and fallacious. The situation, then, as it impressed itself on his mind was this—a small Island on the one side, a whole Continent of possible enemies on the other; the Island having a Coast line which offered to the enemy many imperfectly defended ports and numerous favourable landing places, and opposite to it impregnable harbours, where Fleets could assemble, and whence invading Armies could issue; the Island with a large population indeed, affording plenty of willing defenders; but these, for the most part, so imperfectly equipped that they would be absolutely unable to take the field even for a few days—and even when they sent forth an Expeditionary Force it could only be made complete by pulling to pieces the Regular Forces left at home; while opposite they saw the Continent absolutely swarming with Conscript Armies burning for action, kept at all points fit for immediate war, in equipment, in training, in organization, in transport, in means of concentration—the fact that each was always in presence of tremendous antagonists binding all under the heaviest penalties to maintain themselves in the completest readiness for action. And when they remembered that this Island contained immense wealth, and that that wealth would be looked on by the enemy as the legitimate reward of victory, it was no wonder that the situation inspired many experienced soldiers, many experienced sailors, and, he might add, experienced War Ministers, with absolute dismay. Economists argued that because England had never been invaded in our time it never would be. He was not aware that the Bank of England had ever been broken into in our time; but that was no reason why the Directors, while continuing to pour gold into their cellars, should dispense with bolts and bars and police. Now, if he referred for a moment to the Navy—which he did with great deference to the Naval Members of that House—it was because, it being often and justly styled our first line of defence, that phrase was taken to mean that it could be relied on for the defence of our Coasts. But experienced sailors and other naval authorities had lately assured us that its many Imperial duties would not leave it to be relied on for this task, and that such an alliance of Great Powers against us as we often hear talked of might well deprive us for a time of the command of the Channel. It was for such an opportunity, and for that alone, that Napoleon was waiting in 1805, when it was to be noted the naval power of England was at its height. His Army of Invasion was ready at Boulogne—transport flotilla prepared for instant embarkation—all that was wanted was the presence of the French and Spanish Fleets in the Channel for a few days, when a powerful Army, commanded by Napoleon himself, would have descended on our shores, and nothing but a series of fortunate events, leading to the victory of Trafalgar, prevented this plan from being realized. They must, then, take it for certain that if we were to be secure we must render our Coast independent of our Fleet; and he now turned to the question of insular defence, which might be considered as of two kinds—first, the means of repelling an enemy's ship from the Coast; secondly, of opposing an invading army. So dependent were we on our communications with other lands, that it was difficult to say which of our many great Ports we could lose without sustaining vital injury. But the great Military Ports having Dockyards and Arsenals were of prime importance. It was on these that our ships of all sorts must rely for secure harbourage against an enemy superior at the moment. And as soon as our Fleets were at sea, it was on those Ports they must rely for indispensable supplies of all kinds. It was to them disabled ships must look for repairs; it was in them new ships must be built to replace the waste of war. They were, then, indispensable to our Navy. On the other hand, should an enemy seize one of these Ports, imagine what a footing it would give him for invasion, with a safe harbour in which to land his troops and material, on which to rely for supplies of all kinds, and in which to mature his plans before marching on London. A generation ago the Government of that time (Lord Palmerston's) was aroused to a sense of our weakness, and fortified the most important of these Ports against the ships and artillery of that time. But ships and guns had since made progress at a fabulous rate, so that now, while the works then constructed might be ruined by the armament of some foreign iron-clads, we had not, so far as he was aware, a single gun mounted on the works that would pierce the armour of a first-class war ship. Since those times, however, a new kind of defence had been devised—that of torpedoes and submarine mines; and these were in course of being applied very completely for the defence of our Ports. Placed under water at certain points and in sufficient numbers, and exploded by electricity from the shore, the mines would inflict ruinous injury on the most formidable ships. But in dark nights or fogs they were, of course, less to be relied on; and it was a regular branch of naval tactics to send light craft to destroy them, or nullify their effect. Consequently, these defences required themselves to be defended, and the appropriate means was found in light, quick-firing guns, and machine guns to fire on the light craft. But if the iron-clads could stand in with impunity, they would crush these light weapons with their huge shells. Therefore, in order to keep them off, it was necessary that the defence should possess guns capable of piercing the armour of first-class war ships. Here, then, they had all the requirements—the submarine defences, the light artillery to protect them from the boats, and the heavy artillery to keep off the iron-clads. What was needed, then, was artillery of the kinds mentioned, and suitable forts to hold and protect it. Now, he would not convey the idea that because we were still unprovided with guns and works the officials whose business it was to provide them were in fault. They had, one and all, for years been persistent in their representations. Indeed, considering the great interests involved, it was almost pathetic to read the remonstrances uttered by these War Office officials and War Ministers and their reception by the Treasury. Scarcely inferior in importance were our great Commercial Ports, on which we relied not only for the maintenance of our trade, but for the means of feeding our population. Setting London aside as of a paramount importance that we all recognized, what would be the effect in this country if the telegraph should announce that a hostile iron-clad was approaching Liverpool? Should its enterprize be successful, should it with impunity set on fire or hold to ransom that great city, the example would inspire incessant depredations on our Coasts; while, on the other hand, the sinking of an iron-clad or two in such attempts would be a warning that the enemy could not afford to neglect. Now, such of these Ports as were situated on rivers or estuaries were more easy to defend than those which lay open to the sea, and which might, therefore, be bombarded at long range. It was very satisfactory to know that our chief river harbours were being now put in a condition of submarine defence; but it was still necessary to supplement that kind of protection with artillery, generally by guns placed in earthworks. Some Ports, like Liverpool, had expanded so greatly towards the sea that they were now within range of ships. Therefore, the chief requisite—though in less degree than for the Military Ports—still was light artillery, to protect the submarine mines, and armour-piercing guns to keep off iron-clads. These guns might, according to circumstances, be placed in existing works, adequately strengthened, or in earthworks on commanding points, or in floating batteries. In fact, he was certain that the statement of our exigencies by those whose business it had been to consider these matters would confirm his view—namely, that our requirements were mainly limited to guns of the classes he had named, and to sufficient works in which to place them. Now, the estimate of cost of guns, of completing the submarine defences, and of the works for the whole system of Military and Commercial Ports throughout the Kingdom, was, in round numbers, under £5,250,000. With respect to the question of cost, it seemed to him well worth consideration whether the great Ports whose property and trade and the safety of whose inhabitants these measures were designed to secure might not, on due appeal, see fit to contribute to the expenses. It was true that the question was a national one; but they had the paramount interest in it, and by taking a special part in their own defences the necessary works could proceed simultaneously, and be all the more acceptable, because giving large employment to labour in their respective localities. Another consolation was afforded by the fact that the problem of defence was no hasty scheme inspired by panic, but had been long and carefully considered by experienced officers, and that nothing but money was wanting in order to begin at once to put it in execution. And there was yet another circumstance which might bring us comfort. We were often told that when implements of war were undergoing constant changes, so that the weapon or the ship of one year was obsolete in the next, it was not worth while to provide ourselves with them till finality should be reached. The argument, though fallacious, as tending to render our armaments inferior to those of Powers which kept abreast of the times, was easily turned to powerful account. But what he would point out was that finality was, in an important particular, now in sight. For it was evident that if ships were to keep the sea and to possess high speed—both indispensable requisites in war ships—there must be a limit to the weight of armour they should carry; and if the limit was over-passed, they became means of destruction, not to the enemy, but to their own crews. That limit must now be nearly, if not quite, reached, so that the armour-piercing guns of to-day would remain permanently effective, and we need not hesitate to provide ourselves with them. And, finally, he should point out that in a competition in defensive strength between ships and shore batteries the batteries could always be made stronger than the ships, and could also be provided with appliances for screening the guns, which a ship did not admit of; and we might thus feel confident that we could render our Military and Commercial Ports absolutely secure if we chose to set about it. He now came to the question of our internal defences against invasion—that was, the Army with which we could meet an invading Army; and he concluded that everyone would agree that, if we had an Army at all, it should be sufficient for that purpose. We might remember that no less influential a person than the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) suggested that we should dispense with costly defences, and rely on a substitute of unparalleled cheapness—our “undying historic memories.” It was unfortunate that the only historic memory applicable to the case should be our subjugation by William the Conqueror. But, however that might be, he could imagine the perplexity of a hostile Army landed and looking to be met with a storm of shot and shell and a forest of bayonets on finding itself confronted only by “undying historic memories.” He was inclined to think that, on recovering from its pleased surprise, it would resume its march upon London, while we, on our part, would have to console ourselves with the advantages which the noble Lord said our refusal to spend money on armaments would have secured to us—namely, cheap beer, and tea, and tobacco, and an Income Tax still not exceeding 8*d*. But he feared the beer, and tea, and tobacco would be for the refreshment of the enemy, who would also undertake the control of the Income Tax along with all the rest of our National Revenues. Happily, we had something more substantial to rely on. In conjunction with the Regular Forces in the country, the Militia and Volunteers formed an immense Army, fit in numbers and in quality of men to oppose any Armies which could land on our shores. But those Armies would consist of trained and disciplined troops, while our Auxiliary Forces could give only a fraction of their time to military exercises. Moreover, they could not take the field for want of equipment. The first step was, then, to equip them. Supposing them to be as complete in field equipment as the Regular Army, there were circumstances which would be much in favour of our national troops defending their own soil against even a professional Army which crossed the sea to attack us. In the first place, we might be prepared beforehand to such a degree that it might almost be said every soldier would know his own place in the system of defence. For in Great Britain we had a very compact and not extensive theatre of war, in which the points at which an enemy could land and the groups of roads by which he would march inland were all ascertained, as were also the positions in which in each case the Field Army could be concentrated to oppose him. And troops could act efficiently on the defensive with much less training than if they had to manœuvre and attack. After being trained in their own exercising grounds in the construction of hasty intrenchments, such as all troops were expected to assist in making, and in the occupation of them for battle, they could, in the place of the present annual exercises, rehearse what would be their part in case of war—whether the defence of their own particular section of coast line, their share in a pitched battle, or the duty of garrisoning fortresses. For instance, it being known beforehand where a battery would be placed near the Coast for the defence of the Mersey, the Lancashire Volunteers might be trained in occupying ground for the defence of that battery against troops or seamen landed to attack it. Again, the line being known beforehand of a position, say in Sussex, to oppose an invading Army coming from Brighton, the troops to form the Field Army being all assigned to their corps in it, might be encamped in their places for their Autumn exercises in the parts of the line they would occupy. And, lastly, all the troops destined to garrison the fortresses in their own localities—those of Devon and Cornwall, for example, for the defence of Plymouth—should, as a regular annual exercise, form the actual garrison of that place for a time sufficient to make them thoroughly acquainted with their duties. That was specially necessary for Volunteer and Militia Artillery, who would thus become familiar with the many appliances, the magazines, and stores of all kinds, and the actual guns—and that was most important—which would be in their charge in resisting an attack. And whatever bodies of Artillery were disposable for Coast defence or for the Field Army should receive at once the guns—and practise with them—which they would use in the field. A step had already been made in that direction, with the best effect, in giving the Volunteer Engineers who were located on the banks of our great rivers an important share in taking charge of and working the submarine defences of the neighbouring ports. Besides thus assigning the troops to their own ground we should possess another kind of advantage, for while an enemy must bring everything with him—horses, forage, provisions, transport—we should possess ample supplies of these all over the country, and by keeping a constant register of them—horses, wagons, wagoons, and forage—in each district, they would be always available on the shortest notice. We had already gone so far as to make considerable progress in a military study of the country by instructed officers. That should include the registration he spoke of; and also the precise use of every road and portion of railway for any intended concentration should be laid down beforehand and exact calculations of all movements prepared. Such matters would, in his opinion, be best intrusted to a specially selected staff under experienced direction, and their work might be periodically submitted for approval to a military council, also specially selected. Besides men, and material, and equipment, there would still be another matter indispensable to the efficiency of our Field Army, and that was the building of stores and magazines at points where they would be ready for the supply of the troops with equipment and stores and ammunition and guns when taking the field. In this way the whole scheme of operations for our Home Army might be laid out in all its particulars; and what would else, on the approach of an enemy, be a scene of hopeless tumult and confusion, would become one of orderly and prompt action. And as nothing so demoralized troops as apparent want of purpose of those who directed them, so nothing gave them such assurance of victory as to see that all their movements were tending to the execution of a well-considered plan. And, in the meantime, the immediate effect on the Auxiliary troops themselves could not be but most encouraging—everyone would know and feel that he had certain duties, and that he was fitting himself to perform them, and a Volunteer, instead of that somewhat vague entity which he now felt himself to be, would know that he had a distinct part in that design of defending the country for which alone the Volunteers were called into existence. Lastly, in all schemes of defence, it was necessary to secure the safety of London by forces independent of armies in the field, so that no corps suddenly cast upon the Coast for the purpose, or which should have succeeded in evading for the moment our Field Armies, should be able to clutch us by the throat, a move which might be itself decisive and bring us to our knees. The plan he advocated to prevent this was the most inexpensive, and, he would add, the most easily practicable that had yet, as far as he knew, been propounded. It was to raise the Volunteers of London from 25,000 to 60,000, and to train them specially for its defence—by laying down the positions which they must occupy on any side threatened in order to keep an enemy at arm's length—and to give the London Artillery Volunteers, already sufficient for their purpose, the requisite number of guns of position. Thus a line north from the Thames at Barking would bar the approaches from the Essex Coast; one by Erith, through Chislehurst to Bromley, would close the approaches from the Coast between the mouth of the Thames and Hastings; other positions would complete the circuit around London, and the capital would be secure against a sudden rush from any side. And these guards of London would always be kept instructed and prepared for this service of its defence. He calculated that all these steps necessary to put our National Forces in this condition of defence—the equipment, the leases, and construction of all magazines and stores, the execution of the military plan of defence, and the raising of certain additional Volunteers, especially Artillery—for they were not always most abundant in the localities where most needed—would cost less than £1,000,000. He had now, in as few words as he could employ, endeavoured to place before the House the requirements for Home defence. He had spoken only of Great Britain, because he wished to confine the first view of our defences to what most nearly concerned us, what was most vital, and what could be most easily taken in at one view. It needed no words of his or of anybody to enable hon. Members to imagine what weight and consideration we should derive in the Councils of Europe from a recognition of the fact that this Island was practically impregnable. Many plans of invasion now reposing in many foreign war bureaux might then be torn up. Commercial enterprise of all kinds would, he imagined, receive a fresh impetus from the feeling of security against recurring panics. And all this might be realized for the sum he had stated—that was to say, in round numbers, £6,250,000. It might, perhaps, be asked why so small a sum could not be spread over a term of years, and provided for in the Annual Estimates? He answered, first, because that plan had been so often found a total failure. As an instance, he might quote that the defence of our Commercial Ports was provided for in this way—the cost was to be spread over five years; last year was to be the first of those years, when £100,000 was to be taken for the purpose in the Estimates as the instalment of that year. What was the result? The sum was cut down in the Estimates to £10,000. If this work was to be done by means of the Annual Estimates, then if it were ever done, of which he was seriously doubtful, it would be certain to be spread over a period vastly in excess of that originally estimated for. He would ask, then, that it should be raised by a loan, and set apart for the purpose intended, and for no other, and thus made secure from the exigencies and temptations of the Budget. Another advantage would be that the work might proceed at once all over the Kingdom, and be finished in a comparatively brief time—two years might see it accomplished; a period surely long enough for us to remain with our defences incomplete. Also, in considering the comparative smallness of the sum, he would point out that it was only a part, though a vitally important part, of the Imperial scheme of defence. The defence of Ireland must be provided for when the proper time arrived, and of the Colonies also; the coaling stations were already in progress, but that progress might be greatly accelerated by including them in the loan; and notwithstanding the progress of the Navy, the Admiralty would not object, he presumed, to be endowed with the financial power to raise the Navy to its proper pitch. And it must be remembered that, of all modes of expenditure, the various defences of the Kingdom were the most satisfactory, as at once giving a vast impetus to employment at our great centres of population. This plan of a loan had already been tried on former occasions with success, and on occasions, he might say, not comparable in urgency to the present crisis. There was, then, no novelty in what he proposed, nothing which had not already been agreed to and found to answer. We should thus have a guarantee against the tendency of all Governments in this country—a natural tendency, but one nevertheless very dangerous—to be so solicitous to discharge their duty as guardians of the public purse that they were apt to neglect their other duty as guardians of the public safety. From this cause, and also because of the vast means of offence which other nations had accumulated, we had fallen far below the requirements of our position. We were fond of boasting that we had an Empire on which the sun never set; but we forgot that Empire was a luxury expensive in proportion to its extent, and that the boast would be indeed a vain one if, when the time came, we should be found unprepared to defend our Possessions.

Sir Edward Hamley

CAPTAIN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.) said, the scope of the question of defence could not be limited purely to the United Kingdom. The danger of invasion from a given Power was largely influenced by its carrying power—in other words, its Mercantile Marine. He entirely agreed with the hon. and gallant Member for Birkenhead (Sir Edward Hamley) that if this country went to war with a Maritime Power there would be a scene of disastrous confusion, due more to moral causes than to a hostile landing being effected. It was hard for him, at least, to realize that any Power could throw 100,000 men on our shores unless we had, more or less, lost command of the sea. Moreover, it would puzzle any European Power to concentrate carrying power for such a force. The great danger to this country would lie in a series of small blows delivered at its seaports, and for that method of attack we were unprepared. We had for years talked much of the defence of our seaports, but had done very little. The value of the export and import trade of London and Liverpool was in excess of the value of the total sea-borne commerce of France, which meant that if we were unprepared a blow could be delivered by a small force at or off these places which would be equivalent to the universal destruction of the whole sea-borne commerce of France. Then, again, the trade of the Port of London alone was more than double the value of the whole sea-borne commerce of Russia. The effect of leaving our Mercantile Ports undefended would be to enable a French or Russian cruiser to do irreparable damage to our commerce. He protested against any delay in taking the common-sense precautions which were absolutely necessary. Assuming, however, that there maritime or coast provisions were made, no complete step would have been taken for the safety of the people of the country. It would be in vain that our Ports were protected, or our coast line secured. We could not maintain a passive defence of this Kingdom for more than a few weeks, because the people could not live. If our arrangements for the protection of our sea communications were weak, the effect would be apparent in time of war almost immediately. The sense of insecurity would at once affect the Stock Exchange; there would be the stopping, first, of the food supply, and, secondly, of the importation of raw materials. The price of both would go up, the factories would have to close, and hundreds of thousands of workpeople would be turned on the streets, where they would be met with extremely dear bread. In fact, such a state of confusion and disorder would arise—with which it would be almost impossible for the authorities to cope—that the results would be irreparable; and under the pressure of such circumstances no Government could carry on even a passive defence. Further, he wished to point out that the interests we had to defend were drifting further and further away. The task of establishing satisfactory defences was vastly more complicated than it was when we last fought for our supremacy at Trafalgar, when we had a population in the United Kingdom of only 15,000,000 persons to be provided for, and when the food supply of the country was provided within our own shores—wholly independent of external resources—but now all that was changed. In those days one ton of shipping was sufficient to meet the wants of six inhabitants, whereas now each man, woman, and child required the services of a ton and a-half of shipping during the year. Then, 23-24ths of our external trade was confined to European waters; now, more than a moiety of it was thousands of miles beyond European waters. It would not matter, therefore, whether the blow was struck in the Channel or thousands of miles away, the consequences might be equally grave. He earnestly trusted the House would forget for a moment current controversies and Party differences, to consider whether, in the event of war, in two months, under conditions which it was perfectly possible and reasonable to contemplate, our naval and military preparations were adapted to our requirements. If not, a great responsibility rested upon them not to shirk the question, and not to shirk spending such sums as were reasonably necessary. It was not merely or primarily a question of expenditure, but one of administration; and he desired to say that he would be no party to dipping further into the pockets of the taxpayers unless the present system of administration was entirely changed. Between the War Office, the Admiralty, and the Colonial Office, a great deal of money was lost. With constantly changing Heads of Departments, and a general tendency to get rid of expert authority, there was no guarantee for economy and efficiency. While cordially supporting the Motion, his contention was, let naval work be done by naval men, and military work be done by military men, and let us appoint, for a fixed period of years, a capable War Minister, who should be responsible to this House and the country, and control the war expenditure and all war forces.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) said, he thought it desirable that some sort of protest should be raised from that side of the House against the assumption which had pervaded several previous speeches—that our chief business was to spend money on naval and military armaments. He was glad to hear the hon. and gallant Member who had just resumed his seat (Captain Colomb) say he was not inclined to dip more deeply into the public purse, because he desired, in the first instance, to see some improvements in administration. He agreed with him so far, but he could not agree with the general tone of alarm which characterized the greater part of the hon. and gallant Gentleman's speech. But not only he, but other hon. and gallant Gentlemen who spoke before him, complained that, do what they would, and do what their Predecessors would, they had never been able to stir up the Administration of the country to a proper state of alarm as to the perils which are always impending over our seaports and our sea coast. He was aware, as one who had taken an interest in public affairs before he became a Member of that House, of the repeated efforts which had been made to stir up alarm on this subject. Every few years there was a panic excited, and a few millions had been spent; then the panic subsided, and the people became indifferent until the hot fit came on again. Why could not the Government be stirred up to take so serious a view of this matter as the hon. and gallant Gentleman thought necessary? He thought it was because the Government practically believed that our seaports are safe. And why? Because they thought that it was not for the interest of anyone in the world to attack them. The hon. and gallant Gentleman spoke of this country as an Island teeming with wealth; and he seemed to think that all other countries were teeming with burglars, and that their one idea was to come and rob our ports. He was aware it was often said that expenditure on military and naval armaments was a question of policy; and he was of opinion that, if we pursued a right line of policy, our seaports would never be in danger. Why did the United States feel so tranquil? It was because their position and their policy kept them free from the entanglements of the Old World. It might be said that we should have a difficulty in pursuing an isolated policy like that of the United States. He admitted that we could not take up quite the same position as the United States; but he said that our position as an Island, separated from the Coast of Europe, enabled us to keep clear of most of the difficulties, the petty jealousies, the international rivalries, and the dynastic intrigues which constituted the questions which were perpetually threatening war on the Continent of Europe. For if we could mind our own business, and attend to the substantial interests of the country, we should never be in danger of invasion. In that way we could secure the blessings of peace. They had all heard of the difficulty of getting more money out of the already over-burdened taxpayers of this country. The hon. and gallant Member for Birkenhead (Sir Edward Hamley) had told them of the touching appeals made by military administrators, and even by the War Minister himself, to the Treasury to give them a little more money for naval and military armaments. But there were appeals far more pathetic than these appeals, such as that made by the Victoria University for £2,000 a-year to improve the education of the Northern Districts, appeals for free schools and for technical education to keep us abreast of other countries in the world. Those were more pathetic and interesting appeals than appeals for increased armaments; but these appeals on behalf of the higher wants of the country would never be met so long as we lavished our treasure on the means of destruction. He was as anxious as anyone that our land should be kept safe from attack; but the taxpayers could not bear the two burdens—that of the old barbarism and of the new ages of improvement. They could not afford at the same time to lavish our treasure on guns that, as the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) said, take £200 to fire a single shot, and at the same time supply our people with free schools, technical instruction, and all the higher needs of this age of progress. We could not bear the two. He, therefore, thought it was the duty of our Government so to frame our policy that we should not irritate other nations of the world, and not invite attack, confining ourselves to minding our own business. If we took that line, he contended there would be less expenditure necessary for our Fleet to protect our commerce and Dependencies, while for our military strength we could depend to a large extent on our Volunteers. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen seemed to laugh at the Volunteers. ["No, no!"] Possibly, then, it was himself they were laughing at, and their laughter had more justification. Although the Volunteers might not have in all respects the value of long-trained soldiers, yet he did think that should an enemy invade our land—a thing to his mind almost impossible—our Volunteers would be able to give a very good account of him; so that for purposes of defence we might rely more than we did on our Volunteer Service. He rose to make one protest against the assumption that the chief object of the House was to prepare for war, and also to urge that if we only adopted a common-sense, pacific policy, we could do with much less expenditure on our Naval and Military Services.

Captain Colomb

MR. TOTENHAM (Winchester) said, he believed that the country owed a debt of gratitude to the hon. and gallant Member who had introduced the debate (Sir Edward Hamley); but he thought it was a mistake and fatal policy to spread over a term of years a work that ought, in the interests of the nation, to be undertaken with the least possible delay, in order that the country might be put in a state of defence. There were two subjects to which he desired specially to draw the attention of the House. One was the proposed reduction of the Artillery Force. He asked the Secretary of State to pause before committing himself to the mistaken policy of reducing our Forces in the very arm which it was impossible to supply at short notice. Comparing the numbers of the Artillery Force of this country with those of the Artillery Forces of Continental nations, he found that Great Britain had 612 guns to 337,000 men, including the Native Indian Army, which was without Artillery; France,

1,938 guns to 565,000 men; Germany, 2,040 guns to 460,000 men; and Russia, 2,278 guns to 871,000 men; so that the proportion of guns for every 1,000 men was in Great Britain 1·81; in France 3·43; in Germany 4·43; and in Russia 2·61. Instead of economizing by reducing the Field Artillery, let the authorities begin their economies in that Augean Office—the War Office—and other Departmental Offices, including the Circumlocution Office described by the Surveyor General of Ordnance—and sweep away half that army of quill-driving officials, who could not distinguish a cutlass from a piece of hoop iron, or a properly made cartridge from one that would jam, and who went upon the principle that because these things were in store they had got to be used, and who seemed to think if their ideas and calculations were not carried out the Army must go to the dogs. In 1884 he insisted upon the necessity of the numbers of the Army being increased, and received an answer from the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) denying such necessity. He was, however, glad to say that within two years of such answer his right hon. Successor at the War Office (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) added to the numbers of the Army some 20,000 men—the numbers being in 1884 201,905, and in 1886 220,063. In 1881 he also pointed out that the term with the Colours ought to be increased; and he was glad that something had been done in this direction. Lord Airey's Committee, composed of a distinguished body of officers, laid down in their Report four cardinal points—that the term with the Colours ought to be altered; that the numbers of the Army ought to be increased; that the system of one battalion feeding another should be abolished; and that once a man was posted to a battalion he should remain with it during his whole active service. The first two recommendations had in a degree been carried out, the last two had been disregarded, and the evils which were intended to remove still remained. The system of one battalion feeding another was in the last resort a system of paper establishments.

esprit de corps of the regiment. Regimental officers and non-commissioned officers complained of the persistent round of drill and drudgery without ever being able to see their battalion in an efficient state. In 1882, when a certain regiment was sent to Egypt, 400 Reserve men had to be drafted into it to fill up the vacancies left by 400 recruits who were left behind; and the officers gave a pitiable account as to the state of their regiment for several months after—the Reserve men having been away some time from the Colours, and being rather lax, and there being no sufficient leaven of old soldiers. The using of the Reserve in this way had the further objection that it was using up our second line in the first. If the Reserve men were called upon in this way, there would be nothing to fall back upon. Next, as to the system of sending men from one battalion to another. It was a great hardship on the men, who had thus to break up old friendships, and were always in a state of uncertainty as to whether they might not the next day be moved into another battalion, and be made to serve under new officers, of whom they knew nothing. It really seemed as if they were tending towards the system of a third unit. There were at present nine double battalion regiments with both battalions abroad, and with depôts of 650 men each at home; and the Cameron Highlanders, which is a single battalion, with a depôt of 321 men, so that out of the 68 depôts there were 10, or one-seventh of the whole, under the system that he advocated. In addition to this, every depôt was in excess of its strength, some double or treble, and in some cases four times the number of its establishment. Taking the first 12 regiments on the list, he found that they had an effective strength of 2,104 men, against an establishment of 828 men. Two of these with 277 and 243 men respectively against establishments of 69 each. Taking the whole Army, the numbers were 14,971 effective, against an establishment of 10,336, showing an excess of 4,575. It could not, therefore, be said that the depôt system was not capable of expansion, as here they had it already expanded by nearly 4,600 men. Why not extend it boldly still further, instead of allowing it to creep in by degrees in the face of paper establishments? He should like to see three battalions to every regiment, one to be always at home, and to act as dépôt. Effective battalions were wanted at home as well as abroad, and under the present system they would never exist. It was absurd to appoint Royal Commissions and Committees of Inquiry composed of officers of distinction and practical experience if their recommendations were to be overruled by civilians and financial considerations. He hoped that before the debate closed the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) would be able to give the House an assurance that before next year the whole of the recommendations of Lord Airey's Committee would be considered, with a view of abolishing or mitigating a system which was fraught with injury to the Service, and a danger to the country at large.

GENERAL FRASER (Lambeth, N.): Permit me, Sir, to endeavour to put forward a clear statement of a question now pending of momentous importance to the whole nation, to the efficiency of the Army in general, and of the Cavalry Service in particular—namely, the proposed immediate abolition of five of the batteries of Horse Artillery, out of a Home Establishment of 13 batteries. It will be allowed on all sides that no reduction in any branch of the Service should be carried out, unless it is distinctly evident that the efficiency of the Army will be increased thereby; or else that an important economy will be effected by such reduction, without impairing that efficiency. I request the indulgence of the House whilst I prove, from the mouth of distinguished soldiers accustomed to organize and command Armies, and by not complicated statistics, that the efficiency of the Service would, on this occasion, be deeply impaired, and that the cost of the re-establishment of these batteries at a future time will be extremely heavy. I venture to claim that I am able to show that sufficient Horse Artillery is an essential and most important element in an Army; that its conversion to Field Artillery is no sort of compensation for its loss, as Field Artillery cannot perform the duties of Horse Artillery; and, further, that I am able to prove, by the simplest calculation of numbers, that if the proposed abolition of five batteries of Horse Artillery takes place, it will only be possible to make the First Army Corps up to the War Establishment; that the Second Army Corps would be mythical, and that all Horse Artillery in India and elsewhere will be dependent for reinforcements and supply in cases of any emergency, and even for relief, to the breaking up of that First Army Corps. The reduction of the five batteries out of 13 of the Royal Horse Artillery would affect, to a vital extent, the operations of the divisions and brigades of Cavalry in the field, in which Horse Artillery bear a part of such paramount importance; and it must tie the hands of the Commander in campaigns and battles when he would wish to throw guns up at speed into important positions. Marshal Von Moltke has given his opinion that—

“Because, in modern warfare, the long range and destructive fire of Artillery necessitates a scattered formation, there will be more frequent opportunities for Cavalry.”

General Sir Edward Hamley says, in his Operation of War—

“Let it also be granted that Cavalry properly trained and led, may play as great a part as ever on the stage of war; combined with new and larger proportions of Artillery, its action may be decisive of the fate of battles, and launched in pursuit of a broken foe it may finish a campaign which would else wade through fresh carnage to its woeful end.”

Further, he says—

“To gain from this mobility its greatest effect, field batteries should, to a certain extent, be converted into Horse Artillery, by which the greatest possible rapidity of manœuvre would be attained; batteries would constantly shift their position, so as always to take the line diagonally or in flank, and by rapid retreat would baffle a counter attack.”

In 1870 Horse and Field Artillery were ordered to push on at once to the battle field of Spicheren. The Horse Artillery accomplished the distance—21 miles—in three hours, and arrived in time, while the field batteries took four and a-half hours, and only came up when the action was over. The same happened to the same batteries on another occasion, when the field batteries were again too late. Marches at such a pace are impossible in Field Artillery, and, therefore, they cannot take the place of Horse Artillery. Prince Kraft zu Hohenlohe desires that the whole of the Corps Artillery should be composed of Horse Artillery. We have the instance also of Sir Drury Lowe's Cavalry and Horse

Artillery's brilliant advance on Cairo after Tel-el-Kebir. Horse Artillery is an arm most difficult to construct, and impossible to improvise. The impression that the new Horse Artillery gun is a heavy gun, that cannot work with Cavalry, is quite erroneous; it is a 12-pounder breech-loader, powerful and accurate, with all ranks mounted, and it is able to go anywhere with Cavalry—whose right arm it is—when pushing out miles in front, on outpost duty, in advance and rearguard duties, reconnaissance, covering the deployment, and concealing the movements of an Army, keeping up communication and cutting off and threatening those of the enemy, protecting the fronts and flanks of an Army. It is a powerful auxiliary in the attack, and a friend in need in pursuit, and in the hour of danger and defeat; it can keep pace with the advance, and by pouring a destructive fire on the enemy, pave the way for the Cavalry to victory; it dislodges the enemy from positions in which the sword cannot reach him, and it does fearful execution when the enemy's Infantry, concentrated in masses, bids defiance to the horsemen; it checks pursuit, and gains time for the Cavalry to re-form under fire; it is of great use in passing defiles and bridges in the face of the enemy, in defending broken ground against odds, and in many other ways it is Cavalry's best assistant. The action of Cavalry and Horse Artillery in spreading a curtain round an Army was brilliantly exemplified by the Germans, in the War of 1870, by which, often without bloodshed, their sudden appearance, miles in front of the Army, caused towns to give up their keys and surrender. The enemy felt, the touch was never left go, troops were watched and their movements reported, whilst the main bodies were advancing at comparative ease. Cavalry and Artillery work in complete harmony with the Infantry—the principal arm always—and subordinates its action to that of the latter. The rapid advance to the Moselle of the Cavalry, and the consequent paralyzation of the French plan of operations, contributed not a little to the success of the German operations. Cavalry and Horse Artillery can be dissociated. Frederick the Great only recognizing the necessity of association in the Seven Years' War, organized batteries of Light Artillery, capable of moving at the pace of squadrons, and intended to support all their enterprises. The Duke of Wellington's letters from India describes the advantages that Lord Lake derived from attaching quick-moving guns to his Cavalry. Amongst numberless instances, let it be remembered, that Lord Gough, at Sobraon, kept his Horse Artillery fresh, and brought it up at speed to carry annihilation into the Sikh Army, retiring across the Sutlej. To-day we read in the Italia Romana, in a letter from an Italian officer in Abyssinia—

"We are all sure that the catastrophe would have been averted, if the column had been accompanied by a small force of Cavalry and guns."

Valentine Baker Pasha has said, that had a Horse Artillery battery been available at the second action at El Teb, where he was himself severely wounded, the loss to the British Force would probably have been greatly diminished, as the battery could have taken, from its mobility, the works of Osman Digna in flank before the delivery of the main attack on the front. Horse Artillery is essential to the rapid movement and the quick tactic of the present day. Field Artillery—to whom all honour in their magnificent service is due—in consequence of the weight and the impossibility of carrying the detachment men on the carriages, the difficulty of keeping up a supply of men in time to fill up casualties, and the slow advance, as the men who work the guns have to march on foot—are not available for this duty. A true and well-known axiom is—

"Mobility is an essential for good Artillery; it is the power to move rapidly when requisite, not continual movement that is required."

General Lord Wolseley, in his Pocket Book, lays down—

"It must be remembered that batteries of Field Artillery are not supposed to move faster than a walk, as the gunners march on foot."

An incident at the Alma may be mentioned. Lord Raglan prayed that some guns might be brought to a particular knoll, whence they could dislodge the enemy's guns on the causeway. Two guns of Turner's field battery were at length brought up—a gun horse killed in the river had delayed them—had this been a Horse Artillery gun a detachment horse would at once have replaced it—then two guns ultimately reached the spot indicated, but without these detachments, who had been unable, being on foot, to keep up, the Artillery officers, including Colonel (now Sir) Collingwood Dickson, and Brigadier General Strangways, who had been at Leipsic, and was killed at Inkermann, and who was commanding the Artillery of the Crimean Campaign, dismounted and worked the guns with their own hands. Had this been a Horse Artillery battery, the detachment would not have been left behind. As a result of this incident, the number of Horse Artillery batteries was speedily and importantly increased. Are we to expect in all future wars that a contingent, such as we sent to Egypt, will suffice, and that no further batteries of Artillery would be required? Turn back to 1854-5. Is no experience gained by the unprepared state of the Army in those days? The position of England is quite exceptional, and it does not do to compare her with other nations. Not only have we to keep up the usual proportion of Horse Artillery guns recognized for the requirements of our Cavalry and Corps Artillery, but we have always India, for which we must be prepared to meet an emergent demand at any moment for more guns; and also, looking at our numerous Colonies and interests abroad, how often do we not have to enter into small wars where, possibly, Horse Artillery are required, sometimes without a Cavalry Brigade? I would instance the case of the Trent affair in 1862, when a battery of Horse Artillery was placed under orders to proceed to Canada, but subsequently countermanded. There has been a battery of Horse Artillery in Egypt for a length of time without a Cavalry Brigade. Owing to the great mobility of Horse Artillery, it has frequently been sent on service to accompany Infantry. For instance, the Chestnut troop with the Light Division in the Peninsula; O Troop with Light Division in the Crimea. Several instances in India, especially in frontier warfare. The non-commissioned officers and men are specially selected, as well as the officers; and it is their pride in their work and efficiency, and in the knowledge of their own value, which has kept them always in their high state of efficiency. The contemplated reduction of the five batteries of Horse Artillery will seriously affect the pay of non-commissioned officers and men of those batteries. The change will deprive every non-commissioned officer and artificer of 2*d.* a-day, gunners 1½*d.* a day, drivers ¾*d.* a-day, trumpeters no less than 9½*d.* a-day. The trifle that Government may save by such economy will do an infinity of damage in the Recruiting Department, and to the confidence in the class from which the best soldiers are drawn. I have it, on the best authority; that a very large number of men who enlist for the Artillery ask to be sent to the Horse Artillery. They are told that that cannot be, but that they must work their way to it by good conduct and smartness. Beyond doubt, surplus Artillery is worse than useless; it hampers and delays the columns, keeps troops out of action for escorts, blocks roads, and impedes a retreat. Have we at present a surplus? No; on the contrary, we have not one man, one horse, one gun too many for our absolute requirements. To supply the two Horse Artillery batteries sent to Egypt in 1882, the batteries left at home were so crippled that they could not have drawn their own guns out of the barrack yard. The Secretary of State for War has spoken of this reduction as being, in part, simply "a conversion." Death itself is simply a conversion; he admits that five batteries of Horse Artillery are to be obliterated, which loss is tantamount to death to them, and to the Service; besides this destruction of five batteries, certain other batteries of Horse Artillery will have only four guns instead of six—namely, after the reduction, there will be five batteries with six guns, and three batteries with only four guns. The reduction of certain batteries by two guns in peace time, to be put into store, is most paralyzing. In Germany the batteries in peace time are reduced; but men are available immediately from the "Reserve," which is a fact there, and not a fiction as in this country. Artillerymen from the "Reserve" have to attend trainings at manoeuvres a certain number of times, so as to keep up their knowledge. Our Reserve Artillerymen never have this practice. Further, the mode of draught in their Artillery is the same as that for all farm purposes; ours is quite different. The horses of the country are all available; ours are not. They are also registered; ours are not; pairs of horses accustomed to work together, can be procured and put into batteries at very short notice. In our Service, we should have to unman and unhorse other batteries, supposing that they exist. The Secretary of State for War claims that the increase of guns for Garrison Artillery, and for the Volunteers, will make up for the loss of guns that should be in the fore-front in a campaign. It would be as well to say that, in the interest of India, the 11th Bengal Lancers are to be reduced, but that the 3rd West India Regiment is to be increased. The allotment of baggage animals to Infantry regiments—namely, 240 horses (see Army Estimates), cannot be put as a set-off for the loss of five batteries of Horse Artillery; and the arrangement does not get over the fact that 30 guns, with the greatest mobility, are lost to the Service. We, at the present time, have of Horse Artillery—four batteries of six guns for the First Army Corps; four batteries of four guns for the Second Army Corps; five batteries of four guns for a Reserve. It is quite safe to say that, to complete the batteries of the First Army Corps to War Establishment, every gunner, driver, and horse of the five Reserve batteries would be required. If these, then, are abolished, the batteries of the Second Army Corps will have to supply, as far as they can, the men and horses required, and thus the Second Army Corps' batteries will be entirely denuded of horses, and almost entirely of non-commissioned officers and men. It is only by keeping up a strong force of Horse Artillery that we can hope to put an efficient proportion of it in the field. The difficulty in these days of procuring good horses, sound, and of proper stamp for the Horse Artillery, is great, even in peace time, when there is no hurry; and what may we expect when war is upon us? Remember, a single unsuitable horse may mean the impotence or loss of a gun. It was my duty to buy, as quickly as possible, 500 horses in Ireland, during the Campaign of 1882 in Egypt; horses for Horse Artillery and Cavalry were most difficult to procure, and but very few indeed were at all fit to send out to a campaign; baggage horses were easy to obtain. The power of Artillery in the field is in the number of guns efficiently put into the field; and not in the number of men capable of garrisoning the forts at home and in the Colonies.

If it became necessary to increase the Garrison Artillery, it could be done at any time, to a very large amount, from the Auxiliary Forces—Militia and Volunteers, Reserves, &c. Guns put into store are guns reduced, as the men and horses to work them will not be kept up. The Secretary of State for War has not explained the cost of the proposed changes, or the amount of saving in expenditure; we must therefore conclude that the saving is nil, or else that the saving is to be expended elsewhere. He states that all the Horse Artillery that will be required—that is, for this new scheme of organization—will be eight batteries of six guns each for the First and Second Army Corps; that none of them will be kept on war strength, and five only of those eight batteries will be maintained at First Army Corps strength with six guns; that three Horse Artillery batteries of the Second Army Corps will only have four guns each, and men and horses in proportion—adding that, “in war time, of course, these Horse Artillery batteries will take the field with six guns each.” He does not explain how this is to be, as the five other batteries to-day in existence, and able to supply officers, non-commissioned officers, men and horses are to be abolished next month! It should be understood that there are to be three Establishments in the Horse Artillery—batteries at war strength, at which there are to be none—175 men and 163 horses; First Army Corps' strength, at which there are to be five batteries—162 men and 104 horses; and a low Second Army Corps' strength, at which there are to be three batteries—120 men and 72 horses. Therefore, it is evident that to form only four batteries at war strength in case of need for the First Army Corps, it would be necessary to denude the whole of the 2nd Army Corps, with the exception of 470 men and 84 horses, and this without eliminating the men and horses unfit for active service from any of the eight batteries that it is proposed only to retain. Are the two Army Corps—if they can be formed—(which they have never been, except on paper, for 12 years) to be left entirely without reserve? Is India, in emergency, to be dependant for a supply of Horse Artillery on the breaking up of these two Army Corps? If the proportion of Horse Artillery is too large for our Army, it would appear that the authors of this new scheme are the very advisers who are responsible for the taxpayers of the country having been for years past heavily burdened for an excess of force in this arm! Field Marshal Lord Napier of Magdala, in "another place," has clearly demonstrated that the proposed reductions in the Royal Artillery in general are fraught with extreme peril—that they would cripple efficiency; that 30 guns would cease to be Horse Artillery guns; that more than 600 trained and skilled Horse Artillerymen would be taken from this important arm, and would have to be sent to other duties which require much less skill; also that the Imperial Forces have not, by an immense number, their proper proportion of guns, according to the proportion recognized by the principal Military Authorities of Europe. That noble and gallant Lord took the numbers of batteries of Horse and Field Artillery, assuming that, on an emergency, the considerable number of batteries that have already been reduced from six to four guns might be completed to six guns—a process most exhausting to other batteries—and proved that the 106 batteries of 636 guns are not, in any way, in proper proportion to the Imperial troops, of which Returns give a total strength of 289,960, and that this 636 guns would stand to them in the proportion of only 2·2 guns to 1,000 men. Napoleon laid down three guns to 1,000 men—a low estimate for the present day—but according to which we should require 869 guns, or 233 more than we possess. The German standard is now 3·6 guns per 1,000 men, according to which we should have 1,043 guns, instead of 636. Jomini, with whom General Lord Wolseley agrees in the Pocket Book, says this—"the proportion should be three guns to 1,000." Frederick the Great began with this proportion, but quickly increased it. In India, in 1879, a proposal very similar to the present scheme of reduction was recommended by a Commission on Army Organization. The Minutes of the Commander-in-Chief in India on the Report is so much to the point that I venture to quote from it. The Commander-in-Chief wrote—

"It is proposed by the Commission to reduce the Horse Artillery in India from 15 to 10 batteries. In this sweeping reduction I cannot concur. The Commission consider that after providing this arm for two Army Corps, no more is required. No Reserve and no means of keeping complete or efficient the 10 batteries of Horse Artillery in the two Army Corps has been provided, nor is any provision whatever made to meet the contingency of more of this arm being required elsewhere. It suffices to say that, in Bengal, with six Horse Artillery batteries in the field and four in the rear, these latter have been so denuded of men to replace the casualties in the former, that it has been found absolutely inexpedient to further denude them of the few effectives still left; and we have been obliged to telegraph home for 110 men of this branch to meet requirements during the coming season, and which will cause an increase in the present fixed Establishment of this arm in Bengal of 70 men. Such facts speak for themselves."

Now these were six-gun, not four-gun, batteries. Again—

"No Horse Artillery would be available for external uses in the event of any considerable force being despatched beyond sea. In fact, this branch, which perhaps requires the longest training of all, is entirely overlooked, not only as regards Reserves for that portion employed in the field, but also with reference to any internal or external contingencies which might arise during another war, such as that in which we are now engaged. . . . At present, Bombay, with its two batteries of Horse Artillery in or about to take the field, has no Reserve, and if the casualties from invaliding, &c., in these batteries approach those of the Horse Artillery batteries, which took the field from Bengal in 1878-9, the result will be that, after completing the foremost battery from the one in rear, the latter will be unable to turn out more than two guns, if it be not rendered entirely unfit for service."

The Commander-in-Chief in India explains—

"To place a battery in the field, the first thing to be done is to transfer to it men and horses, not recruits and raw horses, but men and animals trained to the work. The wear and tear in the field is excessive, and has to be met from batteries in the rear. The history of I. C. Royal Horse Artillery, and a statement of the drafts required to keep it efficient, and the necessity under which it became obligatory to relieve it, would astonish those who have had no concern with the details of such affairs."

Sir Frederick Haines, in a further Minute on the subject, remarks—

"In my Minute of the 20th March, 1880, reference is made to the fact that Bombay had but two batteries of Royal Horse Artillery, that they were in or about to take the field, and that they had no Reserve. What happened? E-B battery suffered severe losses at Maiwand, and it was necessary to repair them by the despatch of a complete division, men and horses, harness and guns, from a battery in Bengal, at Umbal-lah, Bombay, having no reserves either in men or horses trained to that branch of the service."

He further explains—

"On the outbreak of war it would be necessary to complete the batteries selected for service in the front from those that remain in rear. There are many men and horses, though equal to the ordinary duties of peace time, are quite unfit to stand the exposure and privation of active service, and all of them have to be eliminated, and their places filled up by effective transfers from the other batteries. This same process has to be continued throughout the campaign, and the result is that, whilst completing and maintaining the batteries in front, we render inefficient a large proportion of those in rear, and this to an extent which is not apparent from the mere returns of the casualties occurring in front—for while giving away these serviceable men and horses, the rear batteries, in many instances, have been receiving in exchange the inefficient they replace, so that not only are the numbers reduced, but their quality becomes seriously deteriorated; in fact, they can no longer be looked upon as efficient batteries. In India, in 1878, to complete 10 batteries to a war footing, it required 106 transfers of men. To complete the same batteries for service again in 1879, it required 244 more men. The drain, therefore, on the rear batteries during one year alone amounted to 349 men, which is equal to the strength of two batteries. To complete I.C. Royal Horse Artillery in the field, for the period of the war, lasting eight months 42 men and 44 horses were required; for the second period, lasting five months, 41 men and 46 horses were required; or, in the whole period of 16 months, from the time they were warned for service in 1878 until their recall in 1880, they expended 83 men and 90 horses, which was more than half their original strength."

The Commander-in-Chief added to his Minutes these words—

"The advantage of Horse Artillery consists in its mobility, which enables it to act with Cavalry. Field Artillery is less mobile and to substitute it for Horse Artillery would be either to deprive the Cavalry of its guns, or to reduce its mobility to that of a Field Artillery, the rôle of which is to work with Infantry; and also it appears to me that by looking too much to the saving that might be effected in the time of peace, the necessity of being prepared for war has, as regards this branch, been lost sight of."

It is fully recognized abroad that—

"Horse Artillery must be trained and kept ready; it is too late to make them when war begins."

Mounted Infantry, and much that is most useful, you can improvise. Since the Mutiny, no Horse Artillery in India are manned by Native Artillerymen; consequently, the Horse Artillery batteries are completely dependent on the Home Establishment for Reserves. The Indian Government keep, at its own expense, two small depôts in England, consisting of recruits intended to replace annual reliefs in India of men discharged and invalided, and a certain number of old horses, and old guns, for training purposes only. The whole of the Horse Artillery throughout Her Majesty's Dominions would be dependent, in case of necessity, on the breaking up of the First Army Corps to fill up any casualty that might occur. The Secretary of State for War has stated that he would not place a responsibility on the House that he should himself bear. That responsibility on this occasion is indeed most onerous. The responsibility of deducting so seriously from the efficiency of the arm, most difficult to establish, and of such eminent importance in war; and this responsibility he must take in direct opposition to those officers who have had immense experience in organization and in war, and who have commanded our largest Armies, in opposition to the opinion of officers of high standing in the Continental and English Armies—in opposition to statistics which prove distinctly that the whole fabric of the First Army Corps must fall to pieces if this reduction is persisted in. One question must strike all thinking men. What is this First Army Corps?—for 12 years a paper Army, only to be found in the Army List—it cannot exist in substance—it must be but a shadow of the substance; for instance, one regiment of Cavalry that helps to form it has, out of an Establishment of 400 horses, 82 three year-old, and 48 four year-old, and 30 wanting to complete. I may here say that one battery of Horse Artillery has, during the past year, been raised, at considerable expense, to the First Army Corps' strength. It is now complete with men and horses, and the latest equipment throughout. The battery is to be reduced at once, or converted into something else. Does this seem to be wisdom? Thanking the House for the indulgence extended to me, permit me to say that it has been my duty, for several years, in India and at home, to instruct Horse Artillery and Cavalry combined; also that I have witnessed Horse Artillery so enfeebled and reduced by the casualties of a campaign and climate that it could hardly reply to the enemy's fire. I feel sure that it is the wish of Englishmen that troops in front of campaigns may be sustained in a way worthy of England.

No doubt, the proposed reduction of so many distinguished batteries is a source of bitter disappointment to officers, non-commissioned officers, and men. Famous batteries are to be obliterated, for a time at least. Who's heart has not thrilled at the story of the deeds of the Rocket Troop—the only English force at Leipsic—the Battle of the Nations! where 80,000 men were killed—and of the glorious history of the Royal Artillery, which splendid corps has won the motto that stands pre-eminent amidst all trophies—"Ubique." On this I will not further enlarge. I have avoided all thought of sentiment. I represent the case solely on practical grounds. In the interests of the nation and of the Army, I do earnestly entreat the Secretary of State for War to relinquish this scheme. As to the question of expenditure. In the recent five years, under my command were some 50 batteries and battalions, and it has been my duty to inspect every regiment of Cavalry at home, and my knowledge of soldiers tells me that there is no wish that the expenditure of public money on the Army should be increased; but that there is a very deepfelt anxiety that waste and extravagance should be put a stop to, that the money should be well spent, and that sudden and reckless blows should not be struck at any branch of the Service which, hitherto, it has been accounted necessary to maintain in the highest state of efficiency. In the next campaign on the Continent, that an English Army may be engaged in, may the Commander, by consummate skill, paralyze his enemy by gaining his flank, by cutting off his communications; then, indeed, will the bloodshed be comparatively small, and most assuredly in succeeding in that grand aim, Cavalry and Horse Artillery, with its mobility and speed, will prove itself to be that Commander's best weapon and England's truest friend.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.) said, he hailed with the greatest pleasure the appearance for the first time of a lucid statement, which afforded some promise of a consecutive and well-thought-out scheme of organization in our Army. He hoped that it might be found to combine efficiency with economy, and with those strong military features to which previous speakers had referred. While he said this, however, he concurred in the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Lambeth (General Fraser), who had stated the case against reduction of the Royal Horse Artillery. He should like, however, to put the case even more strongly, and to say that he believed no possible economy which could be attempted would lead to greater extravagance or waste in the end than this economy which had been palmed off on the Secretary of State for War. He was at a loss to conceive who were the military advisers of the right hon. Gentleman. He was almost inclined to think that some of the right hon. Gentleman's advisers had been attempting to play a practical joke upon him; but it was a joke which would not be likely to be successful, when the right hon. Gentleman had held the reins of Office for 12 months more. If there was any real military weight at the back of the right hon. Gentleman's opinion, where was it to be found? Who was the military originator of the scheme? Certainly not the Adjutant General (Viscount Wolseley), who was opposed to it, and there was the strongest possible condemnation of it by Lord Napier, whose authority stood only second to, and whose experience was in some respects more varied than, General Wolseley's. But it was not only in regard to the Home service that he objected. He contended that it was a veritable breach of faith in regard to our Army in India, and of the contract entered into with the Indian Government in 1879-80. This reduction was unwise, not only as regarded the Army at home, but as regarded the possibilities of augmentation in case of war in Europe, and the possibility of our having considerably to reinforce our military forces in India. To his mind, the proposed economy resembled the economy which would be practised by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, if he were to take his best case of Sunday razors and apply them to the cutting of paving stones. He could not conceive any greater waste or misapplication of money than that which would eventually be caused by replacing the Horse Artillery, a splendid arm of the service, which they were now destroying for no purpose whatever. He recognized the necessity that we should have two Army Corps, capable of being placed in the field at short notice, instead of one; and in this connection he supported the Secretary of State for War in that augmentation. But he trusted, before the debate closed, the House would have an indication from the right hon. Gentleman that he reserved an open mind on the question of reducing the Horse Artillery, and that he would reconsider the subject before the Estimates were finally passed. As an instance of the importance of Horse Artillery at certain critical moments, he would refer to an illustration partly used by the hon. and gallant Member opposite. The battle of Sobraon had been referred to, an action in which the regiment in which he had the honour to serve had taken a leading part (the 10th Foot). The battle was fought on February 10, 1846. In the course of the fight 12 guns in all of Horse Artillery were brought into play at a critical moment of the action on the 1,000 of Sikhs then swarming across the river, and, by their aid, the neck of the Sikh army was practically broken in less than twelve minutes. He could also cite, as further examples of the immense importance of the services of Horse Artillery at critical moments in action, the case of the battle between the French and the Germans at Gravelotte, where he was a personal spectator of the scene, and also the experience of a battle fought by Lord Wolseley in Egypt, at Masammah, on the 24th August, 1882. He turned next to a most important question connected with the popularity of recruiting. As a magistrate of two counties he had observed that there could be no more deplorable position than that of soldiers passed into the Reserve, who were often obliged to go about the country like beggars, unable to find the means of obtaining a decent livelihood. Something, he urged, ought to be done to prevent men who had served the Government in a military capacity from becoming reduced when they passed into civil life into the condition of waifs and tramps, who had frequently to ask for charity because they could not procure suitable civil employment. If some prospect of occupation in civil life could be held out to those men it would be of very great advantage to the Army and its recruiting, and also to the employers of labour, who, if they knew that all the men were not liable to be taken away from them at short notice, would not, as they did now, think the Reserve men were a class who ought to be avoided like a pestilence. That was a matter in which he was sure that all economists might concur, and he hailed with satisfaction the opportunity which the right hon. Gentleman held out to him of having that important subject discussed fully when the Vote for the Reserve was brought forward. With regard to the details which had been placed before them by the right hon. Gentleman, they were not only useful in the highest degree, but they were put forward in a manner which offered every assurance that the right hon. Gentleman was entering on a career of usefulness which would correspond to the high promise that he had given in the offices of State which he had hitherto filled. It was a distinct advantage that he had now laid before them an organized military system and the prospect of organizing two Army Corps instead of one, and that the line of communications of the two Army Corps would also be looked to. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman should not see his way to taking steps for the improvement of the organization of the Cavalry. Since 1875 our Cavalry organization had been truly declared to be the most wretched and unsystematic in the world; and no greater field of usefulness was still open to the right hon. Gentleman than that of giving a methodic organization to our Cavalry, both at home and in India, which, as to both horses, men, and officers, were second to none in the world. He did not think they could find in Great Britain one regiment, and not half-a-dozen in India, which they would send into the field at the present moment with a strength of 600 effective men and 600 effective horses. There was another subject which an hon. and gallant Member had touched upon, that of Mounted Infantry. He was very much disappointed that no mention was made of that arm of the service, which used once to be sneered at by the Cavalry, but was now acknowledged by them to be their best assistant. Lord Wolseley had always said that our Cavalry was so very expensive, and in such small numbers, that we could not spare a single horse for Mounted Infantry. But he had advanced the opinion that Mounted Infantry could be improvised whenever a campaign took place. Upon that subject he (Sir Henry

Sir Henry Havelock-Allen

Havelock-Allan) begged most respectfully to disagree with the noble General, who formed his opinion in 1882, when we had the nucleus of a good Mounted Infantry which had gone through the two Zulu campaigns of 1879 and 1880. He understood that a proposition for teaching men of the Infantry some part of Cavalry duty—about 50 in each battalion—set on foot by the hon. and gallant Member for South Hampshire (Sir Frederick FitzWygram) had been again submitting this year in the South-Eastern Division by Sir Baker Russell, and especially at the camp at Shorncliffe, and that it had been rejected because it would cost the paltry sum of £5,000. If they could form a permanent nucleus of Mounted Infantry of only 10 or 12 squadrons which could be supplemented when necessary, it would be worth, not £5,000, but £10,000 or £12,000 a-year to the country as an adjunct to the Cavalry. There was one other subject upon which he would like to touch, although as a regular soldier it might be considered impertinent on his part; but he knew that many Volunteer Colonels were very much interested in the matter, and that must be his excuse in mentioning it. A Committee had sat on the particular mode in which it might be desirable to increase the Capitation Grant to the Volunteers. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had seen his way to increase the Grant of 30s. to 35s. all round, but he himself agreed with those Volunteer officers who said they would rather have the 35s. differently distributed. The present system went very hardly with those men who were bound to shoot out of the third class before they could earn any grant at all. He believed there had been a very strong feeling expressed that, with all the desire which the right hon. Gentleman undoubtedly had shown of encouraging the efficiency of the Volunteers by giving them a larger money grant; still that grant had been made in a way which did not entirely meet their wishes and requirements, and they asked for a reconsideration of the matter. If, instead of there being one grant of 30s. and one of 35s., there were one grant altogether, and there were a relaxation of the stringency of the rules relating to musketry for two years—after that he would like to see them more stringent—the efficiency of the whole body would be much increased.

To revert to the civil employment of reserved soldiers, he trusted he might not be mistaken in supposing that the right hon. Gentleman intended to give him an opportunity of discussing at the proper time that important question. He took it for granted that when the right hon. Gentleman had further considered the matter he would give him a Committee on that subject, for he thought that would commend itself to everyone who desired economy and who wished to promote the efficiency of the Army.

CAPTAIN COTTON (Cheshire, Wirral) said, he hoped the House would allow him, as an Artillery Officer who had served in both the Royal Horse Artillery and the Field Batteries, to state his opinion on the proposed conversion and reduction of the Royal Horse Artillery. He congratulated the Government on the new departure which they had taken in endeavouring to render effective the paper system which had hitherto existed, of forming two Army Corps for our home Army, and of placing them on such a footing that they should be fit for immediate service. They all remembered that before the last Franco-German War Marshal Le Bœuf in 1870, told the Emperor Napoleon that the Army of France was complete in all its details, down to the very last button on the soldiers' gaiters. No doubt the buttons were there, but no one could place their hands on them when they were wanted, and that was very much the case with some matters in our Army. He rejoiced to think that the Government had realized the grave evils which existed, and were endeavouring to remedy them. But as an Artillery Officer, he could not be silent on the proposed conversion of the Royal Horse Artillery. As he understood it, the Secretary of State for War stated that, as there was a deficiency in our Field Batteries, in order to compensate for that deficiency without increasing the expenditure, he wished to convert certain Horse Artillery batteries, of which he had a surplus, to provide for the want of Field Artillery. That was an intelligible proposition enough, but he would reply with two others; first, that the Horse Artillery was a corps d'élite, one on which the greatest care and discipline was lavished, so that it was the most difficult branch of the Army to reconstitute. The next proposition was that if they reduced the Horse Artillery batteries to a minimum, the time must inevitably come on active service when they would have to call on the Field Batteries to undertake the duties of the Horse Artillery; and that, he maintained, they were quite unable and unsuited to perform. Many nations were not decreasing, but strengthening their Horse Artillery. Belgium was doing so, and also Italy; while he had good authority for stating that Spain would be glad to do the same, could she afford it. While he did not believe we intended to go to war with anyone, he would ask whether, if we were to have an Army at all, this was a time to mutilate and cripple one of its most important branches? He quite admitted they would have a sufficient number of guns in comparison with those of foreign nations; but the First Army Corps was supposed to be thoroughly equipped and ready for service at a moment's notice. If that was not so, then the whole raison d'être of the new scheme went away. With the First Army Corps they were to have five Horse Artillery batteries, with six guns each; but the batteries were not complete. They had no ammunition wagons. At the moment they were needed for service the Horse Artillery batteries would have to be put up to the war strength at once. Now the present full strength of a Horse Artillery battery was 104 horses, but the war strength was 168 horses; so that before we could embark a single man on active service we should have to increase these five batteries by 64 horses each—total 320. The only way we could get these horses would be by denuding the Second Army Corps of its horses. That was a very important point, and worthy of careful consideration. Then the men of the Horse Artillery were specially selected, not only on enlistment, but also on transfer from the rest of the Artillery. Therefore, considering what the Horse Artillery was, what it cost us to keep up, and the care there was to maintain it as an efficient force, it was evident it would be a work of the greatest difficulty to reconstitute it if once disestablished. Then there was the privilege of slightly higher pay, which the Horse Artillerymen enjoyed, and he thought that the loss of even 1s. per week would not be looked upon by the men with favour, especially by those who were married, while it would have a doubtful effect on the recruiting. With regard to the proportion of field guns per 1,000 men, it was already less with us than it was with some of the foreign nations. Russia had always had a strong force of Artillery; Germany had a little over 3 per 1,000; the French had 3½, while we had under 3 per 1,000. These figures were only at the commencement of a campaign; but very often circumstances occurred in campaigns when the Field Artillery in places had to be very largely increased. When the German Army invested Paris in 1871, the number of Field Artillery guns was increased to 4 per 1,000; in Prince Frederick's campaign it was also increased to 4 per 1,000. Then, if occasion did occur when it was necessary to largely increase your Field Artillery generally, it is quite conceivable that occasions might also occur when there would arise an increased demand for Horse Artillery in particular. They were told that under the circumstances of modern warfare it was not very often necessary to change the position of Artillery, and therefore the Horse Artillery were not of so much use as they were formerly. He disputed that altogether. With a small active Army like ours they ought to use all the mechanical means in their power to strengthen it in every respect. They must have a very large number of guns, which should be able, not only to carry out the ordinary duties of Field Batteries, but, when required, to take up new positions with the greatest possible amount of mobility and celerity. This could only be done by Horse Artillery. It was an arm of the service which, as was said to him the other day, had to ride 25 miles to covert before it began its day's hunting. With the inferior breeding of the horses, the severe work they had to do would most surely tell on the Field Batteries. This would happen—either the men would have to dismount when going up hills, and they would arrive at the scene of action thoroughly exhausted, or there would be no gunners at all. It seemed to him quite impossible that Field Batteries could ever be a complete substitute for Horse Artillery. The Secretary of State would be better advised if he had drawn his information on this subject from practical Horse Artillery and Cavalry officers. Especially he would ask the House, before he sat down, not to be misled on this subject by what had been said in "another place" by the Under Secretary of State for War, that, as regarded the Artillery, there was not, taking the whole force, a reduction, but an increase; that there was a reduction in field and horse, but a considerable increase in the garrison artillery. Why, it might just as well be said that there was no reduction of the Cavalry and Infantry of the Line if you took 500 men from them and added the same number to the Marine Artillery. Under all these circumstances he would ask the Secretary of State for War if he could not see his way to reconsider the question of the conversion of these batteries of Horse Artillery. There was one battery which had a glorious history, which had played a glorious part in covering the retreat at Maiwand and prevented it being a rout; and he would ask the Secretary of State to pause and see if he could save it from being entirely expunged from the Army List.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR (Kincardine) said, he must express his acknowledgments to the Secretary for War for the excellent Memorandum which had accompanied the Army Estimates this year, and hoped its publication would be an annual one. Satisfactory as the Explanatory Statement was in many of its details, especially in regard to clearly showing the large sum borne by the Army Estimates for the cost of stores for the Navy; there was one reference to the cost of the Artillery batteries which appeared meagre, for it failed to afford any information about the relative charge for Horse and Field Artillery, and yet advocated economy by breaking up Horse Artillery Batteries, in order to raise up more Field Batteries. He could not but wonder at the partial attempt which the War Office had made to effect economy by reducing the Horse Artillery by five Batteries and replacing them by Field Batteries. He was no admirer of an undue proportion of Horse Artillery; but he thought it would be better for the Secretary for War, if he desired to effect economy by changes of organization, to look in other directions for better results. We had undertaken the defence of India, and to supply that country with a sufficient force of Artillery; but he had no hesitation in saying that the Artillery Establishment in India was entirely below what it should be. At present we supplied India with 11 batteries of Horse Artillery and 42 of Field, in all 318 guns, giving about three guns to 2,000 Infantry and Cavalry; a proportion far below the number which the most experienced General agreed on as necessary—the Horse Artillery guns, 66 in number, being far less than the number needed for our Indian Cavalry. He thought the House was entitled to ask that the views of those who had advised the Secretary for War to make this reduction should be published, and that proof should be given as to whether higher economies had been advised in other branches of the Service. Those who had studied the organization of the Cavalry and Infantry could point to large economies being possible in those two arms. For instance, the Household Cavalry of three regiments and 24 troops, comprising only 950 privates, could be converted into one regiment of six squadrons of 120 effective privates in each; the surplus 200 privates being told off into band, acting non-commissioned and employed men. So also with regard to the Cavalry of the Line, consisting of 28 regiments formed into 224 troops, and having about 13,000 privates; these might be formed into 60 squadrons of 150 effective privates each, leaving 4,000 surplus privates for band, employed, recruits, lance-corporals, and thereby needing only 15 regimental cadres, each of four squadrons. With regard to the Infantry of the Line, consisting of 141 battalions of 1,410 companies and 94,500 privates, this strength could only yield about 70,000 effective privates, after deducting band, recruits, lance-corporals, non-commissioned colour guard, pioneers, employed. This effective number could be formed into 600 companies of 120 privates each, and requiring about 100 cadres for battalions of six companies each. These were economies on an effective scale, which might, on money considerations, be enforced with a far more useful end than that resulting from the abolition of 30 fully-equipped Horse Artillery guns, of such good organization as could not be equalled on the Continent.

SIR FREDERICK FITZWYGRAM (Hants, Fareham) said, that the question of the Horse Artillery had been very fully discussed that evening, and he wished merely to refer to one particular point which he thought had not been sufficiently pressed. There were two distinct uses for Horse Artillery; in the first place to accompany Cavalry, and in the second place to act as a reserve to be sent to any point which might be pressed in an unforeseen manner. With regard merely to its first use, no doubt the proposed organization was sufficient; but as regarded the second, which was becoming of more consequence every day, he thought that it was utterly insufficient. In former days the range of muskets was small, and battalions were drawn up in close order, so that the line of fire was concentrated, and the amount of ground covered was, comparatively speaking, restricted. Now, on the contrary, in a great battle the troops covered three, four, or five miles. The Horse Artillery was with the attack, and the Field Artillery with the Generals commanding the different divisions. On a sudden attack upon any vital point it would be impossible to get up the Field Artillery in time. If the General commanding the division had to send Artillery to a point two miles and a half off, with the détour behind the troops which would be necessary, it would take Field Artillery an hour before it could get to the spot, whereas Horse Artillery could get there in 20 minutes. For this reason he thought that it was absolutely necessary to maintain the strength and efficiency of the Horse Artillery. Another point connected with the Artillery which he wished to bring before the House was the organization of the regiment of Artillery. He had not a word to say against the Artillery; on the contrary, it was a credit to itself and to the nation; but he had for a long time past thought that its organization was not as good as it might be. It was a very large regiment, and ought really to be divided into two corps, one concerned with field duties, whether Horse or Field Artillery, and the other having to do with garrison guns. These two duties were now totally different. In former days there had not been this marked distinction; there was only one form of gun, which was a smooth bore; the mechanical portion of the gun was the same; and the largest was a 68-pounder, the Horse Artillery being armed with a 6-pounder. Now, however, the two classes of guns were very distinct from one another; there was the small class of gun used by the mounted branch of the Artillery, and the enormous gun, the mechanism of which required a life of study to understand it. In spite of this, all officers of Artillery were placed in one corps, and went from one duty to another. This system was not good training for the officers, and the result was sometimes that the square man was put in the round hole. This did not conduce to the best interests of the Service, and he thought that the organization ought to be such as to avoid this evil. He would, perhaps, be told that the system was an advantage in allowing a certain amount of exchange; that those who were fond of riding and field sports, and were quick in the eye, could go into the mounted, and those who were interested in science and mechanics into the mechanical branch of the Artillery. He admitted that, and his suggestion would be that the Artillery should be maintained as a general corps as regarded subalterns; but that on obtaining his captaincy an officer should be placed, according as it seemed best to his superiors, either in the mounted or in the dismounted branch of the Service. With regard to the question of the Cavalry, his opinion was that we had too many regiments in our Cavalry, with the result that they were all weak and therefore ineffective. If there was one force that ought to be kept up to its full war strength more than another it was Cavalry, because it was a force that it was very difficult to organize in a hurry. It was true that they had Cavalry reserve men, but it was his experience that when they were in the reserve very many of the men never got outside of a horse, although some, no doubt, might be employed in stable work. The consequence was that after three or four years they were not fit to come back and take their place in a regiment which was ordered for service at short notice. He thought, therefore, that every Cavalry regiment ought to be kept at all times up to its full war strength, and also that every regiment should be of the same strength. He objected to having weak regiments in the second or third line for this reason—that when they augmented the regiments of the first line they ought to be fit for active service; whereas, as a matter of fact, there were generally about 120 young men not trained and 100 recently bought horses. This had come under his notice especially in the case of the 19th Hussars when they went out to Egypt in 1882. In his opinion every Cavalry regiment ought to consist of five squadrons—four for active service and one to form a dépôt. In every troop and every squadron there were a certain amount of untrained men, and a certain number of men unfit for embarkation on the day, and under the present system it was necessary to draw upon other regiments; and the same was the case with regard to the horses. This was an evil which ought to be avoided, and if they had a fifth squadron it ought to be able to supply the complement of horses and men for service. He would probably be asked, "Where are you going to get the money for this augmentation?" He believed that they had too many regiments and too weak regiments of Cavalry; they had 17 regiments at home and one in Egypt. To add a fifth squadron would involve great expense. He ventured to suggest, however unpopular it might be to his brother officers, that it was absolutely necessary to reduce the three junior regiments. If they did so they would get four squadrons towards the 15 which would be needed to supplement and make efficient the other regiments; and when they had reduced the regiments, the staff, and officers, they might readily get the money to furnish each of the remaining regiments with the extra squadrons which he believed to be absolutely necessary for the efficiency of the Cavalry Service. With regard to the question of the age of the horses, his experience was that, though it was not desirable to get four-year-olds, yet they would do a fair amount of work, and would go fairly well through a campaign. He, therefore, saw no objection to four-year-old horses in the Army. Perhaps a more serious matter in this connection was that owing to the small percentage of horses allowed to be cast in each year we were obliged to keep every horse materially sound up to 18 years of age, and yet it had been declared that no horse over 14 years of age was to go on foreign service. To keep horses over 14 years unfit for foreign service was an absurdity and a fraud on the nation. The nation believed that it had 7,500 Cavalry horses, while he knew that a certain proportion, probably 1,000, were too old to go on foreign service. We had given up the system of keeping old soldiers unfit for foreign service; surely the same rule ought to apply in regard to horses. An old soldier might teach the lads habits of sobriety and order, but he failed to see that any such virtues could be imparted by an old horse that was not allowed to go abroad. A good deal had been said lately about the supply of horses in this country; but his own belief was that the supply was fully equal to the ordinary demand, but it was contrary to common sense to suppose that breeders would breed more than the trade and the commerce of the country and the usual demands of the Military Service would absorb. He believed the number of horses in the country, roughly speaking, was 3,000,000, and 500,000 in Ireland. It would, he suggested, be a useful thing if the Secretary of State would cause the police to send in a return of the actual numbers. There were probably 2,000,000 agricultural horses, of which, after making allowances for the horses that were too heavy, and for those under four years and the number over 14 years, he calculated there were about 250,000 of proper age and about a suitable size for military service. How many of these were sufficiently sound? Colonel Ravenhill, an experienced officer, thought that not above one in ten would be sufficiently sound for military purposes; but taking one in five as a fairer number, that would leave about 50,000 agricultural horses available. Again, 1,000,000 horses were employed in the ordinary trade of the country and among private owners; and of these, making similar deductions as before, about 35,000 would be available for purposes of war. Adding these 35,000 to 50,000 agricultural horses, there may be 90,000 to 100,000 horses suitable for Army purposes in this country. How many would owners be willing to sell? Few men keep more horses than they really required; possibly they might sell 10 per cent—i.e., 10,000; add 5,000 in hands of dealers—total 15,000. No horses are of any use for an immediate campaign except horses in actual work. How many horses did we want? It was calculated that each Army Corps wanted 12,500; two Army Corps would want 25,000. Twenty-five thousand horses were wanted, and for use in campaign probably another 10,000, or 35,000 horses in all. Where, then, were the rest to come from? This was a serious question. There were various means by which the authorities might get the horses. They might take the horses by conscription, but he did not think the nation would listen to such a proposal. They might persuade the nation to keep 20,000 always up in case of war, but he did not think the nation could be persuaded easily to adopt such a plan. They might have a register of horses, but he did not believe in that proposal. Then they might resort to foreign markets. Hon. Members, no doubt, had lately read glowing accounts as to the number of horses to be had in foreign markets. His own impression was that those estimates were entirely fallacious. He did not believe that there existed, either in this or in any foreign country, a surplus of horses above what the trade and commerce of that country required. In 1880 a committee of gentlemen came from Hungary and offered the Government 10,000 horses, to be landed at the London Docks. He advised the Secretary of State for War to accept the offer. The Secretary of State for War sent several gentlemen of experience to Hungary, where they stayed six or seven weeks, with orders to buy 800 horses. They came back with 420 horses only, and of this number very few came up to the promised height of 15·2. Most of them were under 15·1, a large number were only 15 hands, and some only 14·2. More recently the Secretary of State for War sent a small committee to Canada to see what that country could do in the way of horse supply. The result had been what he anticipated. While they could buy horses straight from the ranche, they came back with only 50 horses of a suitable size and age accustomed to bit and bridle. With the view of increasing the number of horses, various schemes had been suggested for horse breeding. He did not believe that any scheme would produce a greater number than the trade of the country could absorb; and, in his opinion, there was no more fatal scheme than that of stopping the export trade. It was also proposed to place stallions throughout the country; but he doubted whether the Government could supply the number of sires necessary for horse breeding. He admitted that, to a certain degree, Government stallions might improve the breed of the horses of the country; but he denied that they would increase the number of horses in the country. There was one particular class of horse diminishing in this country essential for Cavalry purposes, and this was the riding horse. In former days every farmer rode to market; but now, owing to the improvement in communication and other causes, perhaps 20 or 30 farmers rode to market in the district with which he was familiar, where formerly there used to be 200 or 300. The result was that the number of riding horses was sensibly decreasing. Ireland was the country they had to look to for mounting our Cavalry, and he thought it might be advisable to station Government stallions in districts throughout that country. Last year he brought before the notice of the Secretary of State for War the subject of Mounted Infantry. The use of this force was increasing every day, and its importance was being recognized. In his judgment, there was no collision in the slightest degree between the Cavalry and the Mounted Infantry. The great distinction between the two forces was this—the Cavalry soldier fought on horseback, and his horse was his primary weapon; the Mounted Infantry soldier used his horse only as a means of transport to reach a particular point, where he dismounted and fought with his rifle like a foot soldier. Last year he suggested that bodies of 30 Infantry soldiers should be sent, after the drill season was over, to the nearest Cavalry barracks to be instructed in mounted duties, and to stay there from about the 15th of October to the week before Christmas, and that after Christmas a second batch of 30 men should be sent. In that way 60 men would be instructed in their duties during the year at very little expense. He was aware that a scheme had been started to set up a Mounted Infantry school at Aldershot; but to carry it out would involve the getting and keep of horses for the purpose. In the scheme he had suggested this would not be necessary, because at this particular period of the year spare horses were always available in Cavalry barracks. He did not think the Cavalry regiments would raise the slightest opposition to such a scheme. He also commended the position of the pioneers to the attention of the Secretary of State for War. He asked the Secretary of State for War for one favour—namely, that he would give the new rank of major to the senior riding-master in the Army. He thought the regimental riding-masters were an excellent class of hardworking men, who had a claim to one of the honours of the blue riband, which was bestowed by new warrant on the Department.

Sir Frederick Fitzwygram

Sir Fred-ric Fitzcragram

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.) said, that that was the first occasion on which they had had before them, in anticipation of the discussion of the Army Estimates, a Memorandum prepared by the Secretary of State, and thought every hon. Member must fully appreciate the advantage of having such a paper instead of the general statement hitherto usually made orally by the Minister for the Department at a late hour of the night. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman, not only on being the first to have that opportunity, but also on the eminent ability, clearness, and completeness of the paper that he had laid before them. At the same time, he thought there were some points in the paper to which exception might be taken. The earlier portion of it was framed on this principle—the right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to analyze the general bulk of the Estimates, and he resolved them into three parts—namely, the personnel, the administrative portion, and those Votes which dealt with supplies, and he founded on that the argument that after all the amount of money on which saving could be effected or to which economical administration could be applied was but small; because, if they maintained an army of a certain strength, the men must be fed, clothed, housed, and so forth, and somehow administered, and it was not until they came to the supply of warlike stores and the erection of buildings that there was any great field for economy. Now, he ventured to think that there was a fallacy underlying that argument. In the first place, among the charges for personnel there were many matters which were the most proper subjects of all for economical administration. He did not speak only of the organization of the Army itself, which surely might be either costly or cheap; but such subjects as clothing, rations, fuel and light, transport, equipment, ammunition, barracks, barrack-stores, and others were sources of expenditure of a very elastic kind; and might either be managed economically or extravagantly according as the Minister and his assistants were frugal or careless. And even when they came to the particular division in which the right hon. Gentleman implied that the cost of the Army might be most easily diminished—namely, the supply of stores, he said very rightly that they had committed themselves to many great lines of expenditure and had entered on certain undertakings, and that it was desirable that there should be no interruption in them. But even there they might often be misled by phrases, and it is possible to proceed a little too fast or too far even on those lines of expenditure which were thoroughly good. The right hon. Gentleman said it was notorious that reductions of Army expenditure had largely been effected in past years by drawing on their reserves of stores. He was not aware to what the right hon. Gentleman referred, or whether he could give any instance or any proof of the assertion he had made. He knew it was often made; but he could not help thinking there was a considerable danger of real extravagance in the very opposite course, and that if they had too large a reserve of stores it was more extravagant than letting them rather run down to some extent. There were stores and stores; some stores could not be improvised, and required time to manufacture; but there were others of which the pattern was often changing, which were of perishable material, and which could be procured in this country without any long delay; and there was a danger, if the doctrine were accepted that they must always keep a large reserve of stores, of excessive expenditure being incurred in that direction without any corresponding benefit to the country. He did not at all imply that that was done in these Estimates; but when a principle was laid down as it was in that Paper it would be well to bear in mind that there was a corresponding danger in the very opposite direction. With respect to the particular scheme of expenditure under Vote 12 he had not much to say. No one knew better than he did the dreadful amount that was claimed from the War Office year after year for the new armament of the Army and Navy, both heavy guns and small arms. They had embarked on it, and they must go on with it; but what he should like to say was that as much reluctance as was reasonable should be shown in adding new expenditure while they were still under the obligation to continue the old. Last year, when he came into Office with his hon. Friend near him, they found, as all the world knew, that they were engaged in the terribly costly undertaking of re-arming the Navy and also of supplying the Army with large guns of a new type. They had also begun the manufacture of the new field gun, which he believed was the most excellent weapon that any Field Artillery in Europe possessed, and which ought to be pushed on as quickly as possible. But they found also that a beginning had been made with a new rifle which was to take the place of the Martini-Henry. The new pattern had been approved; an enormous extension had been given to Enfield Manufactory out of the Vote of Credit at the end of 1885. Those extensions were not yet completed; and preparation was being made for going on at high pressure with the manufacture of the new rifle. Now that new rifle was only to be a little better than the Martini-Henry, and he must say that the very first decision they came to was that if possible that expenditure should either be stopped or abated in speed, while they had the other things in hand. It seemed to them that it was desirable to slacken the rate of production of that rifle. They were exposed to blame and odium on that account; but afterwards it was found out that the pattern was not the best; and it had only just been determined to substitute a new magazine rifle, against which he had nothing to say. This was an illustration of the desirability of sometimes being slow and hesitating to embark on a new enterprise. It was said it was intended to produce 25,000 magazine rifles this year; but he understood the pattern was not yet approved; and if that were so he would ask whether it would not be wise to be somewhat slow in commencing the manufacture? Even after a pattern had been approved, especially if it had been approved in a hurry, it was not expedient to be precipitate in embarking upon such an undertaking and committing the country to a very large expenditure. It was certain that the Vote for warlike stores reached a huge amount, and it had increased rapidly of late years. In 1884-5 it was £1,250,000; and it had sprung up pretty regularly until it now reached nearly £3,000,000, not to speak of a large sum spent on this service out of the Vote of Credit. This would show how costly all this business was; but the sums involved were so large, and had such a faculty of expanding from year to year, that he trusted some assurance would be given that the limit of the present Estimate would not be exceeded in another year. Last year he consented, in the Estimates he laid before Parliament, to an increase on the previous year of £340,000; and this year there was a further increase of £374,000. It might be necessary; but the amount must be dangerously near the limit beyond which it was impossible for military expenditure to go. Indeed, some thought it was far exceeded now. We might well consider we had reached the highest level, and that it was not to be exceeded another year. He should not say much about the Establishment of the Army; and he certainly was not prepared to give any opinion of his own on the very vexed question of the reduction of the Horse Artillery, though his prejudices would be rather in favour of that step. As to the general scheme of mobilization, he admitted that it had many advantages, and it was more than a paper scheme. It was well we should have some standard up to which we should move, some point at which to stop, but the scheme ought not to be too pedantically applied. An Army Corps was arranged for regular Continental warfare, with which we had little likelihood of having anything to do. We were mostly concerned with irregular wars; and it was quite possible that although this might be a most symmetrical and, theoretically, perfect arrangement, yet, for the purposes of our smaller wars, more of one particular arm than another might be required. Therefore, he regarded with some suspicion, as a little too austere—a little too pedantic and theoretical—any idea of fixing ourselves to a particular organization of one, or two, or three Corps d'Armée. But it would have the advantage of giving us some solid standing ground on which we could rest, and in that sense there was no harm in looking upon it as a practically efficient organization. The right hon. Gentleman, in the Paper which had been issued, referred to the promotion and retirement of officers. The Warrant issued at the end of the year had done a great deal to remove the serious grievance of men being obliged to retire into private life when they were perfectly fit for their duties. Before he left Office he had carefully considered this intricate subject, and had approved the main provisions of that Warrant, which went as far as was practicable in the direction the House and the country desired to see followed. In the Warrant was introduced a principle in which he ventured to think was to be found the key to any just system of promotion, at all events, in the higher ranks—namely, that rank should not be given for the sake of rank itself, but should follow employment; that no man, for instance, should be a colonel who did not exercise the duties of colonel; and so of other ranks in the Army. That system had been applied in the Warrant to the rank of colonel, and it would be the means of preventing a state of confusion that would have been hideous to contemplate, because it had looked very much as if in the coming time we should run the risk of being taunted with having no officers but colonels in the Army. The result of the inquiries which he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) instituted last year regarding the Volunteer Force had been most satisfactory, and the War Office was now in possession of the fullest particulars not only as to the individual corps, but with regard to the Force as a whole. It seemed to him the proposals of the Committee as to the Capitation Grant, modified by the right hon. Gentleman, fairly met the necessities of the case. He thought, in making the considerable concession which he proposed, the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly justified in the two conditions which he had laid down—in the first place, that there should be some guarantee of increased efficiency in musketry, and some check upon, and inquiry into, the irregular expenditure on the part of Volunteer corps not recognized by the War Office. If that were done, and the additional money was granted in the way suggested, he made no doubt it would satisfy the legitimate requirements of the Volunteers; and the very fact that they had been treated in this generous way—at the same time putting a pretty tight check upon their expenditure—would have the best effect upon the organization and efficiency of the corps.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLETT (Rochester) said, it must be a great gratification to the Royal Artillery that their cause had been espoused by Members representing other arms of the Service. He considered the proposed reduction of the Royal Horse Artillery as a most dangerous step. It was proposed to strike out 12 guns from the Army, and to turn 18 guns from Horse into Field Artillery. In time of war practically a greater number would be struck out, as there would be ammunition columns wanted. In case of hostilities, the four guns of each battery were to become six; but were hon. Members aware of the great difficulty which would have to be met in making up the reduced batteries? He did not believe that those who had made the suggestion could know what it was they really proposed. They could not be aware of the trouble required to turn out a skilful driver. It took three or four years to make an efficient driver in the Horse Artillery. It would be very interesting to know where this idea of reducing the Horse Artillery had been started. He could not believe that His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief had suggested it, because he knew very well the value of the Horse Artillery. He did not believe that Lord Wolseley suggested it, for he had had practical experience of their value. He did not believe the Secretary of State for War had suggested it, for he had not had time to turn his mind in this direction; nor did he believe it originated with the Intelligence Department. He was constrained to the belief that some permanent official, perhaps anxious to win his spurs, first suggested the idea. The only grounds of justification for the reduction were, on the one hand, economy and expediency, and, on the other hand, the possibility of having more guns than the Army required. As to the first, he did not think that it would be true economy to reduce any branch of the Service; but it would be very bad economy to tamper with the Royal Artillery. There was a dark shadow hanging over Eastern Europe; would it be wise at such a time to reduce any branch of the Service? So much, then, for expediency. If the Government wished to enforce economy, let them begin by very considerably reducing the very heavy staff of civilians at the War Office. It was also said that we had more guns than we required. We had 162,000 men in England and the Colonies, and 136,000 Native troops—a total of 298,000 men. That, on the principle of three guns per 1,000 men, meant 894 guns. We had only 492 field guns, and 144 Horse Artillery, or a total of 636 guns. In France they had 1,938 guns, or an excess of 882. In Germany the proper number of guns to her Army was 1,116, but there were 2,040. The proper proportion for Russia was 2,076, but she had 2,178; and Austria, which ought to have 678 guns, had 1,540. The duty of the Horse Artillery was supposed to be to accompany Cavalry in the field. Its movements were very rapid. It had to dash from one part of the field to the other. A skilful General would hold his Horse Artillery in hand in order to launch it, and check a charge of the enemy's Cavalry. There were numerous instances in which the Royal Horse Artillery had not only done gallant service, but had actually saved the Army. During the Peninsula War Norman Ramsay, when surrounded by the enemy, at the head of his six guns—the "Chestnut" troop—crashed through the masses of the French Cavalry, who thought to take him prisoner. Nothing could have been more gallant than the way in which Major Slade saved his Battery of Horse Artillery at the Battle of Maiwand. He had had the honour of serving in that branch of Her Majesty's Forces himself, and he was sure that in the observations he had made he was merely expressing the thoughts of the officers and men of the whole British Army. He hoped, therefore, that grave consideration would be given to the matter before this proposal to reduce the Royal Horse Artillery was adopted. He trusted that the Secretary for War, in conjunction with His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, would, in consideration of the brilliant and faithful services of the Royal Horse Artillery, be able to give these five threatened batteries a fresh lease of life, and would thus furnish them with an opportunity of adding fresh laurels in the future to those which they had already won in the past.

Colonel Hughes-Hallett

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said, he wished to look at the Army Estimates, as a whole, from a civilian point of view. The first thing that struck the ordinary Member was that, although the Military Forces were reduced, the expenditure was increased. One of the most considerable items in the increase over the Estimates of last year was that of £46,000 under the head of Retired Pay. If there was one thing which had scandalized the public with regard to the Army Estimates more than another, it was the constant increase in the non-effective charges, and especially in the amount for Retired Pay. It must be recollected that these charges were incurred solely on account of the officers. This increase was the more marked as it was accompanied by a decreased charge for the men. It seemed almost as if everything in the Army was done for the benefit of the officers. Comparatively little was done for the men. The officer's widow received a pension; but the soldier's widow received nothing. There were many posts in the Civil Service which might well be filled by discharged soldiers, who found considerable difficulty in obtaining employment. In estimating the number of our Military Force very little reliance could be placed on Estimates, seeing that, although it was estimated last year that we were to have a Regular Army 177,000 strong, we had at no time more than 144,000. Again, as regarded the Militia, instead of having 141,000 men in training, we had only 108,000. He was glad to say that the story with regard to the Volunteers was a very different one. This country had every reason to be proud of its Volunteer Force, and he remembered that the more bitterly because his own people were not allowed to bear arms. He, however, could understand Englishmen taking an honest pride in the Volunteer movement, which formed one of the brightest pages in the history of their country. As to the Memorandum of the Secretary of State for War, the right hon. Gentleman had been so bold and so straightforward—not to say rash—in his admissions that he trusted there was a real reforming spirit behind them. At the same time, the hon. Gentleman had had a tale to tell. Thus, he had stated that this country could not hope to mobilize more than two Army Corps, and that we had not sufficient Field Artillery even for that force. Had he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) been the War Minister, he should have hesitated very much about reducing the Horse Artillery, and especially should he have refused to reduce the E Battery B Brigade, considering the antecedents of that battery. The Government should remember that it was more easy to reduce such a force than to re-establish it. He thought that an economy might be effected by causing riding practice to be done in camp. Arguments derived from the German and French Armies could not be considered applicable to our Army, the circumstances of which were wholly different. The German Army was completely territorialized. Every corps had its head-quarters, and knew exactly what it had to do. In France a similar system was carried out, though to a smaller extent. But the English Army was dispersed in India, abroad, and in our Colonies. There was one question which the right hon. Gentleman had boldly faced, and that was stores. Two or three years ago he complained that military stores were being depleted, in order to keep down the Vote. He had since heard that stores were sold for that purpose. The present War Minister had admitted the depletion of stores, and blamed indiscriminate reduction; but, besides depleted stores, he hoped the Secretary of State would tell them something about the quality of the stores. It was known that such things as picks and axes and other tools were very bad in quality, and it would be well that something should be said upon the subject. He had heard Lord Wolseley say that the axes issued to the troops serving under him in Canada were of no use except to amuse the inhabitants. Then the clothing of the men was made of material much inferior to that of the Italian, or French, or German Armies. The Transport Service also was in a most unsatisfactory condition, and had invariably broken down in every war in which we had been engaged since the days of Wellington. Regimental transport was particularly inefficient. Yet a great deal too much money was spent in this Department. It was a hobby of the War Office—of the civilian rather than the professional element there—that it was necessary to move every regiment every two or three years. If these movements were made less frequent, it would be possible to effect an economy of £40,000 or £50,000 a year. Then, with regard to mobilization, we were in a very backward condition. He would suggest that valuable practice might be afforded if notice were periodically given to the officers in command of military districts to mobilize within a given time the troops in their district to act against an imaginary enemy. In this way experience and facility might be obtained which would be of good service in case of war. He hoped, in conclusion, that the Secretary of State for War would persevere in a bold course; and, if he did so, the ideas of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Randolph Churchill) with regard to expenditure might be realized, and the nation get value for its money.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The course of the debate has, I think, illustrated very well the extreme difficulty of an unfortunate Secretary of State who endeavours to effect economies in our Military Expenditure. It has been extremely refreshing to hear to-night from some hon. Members speeches encouraging one to persevere in an honest attempt to reduce the expenditure of the Army, because, during the greater part of the evening, we have had speeches directly tending towards an immediate increase of expenditure. But I do not think that, even as to the reductions that have been proposed, hon. Members are themselves agreed. Hon. Members really are only agreed on two reductions; they think you can get rid of the Secretary of State for War if a civilian, and that you might largely reduce the cost of the administration of the Army at the War Office. I will not dwell on the latter point, because, as hon. Members know, a Royal Commission has been appointed to investigate that very subject, and if economy can be effected upon the recommendation of the Commissioners, no one will be more glad than myself to give effect to their views, if I should have the honour of continuing in the Office I now hold. The hon. Member for East Donegal (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) suggested, as another means of reducing expenditure, that we might more largely employ soldiers in civil situations. That suggestion has been frequently brought before this House, and has been accepted with the greatest cordiality by the War Office. Almost all the messengers at the War Office are at present old soldiers, and every exertion is being made by my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary (Mr. Brodriok) to extend the system outside the boundaries of the War Department. I hope the House will not suppose from these remarks that I disbelieve in the possibility of economy in the expenditure of the Army. On the contrary, my short experience at the War Office leads me to believe that economy can be effected, and that it can best be effected by this House arriving at a distinct knowledge of what it wants, and what it intends to keep as an Army. Let the House form a definite idea of the Army necessary for the defence of the country and of the Establishment necessary for the maintenance of that Army. Let it then vote liberally every shilling required to keep up that Establishment, and let it refuse to grant any demands that cannot be justified on that ground. The right hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), who spoke in very kind terms of some suggestions made in my Memorandum, alluded to the question of the reduction of stores. I ventured in the Memorandum to say that economy had often been effected by an undue reduction of stores; but I might have gone further and said that economy had been more than once produced by an absence of all stores. Military stores have been allowed to fall into a condition absolutely unjustifiable, and it has only been the fortunate accident of Votes of Credit that has enabled the War Office to get on at all. Now that is very unsatisfactory, and I hope the House will support me in the view expressed in my Memorandum, that it is essential that the necessary reserve of stores should be kept independently of every other consideration. In connection with the question of economy, the increase of charge for the retired pay of officers has been alluded to. That increase is certainly a very unfortunate fact; but the utmost has been done that could be done to reduce it. If the provisions of the Warrant issued when my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. H. Smith) was Secretary of State for War were carried into effect, it is to be hoped that, at least, a check will be put upon, if an absolute reduction is not ultimately effected in, that item. Now I will pass away from these minor points. I should like to thank the House for the reception that has been given to the Memorandum which I have put forward in explanation of the Army Estimates. It was produced under circumstances of considerable difficulty. I feel that if a Memorandum of this description is to be worth anything more than waste paper, the Secretary for War must be just as responsible for every word contained in it as if he had given utterance to it in his place in Parliament. In that spirit I endeavoured to approach its preparation, and I take the personal responsibility for every word it contains. It is not as complete as I would wish, I confess. But is almost impossible for any War Minister to say to the full extent what he should like to do. There are deficiencies which are obvious to himself, but which he is not in the present position to supply. My object in putting forward this Memorandum was threefold—to endeavour to let the country know what the available Forces of the country really are; to establish a standard towards which all our efforts from year to year ought to be directed, and which would assist Secretaries of State when proposing any necessary increase or preventing indiscriminate reduction; and it was my anxious desire that this House should endeavour to treat the defences of the country as a whole, looking at them from all points of view, and realizing that you cannot add to or take away from any portion of these defences without interfering with the general scheme. Unless you regard them as a whole you may spend a great deal of money without producing much efficiency, or you may effect some small economy which would be fatal to your general scheme. It is from that point of view that I desire the House to regard the Estimates now before it. I have no reason to complain of the comprehensive speech of the hon. and gallant Member for Birkenhead (Sir Edward Hamley), which dealt with the subject precisely in the spirit I should like to see. He was studiously moderate, and brought to bear upon all he said the education of a lifetime. My hon. and gallant Friend dwelt upon two branches of the defence of this country, one of which was the organization of the Forces at home in the event of invasion. He pointed out that they ought beforehand to be trained and organized upon some definite and consistent scheme. That is the intention of the Memorandum laid before the House, and of the organization scheme we have prepared. That scheme, for which the War Office is much indebted to the head of the Intelligence Department, General Brackenbury, organizes the available Forces for definite purposes and in definite ways; and in carrying it out every unit of our Forces—the Army, Militia, and Volunteers—has the precise functions pointed out that it would have to fulfil in the event of invasion, and arrangements are made for training them beforehand for the performance of their duties. We are now also prepared to say that we have arranged for our Army Corps places of concentration and places of embarkation. We hope before long that stores may be concentrated at these points. When that is done we believe we shall have put into order a complete system of concentration and of embarkation for our Army Corps under the shortest possible notice. I now pass to the other branch of the subject with which my hon. and gallant Friend dealt—the defences of our Coasts. I am free to confess that the picture he drew of the present state of things is not one that can be contemplated with perfect satisfaction. In one direction, however, progress has been made to a larger extent than anyone would gather from my hon. and gallant Friend's speech. I refer in particular to the defence of our Coasts by submarine mines. That has now been going on for many years, and I am glad to say that it has made great progress. We have already spent £416,000 on such mines, and we believe that this work is progressing rapidly towards completion. But this entails further expenditure, because you must have guns to defend these mines, and to defend the quick-firing guns you must have heavy artillery behind, and this has still to be provided. Therefore we are landed at this conclusion—that all the expenditure we have undergone requires further expenditure to make it effective and complete. No definite programme as to this expenditure has ever been laid before Parliament. Great delay has occurred, for which both Parties are to blame. Both Parties are also agreed that if we could get the House of Commons in the precise humour to give us what we want we should carry out the necessary plan with expedition. I believe that the works we have done have put the forts into a much more effective position for defence than they have ever been before; but much remains to be done. Hon. Members know what the provision of great guns means. We have expended great sums of money upon them which would have startled our fathers or statesmen of a generation ago. These guns cost an enormous sum of money. Our Vote for arms at the present time is one which, I am bound to say, is enormous, and which for many years has been increasing in amount. Something, no doubt, may be done by the development of the Brennan torpedo, upon which we had a discussion the other night, which can be installed at three stations for the cost of one really big gun. I take a deep interest in all these questions, and I feel the responsibility which rests upon me. I know that the defences of this country are not all they ought to be, and I am not inclined to shirk that responsibility. And I assure the House that the Government is fully sensible of its duty in this respect. We are considering most carefully how best to secure the fulfilment of the duty which devolves upon us, and if I can see my way to make any proposal for improving the condition in which those fortifications are placed I shall at once do so. Now, I pass to another subject, upon which there has been a good deal of discussion to-night, and on which I hope the House will look from the point of view of our general organization. I refer to the position of our Artillery, which was first introduced to our notice by the hon. and gallant Member for Winchester (Mr. Tottenham), who delivered a good rattling attack upon me, and who was followed by the hon. and gallant Member for Lambeth (General Fraser), who spoke with the authority of a Cavalry officer. They brought before the House what they believed to be the mistaken policy of the War Office in proposing the changes we have now put forward with regard to the Artillery. Let me ask the House to look at the whole question from a general point of view. Our Artillery is required for the defence of our Coast, for the defence of our coaling stations abroad, and for the purpose of furnishing the requisite amount of artillery for the two Army Corps, and the question we have to deal with is how to provide for these necessities without unduly adding to the burdens of the country. To provide for the adequate defence of our Coasts and our coaling stations a large increase is necessary in our Garrison Artillery, and there is also a deficiency in the batteries of Field Artillery. In order to furnish our two Army Corps properly equipped for the field it is necessary to provide ammunition columns for them, for which no provision has hitherto been made, except on the spur of the moment. How is all this to be done? In my opinion it is only to be done by cutting down any superabundance and supplying any deficiency. The only superabundance was in the Royal Horse Artillery. I do not know whether hon. Members realize the cost of this force in money, in horses, and in transport. We felt that we were gaining money and horses for the improvement of other branches of the Service. We have added also wherever we believed that there was a deficiency. We have added three Field Batteries which we believed essential for the two Army Corps. We propose to add 1,800 men to our Garrison Artillery, although the whole of this number will not be obtained this year; we hope, however, to add 900 men this year. Hon. Members who have spoken in the course of this debate have taken the view that if we wish to reduce expenditure the course we have taken is foolish. But we are not going to reduce expenditure, and Members will, perhaps, be surprised to learn that, taking into consideration the cost of horses used for other purposes, the actual increase of cost will amount to £23,000 a-year. We are not undertaking this conversion which we have proposed for the purpose of diminishing expenditure, but because we believe that it is absolutely necessary in order to make the Artillery Forces of this country adequate for our needs. With regard to this conversion, I may state that I very deeply regret any pain that has been caused to the very gallant force which it affects. The efficiency and smartness of the Royal Horse Artillery make such a task one of great pain, all the more that one of the batteries proposed to be reduced is one whose services are as such as have been mentioned to-night. More than one of the batteries whose reduction is proposed have a record of which the Army and the Royal Regiment of Artillery may well be proud. But I am not responsible in any way for the choice of a particular battery to be reduced. They have been chosen on grounds which I believe to be generally recognized as fair to all the interests concerned. But I have listened to the manner in which that reduction has been opposed in the course of the debate, and there are two or three observations which I may venture to make to the House on the subject. First of all it is spoken of as if this conversion of Horse Artillery into Field Artillery was an actual reduction of military strength. Now, that is not the opinion of the military advisers of the War Office. The actual reduction of guns caused by all this conversion is not the 72 guns of which my hon. and gallant Friend spoke, but only 12; and the result of the whole conversion, so far from involving a reduction of military strength, will be to add largely to the defensive forces of the country. Now, if this scheme is to be accepted at all, I hope the House will also accept the other part of our scheme. An hon. and gallant Member told us a story of the state of things two or three years ago when some batteries were sent to Egypt, the batteries remaining at home being left in a most attenuated condition. Very likely; but our object is to have no longer a large proportion of attenuated batteries, but to make those we have effective and valuable for service. Instead of many skeleton batteries we hope to have a few organized in the most effective manner, ready to be produced whenever they are wanted. I do not know if hon. Members have thoroughly grasped the perplexity of the situation in which we are placed by the great difficulty of horse supply in this country. That difficulty is a very great one, as has been so well pointed out, but it is especially difficult with regard to Horse Artillery; and I do not know if my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Lambeth has ever thought how he could possibly manage if all the batteries of Horse Artillery were to be called out on active service. I say there are no horses available in the country to man those horse batteries in any short time and to make them fit for active service. There is one remaining point. We have heard a great deal of discussion to-night, but nobody has ventured to contradict the fact that the number of Horse Artillery in this country is in excess of the proportion of Horse Artillery in foreign countries. Hon. Members have alluded, indeed, to the general proportion of Artillery to our other Forces, but nobody has said that the proportion of Horse Artillery is not in England larger than it is in any foreign country. It is for these reasons that we have arrived at the conclusion that we ought not to ask the House to maintain this expensive arm to a larger extent than is required for two Army Corps, and that we should not be justified in continuing a system for which we cannot find a sufficient justification; and I must therefore say, with great regret, that I am wholly unable to accede to the suggestions which my hon. and gallant Friends have made that we should continue those five batteries of Horse Artillery. Now, with regard to the Field Batteries, some hon. Members have spoken as if, when we had provided for the wants of two Army Corps, we should have no Field Batteries left. That is not the case. We should have 14 Field Batteries left, and it is intended, partly for purposes of economy, to utilize these for the purpose of forming ammunition columns in the event of the Army Corps being suddenly called upon service. I must honestly say that I should be glad to have more Field Batteries, which would be, of course, always available for the many small wars in which this country might be engaged; but, after carefully considering the subject in its various aspects, we have arrived at the conclusion that we are not justified in retaining a larger force of Field Artillery than is necessary for the defence of the country while we are asking Parliament to give us more money to increase the Artillery in other directions. I will now pass to one or two other questions which have been raised in the course of this discussion. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Tottenham) has, in particular, called attention to the strength of our Home battalions, and he would like both these and the foreign service battalions kept at full strength. There can be no doubt that there would be great advantages in the policy which my hon. and gallant Friend recommends; but it would involve an addition of 10,000 or 20,000 men to the Army, and I do not think that the House would be prepared to support any War Minister who should ask for such a number of additional men. Then, my hon. and gallant Friend has referred to the number of men at the depôts, and it has sometimes been urged that we should not have so many men there. The subject is somewhat new to me, and I have not yet had an opportunity of looking into it; but I have always understood that the reason why young soldiers are kept at the depôts is very much the same as that for which you send boys to private schools before you send them to college. You do not wish to place them at once in the midst of all the difficulties that it is necessary for them to encounter as they advance in life. In the same way, you do not like a recruit to join his regiment until he is able to encounter the difficulties and hardships which he has to meet in the regiment and when sent on foreign service. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Hants (Sir Frederick Fitz-Wygram) has called attention to the deficient supply of horses, and the conditions on which they are retained in the Service with respect to age. I cannot follow my hon. and gallant Friend into the details which he has brought forward; but I can honestly say that I have listened with concern to the facts which he has brought before the House to-night, because I know the enormous difficulty which we experience with regard to our horses. It was, I must say, a very disheartening thing to hear him speaking of the great difficulty there is of getting horses either in this country or in Canada, and, after all, saying that he had no remedy to provide. That view, Sir, however, ought not to satisfy a War Minister, and it does not satisfy me. The subject of horses is one of the most important character, as I ventured to say earlier in the evening, and it is one which my noble Friend the Under Secretary for War and myself are taking up in earnest. We are examining all the suggestions put forward for the purpose of improving the supply of horses, and considering, with regard to the mode of purchase, whether we should not encourage home-breeding, by providing some means by which the farmers might know when horses were required, and by every means which we think practicable. I can assure the House that we do not intend to let this year pass by without doing our utmost to improve the supply, whether it be by following the suggestions of hon. and gallant Members, or by other means which may commend itself to the War Office. There is, I think, only one other subject that I have to deal with, and that is the subject of the new rifle which my right hon. Friend the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) has referred to. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of his hesitation to allow the manufacture of the new rifle last year at a rapid rate. I do not at all complain of that decision. Although I admit that the Enfield-Martini is a very efficient arm, and an enormous improvement over that which the Infantry already possess, yet, since that weapon began to be constructed, my right hon. Friend is well aware that the question of the magazine rifle has come before us. In adopting a new rifle, it is necessary that we should be very careful to insure that we get hold of the very best weapon that is to be had, before we undertake the manufacture on a large scale. I assure my right hon. Friend that the matter has been under the consideration of the War Office, and the skilled officers in connection with it, since the year 1881; and we have had a Committee composed of officers not connected specially with the War Office, but officers of the Army and Volunteers, who are most thoroughly qualified to come to a decision on the magazine arm. Every magazine arm in Europe has been examined; the most exhaustive trials have been made, and we have now arrived at the point when we have submitted for trial a very considerable number of Lee and Lee-Burton rifles. Both these rifles have been recommended by the Committee, and we have decided that the best test to which they can be submitted is to issue a certain number to our Forces, in order that they may be tried under every conceivable conditions likely to arise in actual service. We hope and believe that many weeks will not elapse before the trials come to a close, and that the Committee will be able to tell us whether or not they have definitely selected one of these rifles. I am bound to say that if the Committee is able to recommend a rifle for use by the Army I shall not be inclined to hesitate any longer. I believe the time has come when the British Army ought to be armed with the magazine rifle, not alone because of the increased efficiency which the magazine rifle will give, but because the mere fact of the possession of that arm will give more confidence to the Army. We all know very well the confidence which the breech-loading rifle gave to the German Army, and the panic which its possession caused to the Austrian Army; but I go further, and say that I believe that either of these rifles, if they were adopted by our Army, would be a weapon far superior to that possessed by any Continental Army, and would place us, in this respect, far in advance of any other nation. There is a great deal of exaggeration abroad as to the extent to which magazine rifles have been adopted by foreign countries. There is no doubt that some magazine rifles have been adopted; but there is a great deal of doubt as to their efficiency. We shall certainly proceed with caution, and when we get the report of the thoroughly qualified Committee I have referred to, and believe that we have got a weapon thoroughly efficient, and better than is possessed by other Armies, we shall not hesitate to ask Parliament to give us the means of equipping our Army with that weapon. There are many points of detail on which I shall be glad to answer questions in Committee; but this I should like to say now:—We have discussed general principles affecting the organization of the Army, and I hope the House will allow us to go into Committee at once and take the first Vote. I need scarcely remind the House that it is absolutely necessary for the service of the country that we should get the first Vote tonight, and I ask to be allowed to go into Committee in order that any special question affecting the Vote for men and pay for the Army may be argued and discussed. I am aware that I am, in this, asking a great sacrifice of some hon. Members who wish to bring questions forward. But my hon. Friends will recollect that the point to which, I believe, they specially desire to refer—namely, the question of increased Capitation Grants—is one which will not affect the Volunteer Force during the course of this year. I dwell upon that point, because it is one which I know very well hon. Members wish to raise; but there may be others to which my remarks also apply. We shall have other opportunities of discussing these matters; but the main reason why I ask that we may be allowed to go into Committee without further delay is because it is the intention of the Government to accede to the proposal, which seems to be acceptable to the House, that, to some extent, at any rate, the Army and Navy Estimates should be referred to a Committee upstairs. I hope, therefore, that the House will allow us to take the first Vote to-night, so that we may be enabled to constitute the Committee without delay.

Mr. E. Stanhope

Mr. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) has made an appeal to hon. Members, who have particular points to refer to, to allow the first Vote to be taken at once. But I confess that, looking on the general question of the expenditure of the Army, and considering the very few opportunities which lie before us for general discussion as to the Army generally, and its proper strength, hon. Members on this side of the House, at any rate, are entitled to a few minutes respite; and I ask the forbearance of the House while I make a few remarks. At the outset, let me congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War on the very able, fair, and courageous statement which he has made, after the short time he has been in an Office where most of the items are new to him. I wish to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the very gallant way in which he has stood to his guns. He has to-night sustained the attack of every hon. and gallant Gentleman who has spoken on a single item in connection with which it has been imagined that it was a proposal to reduce expenditure and weaken the strength of one branch of the Army. I refer to the Horse Artillery. One hon. and gallant Gentleman has, however, shown that, in this matter, there will be no economy to the taxpayer, and that it will, in a certain sense, weaken the strength of the Army. We have had a regular field day on the present occasion; and I never remember one on which professional talk has been so universally indulged in. I almost regret that any civilian, who has simply the interest of the taxpayers of the country at heart, should venture, by a single observation, to destroy the harmony of those hon. and gallant Gentlemen who have had the whole evening to themselves. But I wish to draw attention to one remark which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War made at the outset of his speech. He said, first make up your mind as to the strength of the force required for the defence of the country, and then consent to the maintenance of this force at an efficient point. Well, Sir, I agree with that view as being thoroughly business-like; and I consider the suggestion one which ought to commend itself to every hon. Member of this House, and to the country at large. But what were his recommendations for the defence of the country? I take issue with the right hon. Gentleman there, and declare that this enormous military expenditure, which will be followed by a large naval expenditure, is wholly in excess of the requirements of the country. I cannot help thinking that the mind of the right hon. Gentleman and the utterances of those hon. and gallant Gentlemen who have spoken to-night are affected by the military frenzy which now exists on the Continent, and I think it would be as well if the right hon. Gentleman had turned aside for a moment and given us the views which the Government have with regard to the present state of Continental affairs. I do not hesitate to say that the Votes now asked for are far beyond the real necessities of the case; but, on the other hand, if there is any contemplation of the possibility or probability of a British Force being sent to the Continent to take part in any great military operations, that our Force is ridiculously inadequate to such an end. I think it is necessary that the country should make up its mind as to the course it will pursue with regard to Continental affairs. It is not long ago that a right hon. Gentleman, who is assumed to be entitled to express an opinion on the condition of Continental affairs, declared at the Mansion House in the most solemn terms that the condition of Europe, in respect to the relations of one nation to the other, was very grave indeed. I believe there is cause for the very gravest anxiety to those who are interested in the maintenance of the peace of Europe. But the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) has also given his opinion as to the immediate position of Continental affairs, and for one in his position I may say that he has used most singular terms. He spoke of the prospect having improved. I venture to protest against that mode of speech. But has the Government made up its mind that it can in any case be its duty to take part in any Continental quarrel, and undertake the sending of a considerable force to any part of the Continent? If that is the position, then I am obliged to say that I do not think that the preparations made by the Government are by any means adequate to such a view. But I believe that the people of this country are coming to the conclusion that there can be no quarrel fomented on the Continent in which it would be the duty of this country to take any part, either military or naval. The increasing taxation which the country has been called upon to bear during the last 12 years, the depression which has become chronic in many industries, and the outcry against the intolerable burden which rests upon the shoulders of the people, convinces me that there is a growing intention on the part of the people of this country to say "hands off" with regard to Continental affairs. I should like to read a few words of my right hon. Friend the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), who said—

"I cannot help thinking that Europe is marching towards some great catastrophe; the crushing weight of their military systems cannot be supported with patience, and their effects may before long sweep away the personages who occupy Thrones, and the instruments who govern in their names."

I believe that an utterance of this sort which comes from the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham is one which must affect the mind of every thinking man in this country. It certainly looks now as if Continental nations were going towards some great catastrophe. I ask, is this country prepared to take a share in this great race, and to leap into this gulf? We are in a position so far unentangled with Continental affairs that we have the chance of holding back ourselves, and, at the same time, of exercising a wise and restraining influence in Europe; and we are the only European Power which is able to do so. I cannot help thinking that there must be many people in this country who would be very glad if our Government could see its way towards a prompt withdrawal from any position which might involve the entanglement of the British Forces in any quarrel, either with regard to Bulgaria or as between Germany and France. There is absolute silence on the other side of the House. I desire to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith). I know very well, from the kindness of his nature, that he would willingly do all that lies in his power in order that the peace of the Continent may be maintained; but in order that we may have some security for that, I believe it is necessary for the Government to show far more courage and consistency than it has shown in its declarations on foreign policy. Once let it be known that this country will lend its best influence towards the settlement of International disputes, and then not alone would the Government consult the true interest of this country, but, instead of having to bear the humiliation which would follow the course of interference which I have indicated, its position would be raised in the minds of all right-thinking people at home and abroad. I come now, Sir, to the question whether this large Force is necessary for the defence of the Empire; and I say that I am convinced that the security of the Empire will be increased and its safety insured just in proportion as we withdraw from meddling in the affairs of Europe. If we do not meddle in those affairs we shall have the respect of Continental nations; and the more consistently we take up that position and maintain it, the more advantage will follow. What are the Forces available for the defence of the country? I shall say not one word about the Yeomanry, which everyone knows, for the purpose of defence, has been obsolete for generations; but I am about to offer a suggestion whereby the right hon. Gentleman may fulfil the demands proposed to be met next year. There is a proposal of a Capitation Grant for the Volunteers of 5s., which is to be postponed until next year. My suggestion is, that the right hon. Gentleman should give 10s., and this, I am convinced, would be for the advantage of the country at large. Let them suppress immediately this soldier-play of the Yeomanry, and give the money to the Volunteers. It will cause a small increase in the Vote, but it will be approved by the country. We have 500,000 soldiers available for defence—that is, 140,000 Regular Troops, including officers; Militia, 120,000; Volunteers, 220,000; and at the back of that the Reserve Force, making a total of 500,000 men. I venture to say that, with a whole year's preparation on the part of Continental Powers, it would be impossible that they could land 300,000 men on these shores, and we have 500,000 men to meet them. Considering the security that our Fleet affords us, I venture to say that if 200,000 or 300,000 men were to embark for these shores, not one-third of them would ever reach the country. They would only be sport for our men-of-war, and the destruction would be terrific. Therefore, I say that the country would be justified in demanding a considerable reduction, both in the number of the soldiers and the expenditure which is incurred for the purpose of defence. We have never been able to get a cheap Army in this country; instead of its costing less per head, the tendency of late years has been to increase, and it will be so more and more in the Army, and especially in the Navy. As weapons become more scientific, they become more costly. I say there is no finality, either as to rifles or the armament of the Navy. There is a continuous advance made, one competitor going a step further than another, and, as competition increases, increased cost must necessarily follow. The noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) brought great credit to the Conservative Party by putting forward some professions of economy in respect to the two great spending Departments, and the noble Lord left the Government because he could not make an immediate impression upon the rest of his Colleagues; but, instead of there being any diminution of expenditure, we have had, I believe, Supplementary Estimates amounting to £750,000, and we have also had an increase in the Estimates submitted to us to-night. Not only the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), but the right hon. Gentleman opposite, put forward professions of economy, by which I understand that the Conservative Party gained considerable credit throughout the country last year; but I venture to say that we have not to-night any substantial prospect of a reduction upon the Army and Navy Estimates. The right hon. Gentleman admits that in regard to our Coast defences they are left in a very inefficient position, and that it is necessary to go on, year by year, spending much more money. The right hon. Gentleman did not hesitate to say that if he were War Minister he should be courageous enough to ask the House for a considerable increase in expenditure in connection with some branches of our defences. I only wish to say, in impressing the points I have dwelt on upon the House, that this country should either make up its mind to force every Government into an improved attitude in regard to this question of non-intervention, or it should be content to have an additional load year by year hung round its neck like Continental countries, which we see groaning under the increasing burdens they have to bear. On looking over the figures as to the proposition of annual expenditure on interest of war debts and the maintenance of armies and navies, I find it is calculated that half the taxation is disbursed in this way. But we in this country have gone far beyond that. We are spending nearer two-thirds of our taxation on the Army and Navy, interest on the National Debt, and on the small attempt we are making at reduction of Debt. This, I maintain, is an appalling state of affairs. When I remind the House that since the year 1870, or a little further back, the Civil expenditure has doubled itself—largely, of course, in consequence of that Act of true wisdom passed by this House, namely, the Education Act of 1870—when, I say, we remember that this enormous increase has taken place in the Civil expenditure, although what we are spending on education is productive, and will be remunerative, surely we ought to be making a grave attempt, on the other hand, to reduce our expenditure on an overgrown Army and Navy. I think the House of Commons will fail in its duty if over and over again this question is not raised and discussed—if we do not avail ourselves of every opportunity that offers itself of raising it in order to make some impression on the Government, and the policy they pursue in regard to foreign affairs. When we consider the Estimates put before us year by year, and observe the enormous total of £31,000,000 spent on the Army and Navy, we stand appalled; but we must remember that this by no means covers the expenditure. As year by year passes, we see Votes of Credit agreed to, now for £6,000,000, now for £11,000,000, for £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 on another occasion. If these are all totalled, it will be found that there is an addition of 10 to 20 per cent to be made in the ordinary Estimates presented to this House for Army and Navy Services. All I can say is, that I think the prospects of the country's industry are of a most gloomy character if, while we are subjected to increased competition, and to a denial of ordinary seasons at home, we are called upon to bear burdens that were unknown during very prosperous periods of our history. One of the first duties of the Representatives of the people—particularly when they know so well the suffering that almost universally prevails amongst almost all classes except those who enjoy the proceeds of public taxation—is to make an effort, it may be over and over again, to produce some permanent effect upon the Government in the way of bringing about a reduction of these swollen Estimates.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I had intended to bring before the notice of the House the question of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) in regard to the Capitation Grant for the Volunteers, and more especially to his injurious proposition to make it entirely dependent upon getting out of the third class in musketry; but after the appeal the right hon. Gentleman has made to us, I will not prevent him from taking the Votes in Committee. I am the more induced to take this course because I understand the right hon. Gentleman to promise me that he will make no order effecting a change in the matter of the Capitation Grant until he has received a deputation of commanding officers of Volunteers, and has had time to consider the views which they will lay before him.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I think the hon. Member who has just sat down is quite right in refraining from making a long speech on this occasion; but the reason which should restrain him does not apply to me. We have had three or four very able and very long speeches from the other side of the House, so that the views of hon. Members in that quarter may be taken to be pretty well ventilated. It is unfortunate that they cannot state their opinions without doing it at considerable length; but, at any rate, after what they have said, we in this quarter have a right to be heard. I think I am quite right in asserting that hon. Members on the other side have spoken for by far the greater portion of the time to-night. I will, therefore, take the liberty to occupy a brief space. I can quite see that the central idea that has been in the minds of the advisers of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War is with regard to the formation of two Corps d'Armée; but I must point out that it will be a very dangerous idea if they let it go too far. The idea is to have a completely organized Army of about 70,000 men for two Corps d'Armée, and they are prepared to make sacrifices for that. No doubt it is a very good thing to have 70,000 men who can be mobilized at any time. It is a good thing from a War Office point of view, though from the point of view of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) there should be no such idea as the formation of two Corps d'Armée, capable of rapid mobilization, as it would be a temptation to this country to interpose in foreign complications. I am not sure that the advisers of the right hon. Gentleman are not sacrificing too much for their idea, because it seems to me that a great country requires something more than 70,000 men for defensive purposes, or for use in the event of a large war. I do not think it should be left out of consideration altogether that some day or other this country may be invaded. The hon. Member for Bradford says that if 500,000 men were sent out to invade us only a very small proportion would be able to land on our shores—that probably two-thirds of them would be sunk on the way. For myself, I do not think that that would be the case; but let us suppose that the 500,000 men were enabled to reach our shores—what force would you have to meet them? The hon. Member for Bradford says that we should have 500,000 men to meet them—and he is not very far wrong. Taking into consideration the Volunteers and the Militia, and swelling the force of the garrisons we have in our fortresses, we might take it that we have a fair fighting force of 300,000 men. Still, does anyone think that the number of Horse Artillery we should find ourselves possessed of would be sufficient for a force of that size? They certainly would not be sufficient for such an Army, although they might be for two Corps d'Armée of 70,000 men. It must be remembered that it would take at least two years to turn a Field Battery into an efficient Horse Artillery. You cannot improvise Horse Artillery. You are now going to give up all our Horse Artillery except only so much as you require for 70,000 men. Our Horse Artillery must be ready to run away if need be, and to take rapid action in the field, and in order to bring about a proper state of efficiency in such a force you require the best men you can get, and the best training you can procure. The men must all be first-class riders as well as efficient in musketry practice. Horse Artillery, in fact, would be worse than useless on active service unless it is very good. It seems to me, therefore, that with a large and complete Field Artillery, including in that word Horse Artillery, you will be what commercial men call cutting it a great deal too fine. The Government in 1872 reduced the Volunteer Artillery, and I remember pointing out at the time that the course they were taking was a very dangerous one. The defence for the step at that time was that the Volunteer Artillery would not be effective as a Field Artillery; but now you are reducing our Horse Artillery because they are too good. You are cutting away at both ends. You have taken away from the number of our Field Force, and now you are taking away from the Force which is by far the most difficult to re-create; and I repeat emphatically that in this proceeding you are doing a very dangerous thing. I give you this advice just as I presumed to offer you advice in 1872. It will take two years before the present Horse Artillery cease to be Horse Artillery and become Field Artillery; and I would advise the right hon. Gentleman to make his conversion in such a manner that during the next two years the Horse Artillery which he is converting into a Field Artillery may be re-converted into a Horse Artillery. I think it is not at all unlikely that within this period of two years he may find it necessary to reverse the process he is now undertaking. I would press upon the right hon. Gentleman another point—namely, the pay of the men. The Force that he is going to convert into a Field Artillery have been getting higher pay as Horse Artillery, and they have come to look upon this higher pay just as the right hon. Gentleman looks upon his emoluments as a right. The amount the men have been receiving as extra Horse Artillery pay is only a sum of £1,500; but this is an amount that these men will miss, and that they ought not to be deprived of. You say you will bring the men back into the Horse Artillery. Well, you may bring some of them back—you will no doubt, with the exception of a few, bring them all back. You will bring the very best of them back, but there will be some inferior to others, and these will not be picked out, so that in the matter of pay you will be inflicting an injustice upon those few left behind. The item is only a small one, but I think, in justice to these men, the point I raise should be considered. There is another argument which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War made use of which I think on reflection, he, with his logical mind, will see is not a sound one. He says that one reason for not increasing the Horse Artillery is because there is not a sufficient number of good horses in the country. I contend that this matter of the supply of horses is simply a question of supply and demand. If you keep the number of horses down in peace time, you will not have a sufficient number to draw from in time of war. The question of the supply of food and the other points are only so many arguments brought in to support a preconceived idea, and I must say I think the right hon. Gentleman is pushing that idea altogether too far. You will have our Volunteers without any Field Artillery support—you take away from the Field Artillery and then you suppress the Horse Artillery, and you take away a number of horses from the Field Artillery for the purpose of putting them in an ammunition column. Supposing our two Army Corps lose a battle, and are taken prisoners, what will be our position? You will find that you have left our Volunteers with no guns at all, excepting a small force of Horse Artillery, and in the worst possible state for sustaining a fight—that is to say, with all their horses taken for the ammunition column. With regard to this other question connected with the Horse Artillery—namely, the question of horses —my contention is, that there is an ample supply of good animals in the country, which you could obtain if you would only pay a little more than you do for our supply. If you raised your contract price you would find very little difficulty, in the course of three or four years, in getting all the horses you want. I will tell you how you obtained your horses some 10 or 12 years ago, because I was acquainted with the officer who had to buy them. You had a large contractor in London, who arranged with the farmers in the North of England to buy all the horses that they could supply of four or five years of age. It was found that the farmers sent all their best horses to dealers to be sold for carriage purposes, and those that were not good enough for carriages were thrown into the Artillery. This was because the Army contractor was not able to compete with the private purchaser. If he had been prepared to give a little more money for his horses, your contractor would have been able to get the best animals. I hold that there are any number of good horses to be obtained in London alone. I am certain that if you sent men round to gather up all the horses that could be found in Hyde Park, and in other parts of London, you would get, in the course of a week, 20,000 of as good horses as you could possibly want. I repeat that you do not pay a sufficient price for your horses. There is another method, as has been pointed out by a Cavalry General, by which you could improve our supply of horses and the quality of the horses you obtain at the same time. I think this result would be effected by establishing sires in Ireland. I do not know that sires are so much wanted in England as they are in Ireland; but under present conditions in Ireland the horses run small, and are hardly of much use for Artillery. They are bred animals, but rather too light. I had intended to say something about the magazine rifles, but do not think desirable to take up the time of the House at this late hour. I must say, however, that I do not think the late Secretary of State for War gave very good advice to the present occupant of that Office. I think if you keep waiting for the best magazine rifle which can be produced, it is very possible that you may bring about a condition of things similar to that which astonished the world during the short war between Germany and Austria not long ago. We all know the extraordinary result of the adoption of the needle-gun by Germany. The German needle-gun was by no means a good weapon, but poor as it was, it had an enormous advantage over the weapon in use in the Austrian Army. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be advisable for the Authorities of this country to possess themselves now of 10,000 or 20,000 magazine rifles, although there may be a better pattern invented later on. If we had such a supply, we should be ready for any pressing emergency, and should still be in a position to reconsider the question of the adoption of an efficient pattern. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War could follow the advice of his Predecessor in regard to the magazine rifle without incurring a certain amount of risk.

Mr. Illingworth

Colonel Nolan

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Stanhope) whether he would tell us why in the new Royal Warrant, he has deprived medical officers of their relative rank? I would tell him that the course he is adopting is causing considerable dissatisfaction amongst the medical officers of the Service. Gentlemen who have occupied the position of the Secretary of State for War have recognized that with medical officers, as with many other people, rank is everything. By your new arrangement you are bringing about a most important change in the status of the medical officers—in fact from their point of view, you are degrading them. That is their feeling—they feel that you are degrading them to a lower status than the Commissaries

I think this branch of the Service does not deserve such treatment. If the right hon. Gentleman will glance over the list of casualties—if he will search among the records of the killed and wounded for the last few years, he will find the names of a large proportion of medical officers. If he will look into the records to see who have obtained the Victoria Cross of late years, he will find that medical officers have as much right as any other men in the Service to be called combatant officers. I contend that this is no mere matter of sentiment. The position and comfort of these officers is being affected by the proposal of the Government. They are combatant in position as well as rank, and I fail to see what the Medical Service has done to justify such treatment. I think they would understand your arrangement much better if you were giving them the same pay as combatants; but you are doing nothing of the kind—you are merely degrading them from their present positions. If this policy is carried out, I believe you will find great difficulty in getting medical men to join the Army. Instead of abolishing relative rank, you ought to have given medical officers actual rank, as is done in Continental Armies. That would be considered by medical officers as something better than even an increase in their salaries. I do not know of anything the members of the Medical Department have done to cause the War Office or the Horse Guards to deprive them of the very great privilege I have mentioned. During the time I speak of they have lost greatly in killed and wounded, many of them have gained the Victoria Cross, and they have done a great deal to reduce the death-rate in the Army—the death-rate has been reduced from 19 to 6 per 1,000 at home, and from 17 to 15 per 1,000 in India. I should like to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the reasons which have caused the Government to reduce the Medical Profession to its present position in the Army, and thus create great dissatisfaction amongst our Army medical officers.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I do not propose to engage the attention of the House for more than a very few minutes; but I wish to mention certain reductions which might be very properly effected in the Estimates, and the saving applied to the benefit of the private soldier in the way of a free kit and rations, which he has always been promised, but never yet been able to get. The first item in which I suggest a reduction is that for the Staff—very nearly £200,000 is required for the General Staff. A reduction might also be very well made in the item—£90,000—for Commissariat and Transport. Our Army is the most over-stocked Army in Europe. We have the Quartermaster General's Staff and the Adjutant General's Staff—two Staffs which ought to have been amalgamated 16 years ago. We have the Medical Staff, the Commissariat Staff, and the Ordnance Staff, and I cannot help thinking that these Staffs might be amalgamated in peace time as they are amalgamated in war time. The Staff we keep at Aldershot, in order to supervise about half-a-dozen skeleton battalions, is equivalent to the entire German Staff in time of war. The next matter I wish to advert to is the increased expenditure on civilian clerks at the War Office. Last year the civilian clerks were increased to about 400, and their pay amounted to £118,000. We have about 85 military clerks receiving only £100 a-year each. The work is very easy and very quickly learnt. I cannot understand why we should not have more military clerks at £100 a-year each, and fewer civilian clerks drawing £290 a-year each. The worst of all is that these clerks have to justify their existence, and they do this by calling for Returns, the number of which increases every year. There is no reason why money should not be saved by cutting down the Returns made in the Service. For instance, the Returns which are now made monthly might be made half-yearly, and the Returns now made half-yearly might be made yearly. At present soldiers are turned into accountants, in order to produce Returns which are never wanted by anybody, which are no more good than the Blue Books which hon. Members get every morning. One word with regard to the expenditure on military law. The administration of military law costs £35,000 a-year. This expenditure is occasioned as much as anything by the number of desertions and courts martial. Last year there were 4,500 desertions, and about 10,000 courts martial. Now, if commanding officers were allowed to eliminate the bad characters from the ranks, the number of desertions and the amount of crime would diminish. Bad characters are turned out now, but as soon as they are turned away they enlist in another regiment. The only way to reduce crime in the Army, and to eliminate bad characters, is to mark every man, from the Commander-in-Chief downwards, who enters the Army. I should like to call attention to the question of transport. In England regiments are moved from one place to another two or three times a-year. Cavalry regiments move right across England once a-year, without the slightest rhyme or reason. It is said the practice has always been carried out, and it always must be. An enormous sum might be saved by a reduction in the expenses of transport. The sums saved might be expended in ameliorating the condition of the private soldier, in giving him a free kit and free rations, and 1s. a-day, which has been promised. A free kit he never gets; but at the end of every year he finds himself £1 in debt. As to free rations, he is supplied with 1 lb. of bread and three-quarters of a pound—very often only half-a-pound—of the worst possible meat, and his 1s. a-day which has been promised to him is brought down to about 8½d. I venture to think that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) and hon. Members who know anything of the subject will agree with me that nothing disgusts a soldier more than to find that he has been taken in—that, in fact, he was induced to enlist upon false pretences.

Mr. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): Mr. Speaker, it is with extreme reluctance I rise to interpose between the House and the Committee; but I consider I have a duty to perform. I wish to direct attention to a very important point in the Memorandum which has been supplied to hon. Members, and to remind the House that in that Memorandum an admission is made which reflects very seriously upon the conduct either of this or previous Parliaments. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) states in this Memorandum—voted for the work of submarine mining. The sum taken is somewhat in excess of that which has for the last two years been included in the Estimates. It will enable the defences of Hong Kong, Sierra Leone, and, approximately, those of Singapore, to be completed.”

“It will be observed that provision is made in the Estimates for carrying on the works of defence at our coaling stations, and for providing them with guns; beside the amount to be

It is to the word “approximately” I object. I shall show, in a very few words, that the use of that word “approximately” amounts to an admission that the House of Commons has been guilty, in the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War in the previous paragraph of the Memorandum, of “a breach of faith.” At the same time, I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon the courage and candour which have enabled him to place before us the real state of things. We have made a bargain with Singapore to provide the necessary armaments, if the Government of the Straits Settlements would pay for the forts, and yet we have failed to fulfil the obligation we undertook. A more serious charge could not be made, and I would not have made it, especially at this late hour (1.15) of the Sitting, had I not been connected with the Colony of Singapore, and had some opportunity of learning something of the circumstances. Only the other day I received two letters upon this subject from Members of the Straits Settlements Legislative Council. I will not give the writers' names; this might be inconvenient; but I may be permitted to read passages from the letters. One of my correspondents says—

“After the answer given by the Secretary of State for War to Sir William Crossman's inquiries on Tuesday, it is quite clear that much greater pressure than any that has yet been brought to bear is needed to make them ask for more money, which is what is required to enable the manufacture of guns to be expedited by holding out inducements to private firms to lay down machinery at once for manufacture of guns. It is nearly three years since the Imperial Authorities knew what they had to do, and they have so far given Singapore four new guns, and remounted a few obsolete inefficient ones; and they propose to give us the balance by dribble, to be completed in 1889. And, meantime, are they going to give us first-class modern ships till we get our guns—have they got them to spare for the purpose? The Secretary of State for War says on certain stations, including Singapore, the Government has spent £183,530, and expect to spend £206,555—i.e., on the armaments of those stations; but he is very careful to avoid saying over what period that expenditure is extended.”

I will now read an extract from the second letter I have received, the writer

Major Rauch

being a gentleman who is well up in everything which concerns the defences of Singapore—

"I am very glad to see that you propose to call attention to the question of our coaling stations. Ever since I have come home, I have been representing how disgraceful it is that the Mother Country does not fulfil her obligations to her Colonies; and have been urging that we should not put off till to-morrow what should be done to-day. At Singapore we have rushed through what we were asked to do, only to find that a part of the ordinance has not even been ordered yet. People write and talk as if something colossal was involved. Why, if the recommendations of the Royal Commission had not been emasculated, it would have only meant the cost of construction of three first-class ironclads for all our coaling stations put together."

Now, the point I wish to impress upon the House is that until the armaments of any Colony are completed, the money spent is as good as thrown in the sea. Your capital is dead capital; it makes no return. Therefore, I say that, in the interests of this country as well as of the Colonies, it is the duty of the Government of the day to see that at all costs the armaments and fortifications which have been commenced are completed without any delay. We are informed that Singapore will not be armed for several more years to come, except "approximately." Singapore is the high road between the Eastern Seas and the Southern Seas; it commands the whole of the trade between England and China, and much of the trade with Australia; and, therefore, it is most important that this, at least, of our coaling stations should be adequately defended. If the Government are unable to get from this House a Vote of money sufficient to enable them to perform what is a most serious duty, they ought to raise a loan for the purpose. The point has already been well touched upon by the hon. and gallant Member for Birkenhead (Sir Edward Hamley). The sentence which follows the one I have quoted from the Memorandum shows there is a means of doing what is a matter of duty, and which, if not done, implies a breach of faith. It is said—

"Some advance will be made in other cases also; but it cannot be denied that an acceleration of this work beyond the rate of progress laid down in 1884 would be eminently desirable, especially as it is well known to everyone who has looked into the subject that more than one station of primary importance still remains undefended."

I would venture to suggest that no advance need be made in the other cases until our obligations are satisfied with regard to Singapore. It is surely more prudent to have one place quite completed than half-a-dozen approximately complete. Besides, when you read these words you imagine the Government are going to act upon the lines laid down in 1884; but they are going to do no such thing. The fault lies between the Government and the House of Commons. In 1884 it was solemnly declared to the Government of Singapore that if they would spend a certain sum of money upon the fortifications, the guns should be completed and ready to be mounted on the fortifications in 1887. This Memorandum clearly shows that it is not intended that the armaments shall be completed until 1889. I maintain that if you are really in earnest in respect to the fortification of our coaling stations, you ought to set about the work at once. When I was at Singapore there was a fleet of eight Russian war vessels cruising about and surveying the harbours for nearly six months at a time. They could have seized upon the place in as many hours if war had been declared. Lest anybody should think I have been guilty of exaggeration in what I have said, I will call attention to the words of the Memorandum. My experience is a very short one; but I doubt whether any Minister of State has ever made such a candid confession which so seriously involves the credit of this House and the Government as the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War does in this Memorandum. The right hon. Gentleman says—

"I am anxious to bring prominently forward the fact that the manufacturing and engineering departments necessarily enter into contract engagements extending over several years, and that a sudden curtailment of Estimates may often mean not only the stoppage of a particular work, but the loss of a large part of the money already expended, or it may involve a breach of faith. Take, for instance, the expenditure upon our coaling stations, which is, and ought to be, regulated by the general scheme laid down in 1884, accepted by the Treasury, and at that time submitted to Parliament. Upon the faith of that scheme we have induced some of our Colonies to vote, and to expend large sums of money on the understanding that, if they would undertake the cost of the works, the Imperial Parliament would find the armaments. In more than one case the Colony has kept its part of the bargain, while the Imperial Government has not obtained the necessary funds to do so.

In all these cases the faith of Parliament is deeply pledged, and, quite independently of the great interests involved, we are bound in honour to provide the necessary funds, at least upon the scale laid down in 1884."

If the House is not willing to vote the money this year, I ask it to authorize the Government to raise a loan with which to complete the armaments in a proper way. If such a proposition cannot be entertained; if the House is utterly careless of the engagements made by previous Houses of Commons; if the House is prepared to follow the example of a noble Lord and sacrifice its reputation upon the altar of thrift and economy, I can only hope that the authorities who are interesting themselves in the celebration of the Jubilee of Her Majesty will devote the funds they have collected to build a superfluous Imperial Institute Hall to discharge this most important and necessary duty of the country—namely, to fulfil its engagements in respect to the fortifications of our coaling stations, at least as far as Singapore is concerned.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): It is not my intention to deal at length with the question before the House. We have practically gone round the world in our discussion this evening, and I had intended to bring under consideration, and call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman who has this matter in hand to, the fitness of Seychelles as a coaling station. But, we having had a satisfactory answer from a right hon. Gentleman belonging to another Department connected with the subject, I shall not deal with it to-night. I think we have not received a satisfactory assurance from any hon. or right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench with regard to the Medical Department of the Army, which, by the statement made earlier in this discussion by the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark), appears to be in a very unsatisfactory condition. I remember that not many years since, when that Department was as low as it could possibly be, we could not get young men at the various Medical Schools to enter for the Army Medical Department. Since that time you have had progress made in this Department, which has tended to allay the fears and satisfy the longings of men who entered the Service. I am not going to pursue that point, however. I wish to say that I have received five letters upon the subject of the Army Medical Department from different parts of the world. Some of them are from personal friends, and, if what I understand from them be true, the state of affairs is at present very serious. The last letter I received only yesterday afternoon, and I am told that, practically speaking, the medical men in the Army who are serving at Aldershot do not know whether they are entitled to wear the uniform at all, and if they are entitled to wear the uniform, whether the badges they hold in the Service are not to be altogether done away with. These gentlemen have to go through a long training, to undergo a good deal of trouble and self-denial, and they have to expose themselves to much danger—quite as much as any hon. and gallant Gentleman who has spoken in the debate of this evening. That being so, I say that the rights of these men must be recognized; and I maintain, unless something is done to improve their position in the Army, that you will be placing yourselves in a false and unwise position. I will quote a few figures taken out of the last Report which I have been able to lay my hands upon this evening in the Library. I find that of 187,786 men you have an enormous proportion admitted yearly into hospital. If you take these figures and lay them to heart, you will see that by doing anything which will militate against this most important branch of the Service, you will do great harm not merely to the Army, but to the various factors which compose it, and perhaps to that portion of the population from which you recruit the Army. You have 9,302 non-effectives, and you have 3,019 men discharged last year as invalids. I say that if you do not offer inducements for the best men to enter the Army, men who are able not only to deal with sickness when it crops up, but who can distinguish whether the recruits submitted to them are sound men, you will get into your Army a large number of cripples whom you will have to discharge, and also have to pay for. There are upon the Paper a number of Amendments to this Vote by some of the highest authorities in the House; among them the hon. Member for Hackney has a question upon this very point, and I am assured by my hon. Friends from Ireland that they are not satisfied with the answers which have emanated from the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Gentlemen opposite. I sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, that before this debate closes some satisfactory assurance will be given to gentlemen who are already in the Service; and I also trust that some assurance will be given to the junior medical officers in the Army that they will not immediately be translated to a warm climate—India, for instance—in their first year of service. That has been the practice, and I have pointed out how it has happened again and again that numbers of these young men having joined the Medical Department have met their death in the first 12 months. Many of the men who enter the Service are young and unseasoned; and, therefore, I say you should give them a chance, and when they have become seasoned you can utilize them; but it is a great mistake to send out men to hot climates, as appears from the Reports presented by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope), which show the actual cost of each trained soldier. Practically speaking, if you pass them through a certain amount of training and pay a certain amount of money for them, and if they become invalided and die in the first year of service, you will be inflicting a great loss on the country. I trust that the suggestions which I have made will be taken in the sense in which I desire them to be received by the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Estimates; and I will, in conclusion, draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland and other Medical Schools have practically endorsed this appeal on behalf of the Army Medical Service. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will give me some assurance that the grievance of this Department of the Army will be dealt with in a satisfactory way.

Mr. De Lisle

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES, 1887-8.

(1.) 149,391, Number of Land Forces.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid.): I should like to ask the Government whether there is any serious intention to ask for Votes in Supply to-night? We have been engaged during the whole evening in a very important and interesting discussion on the affairs of the Army, and I cannot think that the Government are serious in asking us to vote this money at 1 o'clock in the morning. I think such a proposal would be altogether unreasonable. There are hon. Members of the House who have given Notices of Amendments for the reduction of the Vote, and who, on the supposition that the Votes would not be taken at this hour, have gone away. I consider that it would be unreasonable to take Votes in the absence of hon. Members who are interested in those Votes, and therefore I think we ought to report Progress.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I have already pointed out that it is absolutely necessary that we should have the first Vote to-night. Hon. Members will be aware that we must comply with the law; and it was perfectly well understood that it was our intention to ask for the money to-night.

MR. M. J. KENNY: What will be done in connection with the Navy Votes?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): We do not propose to take the Navy Vote to-night; but it is essential that the first Army Vote should be taken.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I was asked a moment ago by a right hon. Gentleman if Members on these Benches were likely to oppose this Vote; and I am afraid that, without authority, I stated that I considered it as practically agreed that the Vote for the men would not be opposed.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): If the right hon. Gentleman will answer a question on this subject, I think it will remove the present difficulty. If we give the Government the first Vote, will they allow us an opportunity for a general discussion hereafter?

MR. W. H. SMITH: There would be no disposition on the part of the Government to deprive hon. Members of the opportunity which the hon. and gallant Gentleman asks for; but I may remind him that it has been proposed to refer these Votes to a Select Committee; and I wish the hon. and gallant Gentleman to understand that if any delay should arise, it will not be because the Government desire to prevent the discussion which he is anxious to have.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Throughout the long discussion which has taken place, there have been very few speeches from these Benches; on the other hand, the debate has been carried on entirely by right hon. Gentlemen and hon. Gentlemen opposite. I have spoken with several hon. Members to-night, who have since left the House in the belief that the Navy, and not the Army, Estimates were coming on. I know it was the intention of several hon. Members on this side of the House to oppose one portion of this Vote—that is to say, the portion of it relating to the Household Brigade. I cannot but think that it would be very injudicious to proceed with the Vote at this very late hour; and that, having regard to the circumstances I have referred to, it should be taken on Thursday next. I suggest that the Government should allow Progress to be reported.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am very sorry that it is not in my power to accede to the appeal which has been made to me. To-night was set apart for the discussion of the Army Estimates, and Thursday night for the discussion of the Navy Estimates, and it would be an interference with the legitimate discussion which might fairly take place on the Navy Estimates if the debate of this evening, in regard to Army matters, were carried over until Thursday. I should be charged with not having foreseen the desires of hon. Gentlemen to discuss naval questions. It is essential that these two Votes—namely, the Votes for men and money in the Army—should be taken to-night; it is necessary not only in the interests of discussion and Business in this House, but also in the interests of the Public Service.

MR. PULESTON (Devonport): After what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, I think we all understand that these Votes should be taken, and taken at once. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War dwelt upon the necessity of having a variety of opinions expressed on any subject coming before the House of Commons, and of having measures such as those that have been before us to-night generally discussed. Well, most of the subjects which have been dealt with to-night could, I think, be very easily discussed in Committee; and the First Lord of the Treasury has foreshadowed the possibility of having them discussed upon a future Vote, or in some other way. But, as I understand it, there is one important measure which has occupied a large portion of the debate to-night, and upon which there has been as strong a consensus of opinion as the Secretary of State for War, during his long and distinguished career, has ever known. I refer to the proposed changes in regard to the Horse Artillery. I take it that we shall not be able to discuss that measure again if it is the fact that the Force, as it at present exists, will be broken up in April. My desire in mentioning the subject now is to ascertain if there is any possibility, in view of all that has been said here to-night, of the Secretary of State for War enabling the House of Commons to arrive at a conclusion on this subject by putting down the debate for some day prior to that on which the proposed change is to be effected?

DR. TANNER ["Oh, oh!" and cries of "Divide!"] I am merely standing up for absent Friends, and I should be wrong if I did not. I cannot understand why the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War is in such a great hurry to get these Votes. Probably some money may be wanted; but certainly it cannot be necessary for the right hon. Gentleman to get the whole amount. If I may suggest a compromise, I would say that the right hon. Gentleman would effect his purpose, while at the same time allowing us the opportunity for debate which we require, if he takes, say, one-half of the money on account. I think that is a reasonable proposal, and should meet with his acceptance. If he does accept it, the subject may be debated by Friends of mine who usually sit on these Benches, but who have gone away to-night thinking that no Votes would be taken. I object to the Government springing Votes like this upon the House, and attempting to rush them through at this hour of the night. It is not what the country would like or would endorse, nor is it fair to hon. Members who have gone away. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will see his way, at any rate, to meet us half-way. If he is not satisfied with what I have suggested, perhaps he will offer us some suggestion of his own which will enable hon. Gentlemen not present on this occasion to speak on this Vote.

COLONEL DUNCAN (Finsbury, Holborn): I am sure the majority of hon. Members present are anxious to meet the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, and to pass these Votes at once. It would be a great gratification to hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House if he would give us an assurance that we shall be able to have a further discussion on the question of the reduction of the Horse Artillery before that reduction takes place. With regard to the point raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), I think we should be assured that such a question as this, and questions which interest many other Members—questions connected with the paymasters and quartermasters—should be fully discussed in the House. If an assurance is given to us on that point, I hope hon. Members will consent to allow these two Votes to pass at once.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I desire to express agreement with what has fallen from the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just sat down. If these assurances are given to us by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, I am sure there will be no hesitation on the part of the House to agree to these Votes at once. There are many points we wish to discuss, and all we desire is an assurance that opportunities will be afforded us for discussing these matters.

MR. E. STANHOPE: The Government will be extremely glad to give hon. and gallant Gentlemen, and other Members of the House, an opportunity to discuss the points which have been mentioned on succeeding Votes; but we are in this difficulty. We are more or less under a promise to send these matters to a Select Committee. We shall probably set that Committee to work as soon as possible; and I am sure no Committee investigating a question so large and comprehensive as the Army and Navy Estimates will be able to complete its work in the Session unless it is enabled to commence at once.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): If this Committee passes the Vote, it will be beyond the province of a Select Committee to go into the matter.

MR. E. STANHOPE: There will be no difficulty in the world in the Committee going into this question. There will be no reason why it should not examine into expenditure.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): We can have a discussion on the Report of the Clothing Vote.

MR. W. H. SMITH: So far as we are concerned, the Government would afford full facilities for discussion. We will take care that the suggestion of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Finsbury (Colonel Duncan) will be taken cognizance of.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I have no doubt that the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury are all that we could desire; but, as a point of Order, I would say it is clear that if these Votes are passed in Committee of the Whole House and are agreed to, as they will be by the House to-morrow on Report, the Votes will be passed by the House, and will be ready for incorporation in the Appropriation Bill, and no Select Committee will be able to abate one jot from that Vote. With regard to the other point, whatever may be the willingness of the Government to meet the wishes of hon. Gentlemen in any part of the House, it would be absurd to move the reduction of the Clothing Vote because we want to effect a reduction in the Brigade of Guards, or to prevent a reduction in the Horse Artillery. It cannot be done. Any hon. Member rising to Order would be able to stop the thing at once. It would be absurd to move the disallowance of £30,000 in regard to the Brigade of Guards, or £22,000 because we disapproved of certain allowances in the Clothing Vote.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth): Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us the nature of the instructions to be given to the Select Committee on the Army and Navy Estimates?

MR. M. J. KENNY: What, may I ask, would be the value of any examination made by a Select Committee of a Vote already passed not only by the Committee of Ways and Means, but by the House—because the Report of Supply will be taken, I suppose, tomorrow? Such an examination, I contend, would be absolutely valueless. By the time the examination has concluded, goodness knows what change may not have taken place in the policy of the Government, which may make the recommendations of the Committee absolutely valueless for next year. I look upon the inquiry which it is proposed to hold as a mockery. We know that the Committee on Public Accounts discusses matters already debated, and we know that their inquiry is of very little use. I fail to see why the Government cannot allow the postponement of this Vote. Have the Government a reason for refusing it? Surely, if they have a reason, they can tell us what it is. Why do the Government require the whole of this money—why should they not take half of it? If they would do that it would enable us to raise discussions on questions in which we are interested, and the Government would be able to carry on the administration of the Army just as well as if they had the whole amount of the Vote.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I will give the House full particulars as to the appointment of the Committee as soon as I can. Generally, I may say we shall follow the usual precedent in such matters, and allow the Committee to inquire into the whole of the Votes, and report their observations to the House. As to what has fallen from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Kenny) opposite, who doubts of our proceeding, all I can say is that the Government are not especially anxious that the Votes should go to a Committee. We are prepared to take full responsibility for proposing the Estimates as they stand; but we conceive we are falling in with the general view of the House in assenting to the proposal for a Committee. We hope, therefore, that the House will assist us to pass the Vote.

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince): I would suggest for the consideration of the Government that, instead of disbanding the Horse Artillery Batteries, they should be allowed to take their turn for dismounted duty to act as Field Batteries.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): At this early hour in the morning I must say the Government would do well to postpone the Vote, in order to give us a fair opportunity of discussing it. Could they not take it on some other occasion? Personally, I have endeavoured not to obstruct the Government in any way. I have not spoken on the Supplementary Estimates, because the money we were asked to vote had been expended; but I certainly think that when the regular Estimates are brought in we ought to have a fair opportunity of criticizing them, especially when large Votes like the present are under consideration. Military men in this House are anxious, I know, to discuss these subjects, and we are bound in duty to our constituents to see that the money of the taxpayers is not wasted nor spent without fair discussion.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I should like to know whether now, or at any future time, we shall have an opportunity of placing before hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite certain matters connected with the Army that some of us have been asked to bring under their notice? I myself have had several grievances entrusted to me to bring before the House. I do not wish to make myself obnoxious to the House now, but I do want opportunity of speech.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I will undertake to give the hon. Member an opportunity of stating his views either in the House or to myself privately.

MR. CONYBEARE: We are to be asked to-night to vote £4,000,000 or more for the payment of men. When we have voted the men and money, when will opportunity present itself for hon. Members to discuss other questions connected with the Service?

MR. E. STANHOPE: He will be able to raise any point he likes before the Select Committee, and will also be able to do so in the House.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): He may not be a Member of the Select Committee.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): An hon. Member will not be able, on a future day, to do anything in the way of saving money. It seems to me that to raise subjects in the future will be a perfect farce.

MR. DEASY (Mayo, W.): I am sure that if the right hon. Gentleman can only see his way to the postponement of the consideration of this matter, such postponement will facilitate the passage of the remaining Army Estimates through the House. The Irish Members are in no way to blame for the state of things that prevails at the present time. The Government might have taken this Vote at any time during the past week or 10 days, or the past fortnight; but instead of doing so they have devoted their time and attention to the passage of Rules of Procedure which are altogether objectionable to hon. Gentlemen on these Benches. I will not further refer to that, however. What I want to impress upon hon. Members is that the Government really cannot want this Vote so much to-night. They could put it off until to-morrow or Thursday without the slightest inconvenience; and, that being the case, I would suggest, in the interest of Public Business and as tending to the more rapid discussion of the Army Estimates, that those Members who desire to express their own views and the views of their constituents on this Vote should have the opportunity for discussion which they desire. I may be told that they will have on the Report stage an opportunity of raising whatever objection they may have to certain sums contained in this Vote. But we know very well when the Report stage of these Votes will be taken—at 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning, perhaps, when we have been discussing the Rules of Procedure, or some other subject, for the whole night, and when most of us will have become perfectly disinclined to discuss the subject in the spirit that it deserves to be discussed in. We have no desire to obstruct the Business of the House to-night; but I would suggest that it would be much better for the Government themselves, from their own point of view, that they should accede to the request that has been made by hon. Members on both sides of the House. If they do accede to this request, they will find that they are promoting the Business of the country.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £4,522,000, Pay and Allowances.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.
Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

MOTIONS.

COPYRIGHT (MUSICAL COMPOSITIONS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Addison, Bill to amend the Law relating to the recovery of penalties for the unauthorized performance of Copyright Musical Compositions, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Addison, Mr. Jennings, Mr. Howorth, and Mr. Powell.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 195.]

COMMONS.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to consider every Report made by the Land Commissioners for England, certifying the expediency of any Provisional Order for the Enclosure or Regulation of a Common, and presented to the House during the last or present Sessions, before a Bill be brought in for the Confirmation of such Order.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power, in respect of each such Provisional Order, to inquire and report to the House whether the same should be confirmed by Parliament, and, if so, whether with or without modification; and, in the event of their being of opinion that the same should be confirmed, except subject to modifications, to report such modifications accordingly, with a view to such Provisional Order being remitted to the Land Commissioners.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of Twelve Members, Seven to be nominated by the House, and Five by the Committee of Selection:—Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Wroughton, Mr. Elton, Mr. Walter James, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Story-Maskelyne, and Mr. Richard Power, nominated Members of the said Committee.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. Stuart-Wortley.)

CRIMINAL LAW (SCOTLAND) PROCEDURE (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of The Lord Advocate, Bill to simplify and amend the Criminal Law of Scotland and its Procedure, and to alter the constitution of the Judiciary and Sheriff Courts in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Matthews, and Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 196.]

RATING OF MACHINERY BILL.

Mr. Houldsworth, Mr. Tomlinson, Mr. Whitely, Mr. Ewart, Mr. Mowbray, Sir Frederick Mappin, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Caldwell, Mr. Joseph Bolton, Mr. Donal Sullivan, Mr. Heneage, Mr. Staveley Hill, and Sir Bernhard Samuelson nominated Members of the Select Committee on Rating of Machinery Bill.

Ordered That Five be the quorum.—(Sir Bernhard Samuelson.)

FOYNES HARBOUR (TRANSFER) BILL.

Order [24th February] for committing the Foynes Harbour (Transfer) Bill to a Select Committee read, and discharged.

Ordered, That the Bill be withdrawn.—(Mr. Jackson.)

House adjourned at ten minutes before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 15th March, 1887.

MINUTES.] — PUBLIC BILLS — Committee — Church Patronage (26).

Report—Justices' Jurisdiction* (24).

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL—Committee—Report—Local Government (Ireland) (Carrick-on-Suir)* (30).

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—COURTHOUSES — ACCOMMODATION FOR PRISONERS AWAITING TRIAL.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON, in rising to ask, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to lay before Parliament the Report of the Committee appointed by the Home Department to inquire into the state of the lock-ups and other places in which prisoners await trial in various parts of the country? said, they were now approaching Quarter Sessions, when the question to which the Report related could be considered by the County Authorities, and for many reasons it would be well for the Report to be circulated. In some cases the work required to set matters right would entail but a small outlay; though in other cases the expense would, no doubt, be considerable.

THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (Earl BEAUCHAMP): My Lords, the Paper referred to by the noble Marquess has been presented to Parliament, and was circulated among your Lordships on Friday. The Paper is a small one, and as a large number of Blue Books was circulated on the same day the small Paper possibly escaped the attention of the noble Marquess. The question was a grave one, and as soon as the Report reached the Home Secretary he took it into his consideration and addressed a Circular to all the County and Borough Authorities in England, inviting their consideration to the matter, as they were the parties with whom its settlement mainly rested. But those matters did not rest entirely with those authorities, as the sanction of the Treasury might be necessary before any expenditure was incurred.

CHURCH PATRONAGE BILL.—(No. 26.)

(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Rights of alienation).

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) said, that the object of the Amendment which he had put upon the Paper was to carry out the view which he ventured to express when the Bill was before their Lordships on the second reading, and that was altogether to get rid of the Council of Presentations. It appeared to him that the Council would be highly objectionable, as it introduced the principle of election into the management of Church patronage. He also objected to it because it would place a man on his trial as to his character before Judges who would be, in a great measure, elected Judges. But the greatest objection of all was, that it would remove from the Bishop that responsibility which he ought to exercise in this matter, which was partly his, and which he could discharge much better than a Council or anyone else. His desire was to remove the Council of Presentations altogether from the Bill. Such a Council as proposed would be placed in an anomalous position if deprived of its jurisdiction in regard to presentations, because it would be endowed with functions which it would rarely have to discharge. The first remaining function it was proposed to entrust to it was to decide whether the sale of an advowson should take place; and the second was to accept advowsons from those persons who should be willing to entrust them to it, when the sale of advowsons to agents and by auction had been destroyed. There would rarely be any advowsons sold, and it would be hardly necessary to bring such an elaborate elective

Council as that proposed by the Bill into existence to perform functions which it would seldom or never be called upon to perform. The Council was to be elected by a double kind of election, and if there was no work for the Council to do, they would hardly get people to go through so much trouble. The whole thing would become rusty and obsolete. If the duty of the Council, then, was only to say whether a sale of an advowson should take place, it had much better be appointed in a more simple manner. As to accepting advowsons from persons desirous of presenting them to the Council, the duty would be almost a sinecure. When did the most rev. Prelate ever hear of a person desirous of handing over his right of presentation to an elective body? Such an occurrence would not happen once in 100 years, and he urged that it would be rather a rash process to call into existence a Council for this purpose only. The best settlement, under the circumstances, would be to purge the Bill of this Council of Presentations; and in pursuance of that object he would move an Amendment constituting a Council of the Archdeacon, the Chancellor of the Diocese, the Rural Dean, and two laymen to be nominated by the Lord Chancellor. The object of placing the Archdeacon and Rural Dean on the Council was to insure that it possessed local knowledge. The duties which the Council he proposed to appoint would have to perform would be to determine whether, in case of the sale of an advowson, the purchaser was a person who ought to hold the patronage or not. The point he wished to press upon the House was, that the elective Council proposed by the Bill must be got rid of, as it was hardly worth while keeping such elaborate machinery in existence merely for the purpose of judging as to the character of the purchasers in the rare cases where advowsons were sold. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice:—

Amendment moved, page 1, line 8, leave out Sub-section (1.) and insert:—

“(1.) A right of patronage shall not after the commencement of this Act be sold until the proposed purchaser is certified under this section to be a fit person to possess such right of patronage.

“(2.) A person desiring to sell his right of patronage in any diocese shall apply in writing to the bishop of that diocese for the said certificate, and the bishop shall refer the application to a commission, consisting of the archdeacon as he may nominate, the chancellor of the diocese, the rural dean, and such two laymen as may, on the application of the bishop, be appointed by the Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain in each case.

“(3.) If any three members of such commission consider the proposed purchaser to be a fit person to possess the right of patronage proposed to be sold, they shall certify the same in writing under their hands, and cause such certificate to be sent to the applicant for the same.

“(4.) The commission may make such inquiry into the circumstances of the proposed sale, and the position and character of the proposed purchaser, as they may think necessary, and before refusing a certificate shall give the persons concerned, or any of them who desires it, an opportunity of attending before the commission and giving such explanations as they or he think fit.

“(5.) The acts and proceedings of the commission shall be conducted in accordance with the prescribed regulations.

“(6.) The bishop shall, as soon as practicable after receiving an application under this section, cause the commission to be formed and take into consideration the application, and shall, within four months at most after the application, inform the applicant of the result thereof.

“(7.) For the purposes of this section, ‘sale’ includes any transfer in consideration of money or money’s worth.”—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he considered it was of the greatest importance that the Bishop of the Diocese should be kept free from all sales of presentations. He, therefore, asked whether the noble Marquess would go a step further and keep the Bishop of the Diocese clear from all sales of patronage? He did not see any objection in principle to the proposed Amendment; but he should wish to see the Chancellor of the Diocese substituted for the Bishop in regard to taking cognizance of the sales of advowsons.

LORD GRIMTHORPE said, he saw no use in all this meddling with patrons, now that they had given the Bishops sufficient control over presentations—as he had himself proposed on the second reading—and seeing that Papists, Jews, Dissenters, and Atheists, who were all hostile to the Church, and trustees and executors, who might not care about it, or the parish, had full right to present. Surely people who bought advowsons were more likely to make good presentations than they were. Notwithstanding the most rev. Prelate's assurances that the Bishops had not the least intention to injure private patrons, two Bishops in the York Convocation had distinctly intimated in speeches, which he quoted, their wish to make it altogether unsaleable, and he had letters saying that some families would be ruined thereby. It was not desirable to make too many experiments at once. It would tend to lower the character of the clergymen if their patrons were subject to an examination as to their fitness to buy, and if a Council were to make inquiries behind their backs as to their qualifications, and were to listen to any gossip about them. It was to be presumed that purchasers of advowsons were fit men, and the proposed Council was quite unfit to try them.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD said, he had placed upon the Paper an Amendment of the same scope and tendency as that of the noble Marquess. He thought that under the Bill the Bishop would be sufficiently powerful to do all that it was proposed should be done by a Council, and that he could do it in a better way. He thought that a Council would be a useless encumbrance, and that the machinery of the Bill was altogether out of proportion to the evils it was intended to remedy. This question was often regarded as a question of Church reform; it was, in reality, a question of Church defence. What the Church really asked for was protection against the scandals introduced into the Church by persons from without, and the great object of the Bill ought to be to hinder such transactions, but beyond that to allow the sale of advowsons and the transfer of livings to be sanctioned wherever they were bona fide. Up to the present time, the Church had no share in such transactions as the purchase or sale of livings; but if this Bill were passed in its present form they would have archdeacons and others going into the market to purchase alongside the jobbers. It would be really discreditable to the Church that a Council appointed at her suggestion should be entrusted with the power of going into the market to purchase livings. The Bishop had a Council—and he had made use of it for many years—his own Cathedral Chapter, by which he would be much better aided than by the Council proposed in the Bill.

Lord Grimthorpe

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, he had always thought the object to be aimed at was to cut off the direct purchase of next presentations, and to throw some safeguards around the sale of advowsons, for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of preventing that from being done indirectly which ought not to be done directly—namely, the purchase of the spiritual office, with cure of souls.

LORD HERSCHELL said, that the sub-section provided that the Bishop should, within four months after the application, inform the proposed purchaser of the result, but no penalty was attached to non-compliance. He would suggest that that objection might be met by providing that if within four months no answer was received the sale might proceed.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY hoped that the clause of the noble Marquess would be accepted. He could not see any religious objection to the law providing that some means should be taken to secure that the patron should be a fit person to possess such a right of patronage. He hoped, however, that, instead of the Bishop, the Chancellor or Vicar General would be named; because from time to time Bishops certainly would refuse to take any part whatever with respect to sales. He would ask whether the noble Lord behind him had not misunderstood the expression in the 2nd clause as to the application of the Bishop? He did not understand that the Bishop was to suggest two names to the Lord Chancellor, but to make application to the Lord Chancellor to appoint two such persons as he should think fit.

Amendment amended.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, there was a great anxiety felt that the Bishops should not be at all brought into this matter, and he would suggest to the noble Marquess that all through the sub-sections of his Amendment the "Chancellor of the diocese" should be called upon to act instead of "the Bishop."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he would consent to the alteration desired by his right rev. Friend being made in his Amendment, the words "Chancellor of the diocese" being substituted for "the Bishop."

Amendment further amended, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 amended, and agreed to.

On the Motion of The Marquess of SALISBURY, Clause 4 struck out of the Bill.

Clause 5 amended, and agreed to.

Clause 6 (Registration of transfers).

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD said, the Amendment he was about to move had for its object the prevention of the traffic in the sale of livings. He therefore trusted their Lordships would give it their favourable consideration.

Amendment moved, in page 3, line 29, after ("prescribed") insert—

"No grant or assignment of any right of patronage in consideration of money or money's worth shall be valid within a period of five years from the date at which the said right of patronage shall previously have been so granted or assigned, unless on occasion of the death of the patron for the time being."—(The Lord Bishop of Lichfield.)

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK) said, he did not think the adoption of the hard-and-fast line of the Amendment would be desirable, when the Bill provided an inquiry in the case of a sale.

LORD GRIMTHORPE opposed the Amendment.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he thought the better course would be to leave the consideration of this matter over until the Report, when it might be again proposed in an amended form.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved, after Clause 6, to insert the following clause:—

(7.) "The provisions of the Lord Chancellor's Augmentation Act, 1863, shall extend to all benefices in Wales of a yearly value of less than two hundred and fifty pounds in the gift of the Lord Chancellor and which are not named in the schedule of the said Act."

THE EARL OF SELBORNE opposed the clause.

Clause negatived.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved to insert the following clause:—

(8.) "It shall be lawful for the Archbishops and Bishops, if they think fit, to sell the patronage of benefices in their gift in accordance with the provisions of the Lord Chancellor's Augmentation Act, 1863."

Clause negatived.

On the Motion of The Marquess of SALISBURY, Clauses 7 to 13, inclusive, struck out of the Bill.

Clause 14 amended, and agreed to.

Clause 15 (Letters testimonial).

LORD GRIMTHORPE, in moving, as an Amendment, in Sub-section 1, to leave out the words "in the form now usual, or if any form be prescribed," said, that clergymen desirous of giving testimonials in the usual form were sometimes in the difficulty that, although they were perfectly willing to testify to the presentee's good character, they were unable to say, in the words of the usual form, that they had never "heard" anything to the contrary, because they had heard it and found it to be utterly untrue. The present form had been decided in "Marshall v. Bishop of Exeter" not to be legally requirable.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 16 (Objections by parishioners).

On the Motion of The Marquess of SALISBURY, the following Amendments made:—In page 8, line 3, leave out ("on the Council of Presentations to advise him to refuse"); leave out Sub-sections (4.), (5.), (6.), (7.)

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 17 (Grounds of Bishop's refusal to institute).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in moving, as an Amendment, to leave out Sub-sections 1 and 2, in order to insert these words—

"The Bishop may refuse to institute any presentee who appears to the Bishop to be unfitted for the discharge of his pastoral duty by reason of physical infirmity, of pecuniary embarrassment, or of his evil life," said, they proposed to limit the grounds on which a Bishop might object to a presentee. The conditions in the Bill were rather wider than those in his Amendment. The Bishop's discretion ought not, in his opinion, to be extended so far as the Bill carried it. No doubt it was right to exclude aged clergymen, wherever age carried with it physical or mental infirmity; but there was nothing to create a presumption that every man of 70 was unfit to discharge important duties. It was often the case that the most important functions were performed by men over 70, and he saw no reason, therefore, why the attainment of that age should be a ground for the Bishop's refusing to institute, as proposed by the clause. Nor could he understand why it should be a ground of rejection, as proposed, that the presentee had not been in Priests' Orders two years. By a side-blow, in a Bill of this kind, it was proposed to introduce into the Church a new order of men capable of being curates, but not of being incumbents. Then, again, he could not agree with the third reason for non-institution, that some question ought to be further investigated with regard to a presentee. How could their Lordships tell what questions required further investigation? The Amendment which he now proposed recognized the responsibility of the Bishop within certain well-understood limits. The discretion of the Bishop to reject a presentee was made absolute by the Amendment in the case of physical infirmity, pecuniary embarrassment, or evil life.

Amendment moved, to leave out Sub-sections (1.), (2.); and in page 9, line 19, after ("section") insert as a separate sub-section—

"The Bishop may refuse to institute any presentee who appears to the Bishop to be unfitted for the discharge of his pastoral duty by reason of physical infirmity, of pecuniary embarrassment, or of his evil life."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE BISHOP OF CHICHESTER said, he thought that the provision of the Bill enabling Bishops to refuse to institute a presentee who had not been in Priests' Orders two years ought to be sustained. If it were struck out of the clause, the rectorship of a parish might be given to a young person ordained at 23 years of age. The important duties of a rector ought not to be given to a young man immediately on taking Priests' Orders, and after having only been in Deacons' Orders one year.

LORD BRABOURNE said, that the remarkable feature of the present Bill was the reluctance of the Bishops to take responsibility upon themselves. He was of opinion that it was better to give the Bishops a wider discretion than even that proposed by the Amendment, as otherwise some loophole would be offered through which improper presentees would slip. There might be valid causes for refusal of institution apart from those set forth in the Amendment of the noble Marquess. For instance, if a Bishop had reason to know that a particular individual was so obnoxious to a parish that his ministration therein was almost certain to be a failure, it might be well for both the parish and the clergyman that there should be discretion to refuse institution. If their Lordships had confidence in the Bishops this discretion might well be given.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that he would not oppose the Amendment of the noble Marquess, but he thought it would be a great advantage to the Church if it were made requisite before a young man undertook the duties of an incumbent that he should spend some time, say at least two years, in learning them while acting as curate. He would be rather inclined to make it necessary that a man must be in Priests' Orders five years instead of two before being eligible for a living, as he looked upon the latter term as being too short a one, instead of being too long.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, he did not think two years' probation would be too much; and he was willing that the Bishop should have power to refuse institution to a man over 70 years of age, because he felt sure that such a power would not be in all cases arbitrarily exercised. He agreed with the noble Marquess that the attainment of 70 years of age was not of itself a disqualification, in all cases, for the duties of a rector, if unaccompanied by mental or physical infirmity.

LORD GRIMTHORPE said, he thought that the Church Discipline Act worked better than this Act would work, as this would enable a Bishop to be judge himself, without resorting to a Court for a decision. He was decidedly in favour of the Amendment of the noble Marquess.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that one of the objects of the Amendment was to prevent what was known abroad by the term chantage—namely, the attempt to make people pay for silence.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, he thought the Amendment, as it stood, inadequate, so far as "evil life" was concerned. To condemn a man on the ground of evil life would be unjust, unless the charge of evil living were judicially investigated and regularly proved. But there might be scandal so grave and so notorious as to be, both in reason and on the principles of ecclesiastical law, as sound an objection to the presentee as if the justice of the charge were ever so clearly proved. He would propose, as an addition, after the words "evil life," the insertion of the words—

"Or such grave scandal or evil report concerning his moral conduct that he ought not to be instituted to the benefice in question."

LORD GRIMTHORPE objected to the suggestion; because this ground might really have no foundation in fact.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that the question raised by his noble and learned Friend (the Earl of Selborne) was a very difficult one; but, on the whole, he thought it would be better not to insert such a ground. They knew how easily scandal was raised, and great injustice might be done a presentee by such a provision.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE contended that, without the insertion of the provision he had mentioned, a Bishop might be unable to prevent the presentation of a man whose reputation was such that he could do no good in a new parish, and that the effect of the addition of the words would really be to prevent the few patrons who might be capable of presenting such men from ever doing so.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that he had no objection to the alteration of his Amendment as proposed by the noble and learned Earl.

Amendment amended, and agreed to.

LORD GRIMTHORPE said, that he had put on the Paper three Amendments in succession, all of which raised the very important question to whom the appeal should be from the Bishop. Their Lordships had to consider in this matter what was likely to give satisfaction to the persons involved in those proceedings, the presentee, and the person presenting. It was very important that the appeal should not be, as proposed in the Bill, from the Bishop to the Archbishop of the Province. And, therefore, he proposed in page 9, lines 25 and 26, to leave out the words "Archbishop of the Province," in order to in-

"Three other bishops, of whom one shall be nominated by the bishop refusing institution, another by the presentee, and the third agreed on by the other two, and he shall preside, and those three shall be called the bishops of appeal; but none shall be bound to act without his own consent."

Nobody could read the newspapers without seeing that whatever was done by a Bishop or Archbishop of one way of thinking was sure to be found fault with by persons of a different school of thought. If the appeal was from a Bishop to an Archbishop whose leanings were known there would be great dissatisfaction. The matter was one which did not involve any great amount of argument; but he believed the effect of the Amendment would be to enable the public generally to see that what was done was done without prejudice. He thought it was extremely important that the public should believe that justice was done, and that none should be able to say that a refusal had been made because the principles of the presentee were disliked by the Bishop. Their Lordships would recollect how the late Bishop of Manchester was attacked by two or three Deans for exercising his discretion not to allow what he said would be anarchy in the diocese. Could there be any better mode invented for giving a satisfactory appeal than that proposed by his Amendment? If a better one could be brought forward he should be ready to adopt it. What he proposed was analogous to the practice adopted in many other cases where questions were referred to arbitration; and he believed it would give security to the public that the action taken was fair and impartial. The Bill itself gave an appeal from the Archbishop to three Bishops when the Archbishop had the primary jurisdiction, so that there was no question of dignity involved.

Amendment moved,

In page 9, line 22, leave out ("in the prescribed form"); lines 25 and 26, leave out ("the archbishop of the province") and insert ("three other bishops, of whom one shall be nominated by the bishop refusing institution, another by the presentee, and the third agreed on by the other two, and he shall preside, and those three shall be called the bishops of appeal, but none shall be bound to act without his own consent"); line 29, leave out ("archbishop") and insert ("bishops of appeal"); line 31, leave out from ("The") to the end of the subsection and insert ("bishops shall hear the case both originally and on appeal in the presence of such persons only as they shall think necessary or for some special reason expedient, and not in public, and with such legal assistance as they may think fit"); line 34, leave out subsection (6.) and insert ("The decision of the bishops of appeal, or any two of them, shall be given in writing to the presentee and the bishop who refused him, and if it is in favour of the presentee he shall have a right to be instituted as soon as possible by the bishop or his vicar-general"); line 38, leave out subsection (7.)."

—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, he could not agree to displacing the Archbishop altogether; but if their Lordships thought that the whole responsibility should not be thrown on the Archbishop, they could direct that there should be episcopal assessors appointed to act with him.

LORD GRIMTHORPE said, that he had no objection to the alteration proposed by his noble and learned Friend. It would fully meet his view.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he thought it would be better to leave the responsibility wholly to the Archbishop; it would be placing the Bishops in an invidious position to make them act as arbitrators or assessors.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 18 and 19 separately agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 20 (Roman Catholic patron may nominate).

On the Motion of The Lord GRIMTHORPE, the following Amendments made:—In page 10, line 23, leave out from ("section") to end of line 34, and insert—

("Notwithstanding any existing Act, a Roman Catholic patron may present to a benefice on the same conditions as any other patron, but the Bishop may refuse the presentee unless he is satisfied that he is a bona fide member of the Church of England, and has duly had episcopal ordination as a priest.")

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 21 agreed to.

Clause 22 (Lunacy of incumbent).

Amendment moved, in line 24, to leave out from ("or") to ("the") in line 29, and insert—

("Where it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Bishop that any incumbent has for two whole years been prevented by any infirmity of mind or body from performing the duties of his office.")—(The Earl Cowper.)

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD said, that the Amendment would inflict a hardship in a large number of cases where two years' rest was required to restore an incumbent to health.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that if a clergyman were negligent, and were not quite unable to perform some duty, he might evade the operation of the Amendment by doing some duty just before the two years had been completed. At the same time that the Amendment would thus not enable a parish to get rid of a negligent incumbent, he agreed that it would inflict a hardship in many cases.

On the suggestion of The Marquess of SALISBURY,

EARL COWPER said, he would bring up the Amendment on Report in a different form, by which provision should be made for the outgoing incumbent.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 23 to 26, inclusive, agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 27 (Order in Council).

VISCOUNT ORANBROOK, in moving the following Amendments:—In page 13, line 23, leave out—

("Her Majesty may from time to time, by Order in Council, made upon the recommendation of");

line 25, after ("York") insert ("may"); line 31, leave out ("Order in Council") and insert ("rule made"); line 37, leave out ("or Order"); line 38, after ("Order") insert ("in Council"), and after ("same") insert ("and any rule so annulled shall thenceforth be of no effect"); and in line 40, leave out from ("rule") to end of clause and insert ("every such rule shall, while in force, have effect as if enacted in this Act"), said, he did so because it was thought better that these Rules should be laid before Parliament on the responsibility of those who made the Rules, and not as "Orders in Council."

Amendments agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to, with Amendments.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 44.)

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter
past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 15th March, 1887.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee Resolutions [March 14] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered — First Reading — Bankruptcy Offices (Sites) * [197].
Second Reading—Truck, * [109].

QUESTIONS.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY — DETECTIVE CONSTABLE P. MONOHAN.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Detective Constable Peter Monohan was taken in custody on Thursday, 3rd March, at Killarney, for being drunk and disorderly, and for having while in that condition assaulted a young man named Shea, breaking the bridge of his nose, and injuring his eye; whether the said constable was merely reprimanded, and ordered to resume his duty; and, whether he will see fit to order an inquiry into the circumstances of the case? I should like to supplement the Question by asking whether the young man Shea has lost the use of his eye since, and also whether any previous conviction has been recorded against Monohan?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The hon. Member must give me Notice of the latter Question. With reference to the Question on the Paper, it is not a fact that the constable named was taken into custody for being drunk and disorderly. When accused by his Head Constable, he admitted having been intoxicated, and for this breach of discipline he was fined by the Inspector General and reduced in position. He denied having assaulted Shea, and the latter refused to prosecute. Shea was not injured in the manner described.

DR. TANNER: Will any further action be taken in the matter? Will Monohan continue to be employed as a detective after being drunk and disorderly?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The matter has been already dealt with.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—MR. JAMES SIMMS, DRUMLANE, CO. DERRY.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a series of outrages perpetrated on an Ulster Protestant Nationalist, named Mr. James Simms, of Drumlane, near Maghera, County Derry, and reported in The Belfast Morning News of the 8th March instant; whether, as therein stated, Mr. Simms did, in consequence of having assisted to return Mr. Healy to Parliament as Member for South Derry at the November Election, 1885, suffer serious loss and injury by the damage done to his crops, which were, during the night time, maliciously dug up and scattered about or destroyed on several occasions; whether, since the last General Election (when Mr. Simms again supported Mr. Healy), a quantity of flax was taken from his store and maliciously burned in an adjoining field; whether, about a week ago, some persons maliciously set fire to and wholly destroyed "a splendid granary" belonging to Mr. Simms, and in which he had valuable property stored; whether any arrests have been made in connection with these outrages; and, what steps the authorities have taken in the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I, of course, know nothing of what Mr. Simms may have done in respect of the Elections; but I understand that he states to the Constabulary that he did not, in 1885, take the part attributed to him in the Question. The injuries to his crops appear to be much exaggerated. For the burning of a barn which occurred about a fortnight ago he claims £100 compensation. This claim will be fully investigated in ordinary course. No arrests have been made as yet; but the police have the matter in hand, and meanwhile are affording protection to Mr. Simms's property by special patrolling.

MR. M'CARTAN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if it be true that a quantity of flax was taken from his store and burned? That is a Question which has not been answered.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think, Sir, some flax was taken on the 18th of January and burned in an adjoining field.

COMMISSIONERS OF IRISH LIGHTS—CARLINGFORD LOUGH LIGHT-KEEPERS' HOUSES.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether he can state the cause of delay on the part of the Irish Lights Commissioners in building the dwelling houses for the keepers of the leading lights, Carlingford Lough; what was the amount of purchase-money paid for the building ground; the annual rent of the site; and the rent now paid for lodgings for the keepers; and, whether he can state definitely when the buildings will be commenced?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The erection of these dwellings during the current financial year was, with the consent of the Commissioners of Irish Lights, postponed in favour of more urgent works. No purchase money has been paid for the building ground; but an annual rent of £7 1s. 9d. has been sanctioned for the site on a lease for 150 years, and £40 has been paid as compensation for disturbance of existing tenants; £48 is at present paid annually for lodgings for the keepers, and the estimated cost of erecting the dwellings is £1,876. The Board of Trade are prepared to sanction the expenditure for erecting these dwellings during the year 1887-8, and it will rest with the Commissioners of Irish Lights to carry out the work.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—LOANS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he can state the amount of the local loans sanctioned by the Local Government Board during the last financial year; whether there has been an increase or decrease in the amount as compared with the preceding year; and, whether loans have been contracted without the sanction of the Government; and, if so, to what amount?

THE PRESIDENT (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The total amount of the loans sanctioned by the Local Government Board to be raised by Local Authorities during the year ended December 31, 1886, was £2,827,867, being a decrease of £459,054 as compared with the total amount so sanctioned during the preceding year. The Board have no information as to the amount of the local loans which were contracted during the year without the sanction of any Central Department; but it may be stated that the total amount of the specific sums which by local Acts passed during the year were authorized to be raised by Sanitary Authorities and Municipal Corporations without the sanction of any Central Department was £1,496,287.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will state the number of Bills introduced into the House of Commons by Private Members during the last six years, and the number of such Bills which have been passed into law?

THE SECRETARY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.), in reply, said, the total number of Private Members' Bills between 1881 and 1886, inclusive, was 825, while the number of those Bills which received the Royal Assent was 117.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: In consequence of the answer just given, Mr. Speaker, I beg to give Notice on an early day to call attention to the increasing number of Bills introduced by Private Members for the purpose of ventilating their own particular crotchets, to the unscientific drafting of such Bills, and to the waste of the public money and time in printing and discussing them; and to move—

"That provision ought no longer to be made in the Estimates for the printing and publication of Private Members' Bills."

INDIA—MADRAS BOARD OF REVENUE —STATEMENT OF MR. THOMAS.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been directed to the statement of Mr. Thomas, senior member of the Madras Board of Revenue, in his Report on the current Tanjore Remission Scandal, that a widespread conspiracy exists, and that the district officials are too much interested in land; and, whether uncovenanted officials are forbidden to hold land in their districts; and, if so, whether any collector has, during the past 10 years, brought to the notice of Government that the Tanjore officials habitually contravene the Regulations in the matter of land holding?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) Chatham: The Secretary of State's attention has been directed to the Report in question, and a despatch has been sent to the Governor of Madras on the subject. Uncovenanted officials who exercise independent judicial or revenue functions are forbidden to hold land in their districts; but I am not aware that any collector has, within the last 10 years, brought to the notice of the Governor of Madras that the Tanjore officials contravene this Regulation habitually.

INLAND REVENUE—INCOME TAX ON AMERICAN FLOUR MILLS COMPANIES.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Pittsbury's or Washburn Flour Mills Companies of America, who send large quantities of flour here on consignment, pay any Income Tax; and, if not, whether he will take steps to oblige them to do so, and thus remedy an injustice to our English millers?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): Foreign Companies or persons sending goods or produce to this country are not assessable unless they carry on business in this country, either themselves, or through agents coming within the provisions of the Income Tax Act of 1842, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 41. If the hon. Gentleman will give the Income Tax collectors any assistance in discovering such Companies as ought to, and do not, pay Income Tax, he will, I feel sure, find them most grateful and receive every encouragement.

IRELAND—THE ORANGE ORGANIZATION—UNION OFFICIALS.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) (for Mr. T. M. HEALY) (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Are Union officials allowed by the Local Government Board to be members of the Orange organization; is it contrary to rule that they should deliver public speeches; will he invite the attention of the Local Government Board to the speech of Brother Hugh Johnson, Master of Orange Lodge 269, an officer of Magherafelt Union, reported in The Belfast Weekly News of 5th March, as follows:—

"He then urged on all the brethren to be more united than ever, and to beware of all traitors, showing the possibility of there being in all societies Lundys and traitors; and, holding in his hand a Report of the Grand Orange Lodge of Ireland, proved the truth of his assertion that even in their own locality they were under the painful necessity of expelling perjured 'traitors' from their ranks;"

and, whether he has any reason to believe that the persons so named as traitors on the list of the Grand Orange Lodge of Ireland are in danger of outrage; and, if so, will he afford them police protection?

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) asked, before the right hon. Gentleman answered the Question, if he was not aware that this charge was a pure fabrication; and whether there was in the Grand Orange Lodge of Ireland such number as that of the Lodge specified in the Question, and therefore if there was any necessity for affording police protection to parties as suggested in the Question?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the statement made by my hon. Friend (Mr. Johnston), though all I know about the matter is derived from half-a-minute's inspection of one of the Rules of the Orange Society shown to me by my hon. Friend. With regard to the Question on the Paper, there is no rule of the Local Government Board on the subject of Union officials being members of the Orange Organization. The only officer of the Magherafelt Union who bears the name of Hugh Johnston is the shoemaker of the workhouse. If the hon. and learned Member will give me the names of any persons whom he thinks might be endangered by anything in the speech referred to, I shall communicate with the Local Authorities. I think myself his fears are unfounded.

RIVER THAMES—THE WATER COMPANIES—THE SEWAGE SYSTEM.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, in view of the large profits derived by the Metropolitan Water Companies and the Conservators of the River Thames from the sale of the water of that river, it is possible for the Local Government Board to oblige those Bodies to devote some part of the sums received to help to defray the cost of diverting the sewage from the river; and, if not, whether, in the case of the town of Staines, which while deprived of its ancient outlet for sewage derives no profit or advantage from such sale of its water, and where the sewage system required by the Board, as proved by Mr. Hawkley's Report, will involve the financial ruin of the town, he will promote any scheme to defray part of the necessary cost of her own requisitions?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The sums to be paid to the Conservators of the River Thames by the Metropolitan Water Companies are fixed by statute, and the Local Government Board have no powers in the matter. With regard to the Staines Local Board, I regret to state that they have long evaded their statutory duty, with the result that the Thames has been polluted with the sewage of the district. It devolves on the Staines Local Board, as is the case with every other Sanitary Authority, to defray the cost of any sewerage works which are required for their district. No doubt, the cost to Staines will be heavy; but it is impossible for me to promote any scheme for the purpose of relieving the Staines district of the burden which it must undertake.

LAW AND JUSTICE — COURT HOUSES —ACCOMMODATION OF UNTRIED PRISONERS.

LORD ELCHO (Ipswich) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in all cases when, in consequence of the Report of the Committee on the Accommodation of Untried Prisoners, it is proposed to rebuild, extend, or otherwise alter the proposed accommodation, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to examine the plans before the proposed works are carried out, in order to see that the intended alterations comply with the recommendation of the Committee, and are in every respect suited to the requirements of the case?

Mr. Dixon-Hartland

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): In the Circular which I have lately issued, I have invited the Local Authorities to communicate with me what works they propose to undertake. Such communications I shall refer to the Surveyor General of Prisons, and, acting on his advice, shall inform the Local Authorities of my own opinion on their proposals; and by these means I hope, not only that the accommodation may be brought up to a proper standard, but also that any useless expense may be avoided.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON BI-METALLISM.

Mr. HOWORTH (Salford, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, as the Chairman of the Royal Commission on Bi-metallism, If, in view of the great interest taken in the subject by the mercantile community, it would be possible to publish a weekly présis or abstract of the evidence?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, that to his great regret he was no longer Chairman of the Currency Commission, and the Question should be addressed to his successor, or his Representative in the House of Commons. When, however, an analogous Question came under his notice, when he was Chairman of the Commission, he replied that he felt it to be very unusual and inexpedient to publish evidence in the manner proposed.

Mr. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.) inquired who was now the Chairman of the Commission?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR believed that his successor was not yet appointed. The Question had better be addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

WAR OFFICE—SIGHT TEST FOR CANDIDATES FOR COMMISSIONS.

SIR GUYER HUNTER (Hackney, Central) asked the Secretary of State for War, Where the Regulations which have recently been laid down for testing the sight of candidates for commissions, stated to be now in force, are to be found, and when they were published?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The Regulations referred to are in Clause 53 of the Army Circular, dated the 1st of March, 1887, and are to be found at page 807 of the Army List.

ILLEGAL MEETINGS (IRELAND)— STREET BANDS.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether, by statute or otherwise, Resident Magistrates in Ireland are entitled to prevent bands playing in the public streets, on the grounds that the persons forming such bands are about to attend a meeting in another town or place; and, whether the possibility of such persons attending an illegal meeting at a future time renders their conduct illegal, and entitles the police to disperse them?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The hon. Gentleman asks me for an abstract legal opinion, which it is impossible for anyone to give. Magistrates, by the Common Law, would, under certain circumstances, be entitled to disperse a band playing in the public streets, and such a right has often been exercised by them to the great advantage of the public peace. The fact that the persons composing the band are proceeding to attend a meeting in another place may afford legal grounds for the magistrate causing them to disperse; but each case must be judged of by its own circumstances.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL—THEIR NORTHERN ESTATES.

SIR SAMUEL WILSON (Portsmouth) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, The estimated present capital value of the Northern Estates belonging to the Greenwich Hospital, the outlay on them each year for the last five years, and the annual net return each year for the same period?

MR. ASHMEAD BARTLETT (A LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY) (Sheffield, Ecclesall) (who replied) said: The present gross farm rental from the Northern Estates of Greenwich Hospital is estimated at £8,260; and if the farm property were sold on the same terms as were obtained at the last sales in 1882 and 1884 (about 30 years' purchase on the average) it would produce a capital sum of £247,800. It is not possible to arrive at the capital value of the minerals. The outlay on the Northern Estates, and the net return of income (including minerals) for the last five years, are as follows:—1881-2, outlay £10,734, net return £13,156; 1882-3, outlay £6,988, net return £15,773; 1883-4, outlay £6,393, net return £12,349; 1884-5, outlay £6,229, net return £6,645; 1885-6, outlay £4,618, net return £7,418. For 1883-4 and 1884-5 the net returns are given less on account of sales of portions of the estate in these years.

In reply to Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.),

MR. ASHMEAD BARTLETT said that the return for minerals alone for the year 1886 was £3,700.

ZANZIBAR—BOMBARDMENT OF MINENGANI BY THE PORTUGUESE.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that, on February 16th, after a few hours' notice, the Portuguese bombarded Minengani, the British quarter on the Bay of Tungi, in Zanzibar, and that, after the bombardment, a party of Portuguese sailors landed, and burnt and destroyed all the private property which British subjects had been obliged to leave behind; whether a protest and application for redress has been lodged by the sufferers with the British Consul at Zanzibar; whether anything has resulted from the representations which the British Foreign Office addressed to the Portuguese Government on the subject of the rupture between Portugal and Zanzibar; and, whether, if the report as to the bombardment of Minengani be correct, any steps have been taken effectively to protect British subjects and interests?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Some British-Indian subjects have arrived at Zanzibar from Minengani, and have informed the Acting Consul General that their property has been destroyed by the Portuguese; but no further particulars have yet been reported. Her Majesty's ship Rosindore left for Tungi Bay on the 13th, with instructions to ascertain and report what had taken place. The Portuguese Government have assented, on the representations of England and Germany, to stop hostilities, restore to the Sultan the captured vessel, and enter upon negotiations with His Highness with regard to the territory in dispute. Her Majesty's Government will take such steps on behalf of British subjects and interests as may be required when the facts of the case have been properly ascertained. In the meantime, Her Majesty's Acting Consul General at Zanzibar has been affording relief to those British subjects who have been rendered necessitous by the events at Tungi Bay.

POOR LAW (ENGLAND AND WALES)— "BOARDING OUT" OF PAUPER CHILDREN.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Why the principle of "boarding out" of pauper children is not more generally adopted; if his attention has been called to that part of the Report of the Local Government Board that whilst, in one case, the average weekly cost of children in the workhouse was found to be 3s. 7½d., as against 2s. 7½d. in a "Home," and in another 4s. 0½d. per child, as against 3s. 0½d., he will recommend its further adoption where possible; and, whether the number of 56,291 children in the workhouses under 16 years of age, as given in the Report of the Local Government Board, as against 1,022 in the "Homes," provides opportunity for extending of the system of "boarding out" with advantage to the children themselves, and with a great saving on the local rates?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The figures which are quoted in the Question will be found in a Report of one of the Inspectors of the Local Government Board. They do not refer to the relative cost of children maintained in a workhouse and of those "boarded out"; but to the cost of the maintenance of the adult inmates of a workhouse as compared with the cost of the maintenance of children in an establishment provided by the Guardians on the "cottage-home" principle. The cost of a child boarded out beyond the limits of the union is usually 4s. per week, exclusive of the cost of clothing, school fees, and medical attendance. The initiative as regards the adoption of the "boarding-out" system rests with the Boards of Guardians, and not with the Local Government Board. The Board are always ready to entertain applications from Guardians for the adoption of the system where the circumstances of the union appear to be such as to render that system appropriate, and provision has been made for complying with the requirements prescribed by the order of the Board. I believe the figures given by my hon. Friend in the latter portion of his Question are correct; but I may say that a very large proportion of these children are only temporary inmates of the workhouse with their parents, whereas the "boarding-out" system is limited to orphan and deserted children.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside) asked, whether the Local Government Board could not do something to promote the "boarding-out" system?

MR. RITCHIE said that the Local Government Board were always ready and willing to consider any applications made by Boards of Guardians; but the right hon. Gentleman knew that the initiative must rest with Boards of Guardians. So far as he was concerned, he would do his utmost to assent to any proposition in that direction.

MR. MUNDELLA: Could not the right hon. Gentleman send out a Circular urging Boards of Guardians to adopt the system?

MR. RITCHIE: I think the Local Government Board have already made their opinion known to Boards of Guardians; but I will look into the question.

INDIA (RAILWAYS)—THE RAILWAY TO QUETTA.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is a fact that orders have been given for surveying a prolongation of the Quetta Railway in the direction of Candahar across the Khora Amran Range, and have such orders been issued with the assent of the Secretary of State; what is the length of the proposed extension from Shebo, and what is its estimated cost; will it pass beyond the limits of British territory; and, if so, has the consent of the Ameer of Afghanistan been obtained to the survey; and, what has been the total cost to the Indian Exchequer since 1884 of the Quetta and Bolan Railways?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): Some inquiry has been made in India as to the engineering questions involved in the extension of the Quetta Railway towards Candahar; but no formal proposal to carry the line across the Khora Amran Range has been submitted to the Government of India by the Secretary of State. It is, therefore, impossible to give the detailed information asked for. The actual outlay on the Quetta and Bolan Railways from 1884-5 to the end of the current financial year is put at Rs.3,85,50,000.

Sir James Fergusson

MR. BUCHANAN asked whether it was intended to extend the railway beyond the limits of British territory?

SIR JOHN GORST replied, that the hon. Member must see that the Question was premature, as nothing had yet been settled. Until it was settled, he could not make any announcement on the subject.

INLAND REVENUE—WITHDRAWAL OF THE COLLECTOR FROM SLIGO.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the Resolution passed at a meeting of the inhabitants of Sligo, condemning the proposed withdrawal of the Collector of Inland Revenue and his staff from Sligo; whether Sligo is one of the most important ports in the West of Ireland, and conveniently situated to serve several neighbouring counties; and, whether, should the proposed change be made, there will be no Collector between Londonderry and Galway?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): This Question should be addressed to my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, and I am under the impression that he has answered it more than once already.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, he had answered the Question on two separate occasions within the past week or two. The whole matter would be carefully considered before any action was taken.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Is this reduction in Sligo a proportion of a large scheme of reduction extending over every portion of Ireland?

MR. JACKSON: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to give Notice of that Question.

INDIA—VACCINATION LAWS IN BRITISH INDIA—PENALTIES.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, What is the highest amount of fine that can be legally imposed on a parent or guardian in British India for a refusal or neglect to cause his child to be vaccinated; and, what is the longest term of imprisonment that can be legally inflicted in a case of breach of the Vaccination Laws in British India?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham): In British India vaccination is compulsory in certain selected areas only. No penalty is imposed for simple refusal or neglect to vaccinate a child. For mere disobedience to a magistrate's order to vaccinate the maximum penalty is 50 rupees. Contumacious and persistent disobedience may in certain cases entail a fine of 1,000 rupees and six months' imprisonment.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—DISTURBANCES AT YOUGHAL.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the following statements, which appeared in The Times of last Friday, are true:—That a determined effort was made on the previous night to burn the house of Inspector Kerin at Youghal; that the crowd broke the windows of the Protestant Schools and the Methodist Church at Youghal; and that children of 12 to 14 years of age were found drunk in the doorways, early on Thursday morning, in the streets of Youghal?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): This Question is on the Paper without Notice, and as local inquiry is necessary it cannot be answered for a few days.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Would the right hon. Gentleman also discover the source from which these statements have been made?

[No reply.]

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—THE DISTURBANCES AT YOUGHAL—TELEGRAM FROM CAPTAIN PLUNKETT, DIVISIONAL MAGISTRATE.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he had an interview in Dublin on last Thursday with Captain Plunkett, Divisional Magistrate for Cork District; whether it was with his knowledge or by his instructions that Captain Plunkett sent the following telegram to the officer in command of the police at Youghal from the General Post Office in Dublin—

"To District Inspector,
"Youghal."

"Message received. Deal very summarily if any organized resistance to lawful authority. If necessary, do not hesitate to shoot them."

"Plunkett,
"Dublin;"

whether the police force that went to Youghal on the previous Tuesday evening, and caused the death of a fisherman named O'Hanlon by a bayonet charge, were acting under orders from Captain Plunkett; whether the last Return of agrarian crimes for quarter ended 31st December, 1887, shows a total of only five offences reported by the Constabulary for the whole Division of East Cork, which contains the three large towns of Queenstown, Middleton, and Youghal; whether three of those cases so reported were threatening letters, another a case of alleged intimidation, and the fifth a case of trivial assault; and, whether he can give any explanation of those special instructions being given to the police to use their bayonets and rifles on the unarmed inhabitants of this district without either reading the Riot Act or calling upon them to disperse?

MR. SEAGER HUNT (Marylebone, W.) also had the following Question on the Paper:—To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if there is any truth in the paragraph in The Pall Mall Gazette of March 14th, which attributes to Captain Plunkett a telegram sent to the District Inspector at Youghal, in the following words—

"Message received. Deal very summarily if any organised resistance to lawful authority. If necessary, do not hesitate to shoot them."

"Plunkett,
Dublin;"

and, if so, is Her Majesty's Government determined to support their officers in such action?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I will answer at the same time the Question which stands in the name of my hon.

Mr. Lane

Friend the Member for West Marylebone (Mr. Seager Hunt). I rather think that the interview alluded to in the Question was on Wednesday, and not on Thursday. My conversation dealt solely with the general state of Captain Plunkett's district. The circumstances under which O'Hanlon met his death are at present the subject of investigation. I do not question the accuracy of the hon. Member's statistics; but they do not appear relevant to the question raised by Captain Plunkett's action. The explanation which the hon. Member requires seems to lie on the face of the telegram itself. The Divisional Magistrate received information that an organized attack on the police force was intended. He gave directions that such an attack was to be energetically met, and that, if it should prove necessary, recourse must be had to fire-arms. In doing so, he appears to me to have not only acted according to his duty, but in the manner which is best calculated to support the authority of the law; and, in the long run, to prevent the injuries and loss of life which must ensue if it is supposed that the police, in the execution of their duty, may be attacked and maltreated with impunity. The Government approve Captain Plunkett's action, though they greatly regret the necessity which gave rise to it.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman why it was that only 30 policemen were sent to Youghal on the occasion in question; and also whether, if danger was apprehended, it would not have been advisable to send 100 or 200, as the authorities are in the habit of doing on critical occasions? It is assassination. ["Order!"]

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Might I be permitted to ask whether the police force referred to in the Question and the commanding officer were in Youghal to assist in serving a warrant on the Rev. Father Keller, which warrant has since been found to be illegal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The warrant in question was withdrawn, not because it was illegal, but because the name was mis-spelt.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked the Chief Secretary if he would communicate to the House the message which led to the despatch by Captain Plunkett of the telegram quoted in the Question of the hon. Member?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Subsequently,

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I do not know whether, from the answer of the Chief Secretary with reference to the telegram of Captain Plunkett, I correctly understood him to say that the Irish Government approve of the language of Captain Plunkett in ordering the police to shoot without delay and without hesitation; and I wish to ask whether the Irish Government do not think it necessary to give instructions to that gentleman that the police should not fire without exhausting every means to avoid the shedding of blood?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think that the hon. Gentleman cannot have read the telegram to which he refers. He asks whether the Irish Government approve of a telegram ordering the police to fire "without delay and without hesitation." That is not the language of Captain Plunkett. I have already told hon. Gentlemen opposite that the Government approve of Captain Plunkett's action; and I do not conceive that an order given to the police, couched in the language which the hon. Member suggests, would in any way alter the conduct of the police, which appears to me, as far as I know, to be conduct of the greatest patience under very great provocation. I am given to understand, though I do not guarantee the authenticity of the fact, that on the occasion when O'Hanlon was unfortunately killed — [Several Irish MEMBERS: Murdered!] — 21 out of 22 policemen were severely injured.

MR. FOX (King's Co., Tullamore): I would ask the Chief Secretary if a private telegram was received stating that they expected organized resistance, why they treated it thus by sending only 20 or 30 men?

[No reply.]

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—JEREMIAH HEGARTY, MILLSTREET.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if Jeremiah Hegarty, late of the Macroom Workhouse, now of Millstreet, has been appointed to the Commission of the Peace in the County of Cork; whether the said Hegarty is owner of a public-house in the town of Millstreet, and is also bailiff to the Landlord Defence League in Cork; whether he has been for some time past, and still continues, under police protection; if it is true that his police guard have objected to the treatment they have received at his hands; what reasons have been given for granting police protection to Hegarty; on how many occasions this year has a supplementary police patrol been sent to survey the route by which Hegarty was travelling; whether such police were supplied on Hegarty's application; whether the only people who frequent his public-house are policemen and emergency men; whether, in view of these facts, it is his intention to bring the appointment under the notice of the Lord Chancellor; and, by whom was Hegarty recommended for the said magisterial position?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): This Question appears on the Paper without Notice, and as some local inquiry is necessary, it cannot be answered for a few days. Perhaps the hon. Member will be good enough to postpone it for a week.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)
ACTS — IMPORTATION OF CATTLE FROM IRELAND INTO SCOTLAND.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the action of certain Local Authorities in Scotland with regard to forbidding the importation of cattle from Ireland generally; whether any distinction is made by these Authorities either as to the locality or port from which cattle are sent or as to the sort of cattle, whether store or dairy cattle; whether any disease has been traced to any, and what, Irish port, and what class of cattle was affected; whether he will call the attention of the Scottish Authorities to page 22 of the last Report of the Agricultural Department of the English Privy Council, where it is shown that 69 per cent of the cases of pleuro-pneumonia in Scotland are shown to be in the dairy stock of Glasgow and Edinburgh; whether he will make representation in the proper quarter in Scotland, so as to prevent these powers of sanitary regulations from being an injury to the export trade of Ireland; whether it is a fact that two years ago some similar action was taken, but afterwards modified, so far as the ports of Derry and Belfast were concerned, on the protest of the Irish Authorities; and, whether he will take similar energetic action to have the same modifications made immediately?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I fully recognize the importance of the subject to which this Question refers, but it appears on the Paper without Notice; and it is impossible for me to be in a position to answer it without previous communication with the Departments concerned both in London and Dublin.

Mr. O'DOHERTY: Will the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to do so at once, if possible?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, I will.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS —AND THE PADDINGTON TRUSTEES—SALE OF LAND.

Mr. LIONEL COHEN (Paddington, N.) asked the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Epping Division of Essex (as one of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners), Whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have informed the representatives of the parish of Paddington that a difficulty exists in carrying into effect a sale of vacant land in Paddington, the joint property of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the Paddington Trustees, which land is required by the parish authorities for a recreation ground, the scheme for that purpose being promoted as the Jubilee scheme for the parish; whether the difficulty arises from a difference of opinion between the joint owners as to the share of the proceeds of the land to which they would respectively be entitled, and not from any question as to the price to be obtained, which has practically been mutually agreed upon; and, whether, considering the public object for which the land is required—namely, that of securing for public purposes of recreation the only vacant land in the densely populated parish, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners will endeavour to take such means as may remove the obstacle now apparently existing?

Mr. O'Doherty

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON (Essex, Epping): My answer to the first and second paragraphs is, yes. In replying to the third paragraph, I would say that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would be prepared to concur in the sale of the land for the Paddington Park at the price per acre suggested, provided that the money be placed in the hands of Trustees, who should invest the amount and pay to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the Paddington Trustees respectively so much of the income as represents what they at present receive from the land to be sold, any excess of income being allowed to accumulate and being invested until the whole question at issue between the Commissioners and the Paddington Trustees be settled. I may say the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have offered and are willing to refer the question at issue between them and the Paddington Trustees at once to arbitration, the arbitrator suggested by them being Lord Selborne, Lord Herschell, or Lord Bramwell.

POST OFFICE — POSTAGE TO AUSTRALIA AND NEW CALEDONIA.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General, Is he aware that letters from England for New Caledonia, via Australia are charged 4d. each, while letters also from this country for Australia, 1,000 miles nearer, and carried by the same steamers, cost 6d. each; and, will he consent to the appointment of a Select Committee of the House, with a view to remedy these and other anomalies?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): Yes; I am quite aware that letters can be forwarded by French packet to New Caledonia for a postage of 4d. each, while 6d. is charged for a letter to Australia by any route, and whether by British or by French packet. The explanation is that New Caledonia (a French Colony) is in the Postal Union, and enjoys its advantages, while the Australian Colonies are not in the Union. The question of the Australian Colonies joining the Postal Union is one entirely for the consideration of the Colonies themselves. Hitherto they have not thought it expedient to do so. As the Conference of Colonial Representatives about to meet in London is expressly invited to consider this and other questions, I should think it scarcely courteous to the Colonial Governments to anticipate any recommendations which that Conference may make by instituting an inquiry by a Committee of this House at this moment.

POST OFFICE—CHARGES FOR POSTAL ORDERS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General, Is he aware that postal orders for 10s. 6d. cost 1d., while postal orders for 9s. cost 1½d.; and that postal orders for 20s. cost 1½d., while the 19s. 6d. postal orders cost 2½d.; and, will he take steps to remedy this grievance, or call for suggestions from his officers, with a view to overcome these anomalies?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAINES) (Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that there are no 9s. or 19s. 6d. postal orders in existence; and that it would be impossible, without increasing the poundage to meet the heavy expense, to issue a multitude of orders so as to include every conceivable sum between 1s. and 20s. It is necessary, in order to send the amounts quoted, to use more than one order; and in such cases the commissions payable for the two orders may not unreasonably exceed the amount payable for only one.

EDUCATION (IRELAND)—NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

MR. TUITE (Westmeath, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, When he will bring forward the Government measure for improving the position of the Irish National School Teachers, which there is reason to believe was under the consideration of the late Chief Secretary?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): This subject is under my consideration; but, having regard to the present state of Public Business, I can give no promise at present with reference to it.

MR. TUITE asked, Whether the First Lord of the Treasury would give him facilities for moving the second reading of the Bill on this subject standing in his name?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Until the Rules of Procedure are through, it will not be in my power to give any promise to the hon. Member.

MR. TUITE: During the present Session will you afford us any opportunity?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

SOUTH AFRICA—GERMAN OCCUPATION OF PONDOLAND.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If his attention has been called to a statement in The Pall Mall Gazette of 14th March, that Dr. Karl Peters is about to start from Berlin in command of an expedition to take possession of a portion of Pondoland; and if there is any Treaty by which Germany has acquired possession of territory in South Africa, between 21 and 32 degrees south and 29 and 30 degrees east?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): My attention has been called to the paragraph mentioned by the hon. Member. We have no knowledge of the alleged Karl Peters' Expedition. No such Treaty as that referred to exists between this country and Germany, nor have we ever heard of such Treaty between Germany and the Pondo Chief. I may add that in August, 1885, certain proposals, apparently arising out of an agreement made by Herr Nagel with the Chief of Pondoland, were made with a view of placing Pondoland under the protection of the German Empire; but the German Government replied that they were not in a position to entertain the Petition in question, as they had already been informed that Her Majesty's Government exercises a protectorate over the whole coast of Pondoland, in pursuance of Sir Bartle Frere's Proclamation of September 4, 1878, and Sir Peregrine Maitland's Treaty of October 7, 1844.

CEYLON—THE COLOMBO AND KANDY RAILWAY.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Colombo and Kandy Railway in Ceylon was constructed on funds provided by a tax levied on the agricultural produce of the Uva Province; whether a considerable revenue is at the present moment enjoyed by Government from the profits of that railway; whether the Nanu-oya extension of that railway was constructed on the understanding that the line should ultimately be carried on into the Uva Province, and can only become a profitable line when the Uva extension has been carried out; and, whether Her Majesty's Government, considering the unanimous wish of the Governor, the Council, and the planters of Ceylon to be permitted to carry out that extension, will re-consider its recent veto?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): The Colombo and Kandy Railway was constructed by funds provided by a loan secured on the general revenue and assets of the Colony. In addition to this, between 1856 and 1870, an export duty was levied on the produce and manufactures of the whole Island, not of Uva only. No separate profit and loss account of that particular section of the Ceylon Government Railway is kept. But while the profit earned by it is, no doubt, considerable, it is largely diminished by the less profitable extensions of the original main line. The Nanu-oya extension was sanctioned exclusively on its own merits. The anticipation of profit has not been realized; and the question of the further extension of the line, and whether such extension would render it remunerative, has engaged the careful consideration of my Predecessors. My right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) declined to give his sanction to the Uva extension, because the estimates of net earnings proved an examination to be untrustworthy. Public opinion in Ceylon is divided on the matter; and the Legislative Council were not unanimous, as the gentleman representing the Native community protested against the measure, and divided against it, on the ground that, should the line be unremunerative, the country would be burdened with a very large increase of debt. The amount required for the immediate extension of 25 miles to Haputella is nearly 7,000,000 rupees; and no settlement will be accepted by the Uva planters as satisfactory which does not provide for a further extension of about 30 miles beyond Badulla. My Predecessor, however, expressed his readiness to permit the extension to be constructed by a Company, should capitalists take a different view of the figures placed before him.

STATE OF IRELAND — THE NORTH RIDING OF TIPPERARY.

Mr. P. J. O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the address of the Right Honourable Baron Dowse to the Grand Jury of the North Riding of Tipperary County, at the recent Spring Assizes at Nenagh, in which the following passages occurred:—

"Gentlemen, I am very glad to tell you that the business to go before you is very light.

"The number of cases is not more than eight.

"Of the cases reported to me by the County Inspector, numbering 28, with the exception of the eight I have mentioned, they do not show any tendency to crime in this part of the county.

"The contrast between these 28 cases and the 41 cases brought under the notice of the Judge on Circuit last year, is, on the whole, very satisfactory. In fact, so far as overt acts of crime are concerned, the North Riding of Tipperary was never in a better state.

"You must remember, Gentlemen, this is not the first time I was on Circuit here; and, as far as I can judge or form an opinion, the state of the North Riding of Tipperary is very satisfactory.

"There has been a decrease of crime in all cases, and a decrease of 49 in cases of intoxication.

"So far as I know, you have every reason to be satisfied with the state of the county; " whether, at said Assizes, there was a presentment for £505 for extra police, referring to which the Judge, in reply to a traverse, said "it was imperative on him to pass it;" and, whether, in view of this address of Baron Dowse, the Government will take steps to relieve the ratepayers of Tipperary from the burden of this amount for extra police?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I believe the report to be substantially accurate. The question of extra police has been very recently under the consideration of the Irish Government; and, in their opinion, the number cannot be safely diminished. They are chiefly required for the protection of individuals; and it is satisfactory to learn, from the learned Judge's remarks, that they have so efficiently performed their duty.

POST OFFICE (ENGLAND AND WALES) —THE HAMPSTEAD POST OFFICE.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General,

Sir Roper Lethbridge

Whether a principal clerk in the Secretary's Office of the General Post Office has recently made a complaint, at the instigation of his own daughter, of incivility on the part of certain female clerks in a local post office at Hampstead; whether, on the reference of this principal clerk, these female clerks were reprimanded for their alleged incivility; whether an impartial inquiry will be made, so as to ascertain the real facts of the case; and, whether, in the event of the Postmaster General being satisfied that the complaint was unjustifiable, the censure on the female clerks in question will be officially withdrawn?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): A complaint, such as that to which the hon. Member refers, has been recently made by a lady residing in Hampstead, and this lady happens to be the daughter of one of the principal clerks in the Secretary's Office. Having myself inquired into the matter, I feel constrained to state that, in my judgment, the matter is a very trumpety one; and I should much regret if, from the attention—the undeserved attention—it has received, the public were led to suppose that the relatives of Post Office servants claimed a greater amount of attention than other people. To judge from the testimony which the complaint has evoked in their favour, the two female clerks in question would seem to bear a high character for civility and attention in the discharge of their official duties, and to have conducted themselves generally to the satisfaction of the public. No official censure has been passed upon them, and they will receive none.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—THE ILKLEY LOCAL BOARD—REDUCTION OF THE QUOTA OF MEMBERS.

Mr. BARRAN (York, W.R., Otley) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is true that the Board have decided to reduce the number of members on the Ilkley Local Board from 18 to 12 against the unanimous decision of a public meeting (called by the churchwarden and overseer) against such reduction; and, whether, in view of that decision, they will postpone the reduction till after the ratepayers have had an opportunity, by their votes, of expressing their opinion on the question at the next election?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Local Government Board were applied to by the Ilkley Local Board to issue an Order reducing the number of the members of the Local Board from 12 to 9. They were subsequently informed of the resolution passed at the meeting referred to; and, before arriving at any decision, they directed a local inquiry by one of their Inspectors. After full consideration of the matter the Board deemed it desirable to comply with the request of the Local Board, on the ground that the arrangement was one likely to conduce to the satisfactory conduct of the business of the Board; and an Order was issued accordingly on the 8th of this month. The number of members as now fixed is fully equal to that which is now usually assigned to a district with a population such as that of the Ilkley District. If the Order of the Local Government Board had been deferred, there could have been no reduction in the number of members to be elected at the coming election.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—DISTRICT SURVEYORS.

Mr. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether he is aware that postal surveyors and their assistants in the different postal districts in Ireland are in the habit of notifying to the Postmasters of some of the principal Head Offices in their districts the date upon which they will make a survey of the offices of these Postmasters; whether the survey of an office includes a check of the various accounts, as also of the stock of stamps and money held in reserve; whether a notification of this kind is in accordance with surveyors' duties; and, whether it might enable Postmasters, who may happen to be defaulters in their accounts, to make good the amount from other sources preparatory to the survey of their offices taking place?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I am assured by the surveyors that they and their assistants are not in the habit of notifying to any Postmaster the date upon which a survey will be commenced; but secrecy on the point has not been observed, unless there has been in any particular case a special object in doing so. The accounts of Post Offices are checked at certain times, independently of surveys, and the check at a survey is made in connection with the general scrutiny which is then effected into the whole system of keeping the accounts, and is not merely directed to the testing of the balances.

THE IMPERIAL INSTITUTE—THE SITE AT SOUTH KENSINGTON.

SIR SAMUEL WILSON (Portsmouth) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the site at South Kensington which is proposed for the Imperial Institute will be given free of cost and incumbrance to that Institution; or whether it will be liable for the whole, or any portion, of the sum of £143,119 15s. 11d., due by the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851 to the Greenwich Hospital Fund, as shown in the Accounts of Greenwich Hospital furnished to Parliament on the 18th February last?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am informed that the terms on which the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851 propose to grant the site for the Imperial Institute are not yet arranged; and the Commissioners tell me that they have no intention of asking the Lords of the Admiralty to release the site from the mortgage debt except upon payment of the amount due.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked, whether the accounts connected with the Imperial Institute would be published?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I think I mentioned the other day that the Government have no connection whatever, as a Government, with the Imperial Institute; and, therefore, it would be quite out of the question for them to enter into any engagement on the subject.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, AND THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1885 — "ANONYMOUS WITNESSES."

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) (for Mr. T. M. HEALY) (Longford, N.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he can explain why the evidence of the Royal Commission on the Irish Land Question, presided over by Lord Cowper, contains, as if from four witnesses, a series of statements headed "Anonymous;" and, is there any precedent for evidence to be received, or published, by a Royal Commission from witnesses unwilling to give their names?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I think the House and the hon. Gentleman must be aware that the Government have no control over the proceedings or arrangement of the business of a Royal Commission; but I am informed that there have been instances in other Commissions in which evidence has been given in the manner indicated by the Question. The reluctance of the witnesses to append their names to the evidence may be accounted for by the present state of affairs in Ireland.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE ESTIMATES.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): May I ask when Her Majesty's Government propose to take the Vote on Account for the Civil Service?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): On Thursday next.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I thought there was an understanding that the Navy Estimates were to be taken on Thursday.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The Navy Estimates, the Supplementary Navy Estimates, and the Vote on Account for the Civil Service will all be down on Thursday. On the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair to go into Committee on the Navy Estimates, it will be competent for hon. Members to bring forward Amendments relating to such Estimates; but we shall be able to proceed with the Supplementary Navy Estimates and the Vote on Account for the Civil Service without any further Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): As a point of Order, may I ask you, Sir, if it is practicable for the Government to take a Vote on Account without first moving that you leave the Chair?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes; it has been repeatedly done.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Has it not invariably been in reference to Supplementary Estimates as distinct from Votes on Account? Is it not competent for any hon. Member to move an Amendment to the Question that you leave the Chair for the purpose of considering a Vote on Account?

MR. SPEAKER: No; it is not competent for an hon. Member to move an Amendment to the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair for the purpose of considering a Vote on Account. The distinction which the hon. Member draws is incorrect, and it would be my duty to leave the Chair at once on the Motion being made, on Monday or Thursday that the House go into Committee for the purpose of considering either Supplementary Estimates or a Vote on Account.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES—DISCUSSION OF VOTE 1.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) asked, Whether any further opportunity would be given for discussion of the first, and most important, Army Vote, which had been passed at a late hour without discussion? He also wished to know when it was expected that the Select Committee on the Estimates would make its Report?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The hon. Member must be aware that an engagement was entered into for the renewal of the general discussion on Army Votes upon the Vote for Clothing. I hope that the Select Committee on the Estimates will report their observations to the House at an early period.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley) asked, Whether the Army Estimates would be referred directly to the Committee, or laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I have had no opportunity of discussing this question with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War; but the intention of the Government was to carry out the undertaking given to the House, to refer the Estimates after the first Vote to the Committee for inquiry, and the Committee will report its observations to the House. It is not intended to proceed to the further Votes, unless any absolute necessity should occur, until the Committee has had the opportunity of reporting its decision. But, as the hon. Member knows, the necessities of the Public Service make it necessary sometimes to take a Vote on Account.

At all events, no time will be lost on the part of the Government.

POST OFFICE—PILLAR BOXES—MARKING WITH THE POINTS OF THE COMPASS.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention had been drawn to the great advantage to be derived from marking the points of the compass on the tops of street pillar-boxes, in order to assist strangers to find their way in dark and foggy weather?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The suggestion of the hon. Member seems to be interesting and ingenious; and I shall be happy to take the advice of my Department on the subject.

HIGHER AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION.

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government would give him an opportunity after Easter to discuss the important question, upon which he had a Motion on the Paper, of higher agricultural education, and the desirability of carrying out a series of experiments, in order to ascertain on what points the British agriculturist could most successfully compete with the foreign producer?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I wish to express my great regret that the prolonged discussion on the Rules of Procedure renders it impossible for the House to discuss the important question of which my hon. Friend has given Notice, and many other questions and Bills on the Notice Paper. I can enter into no engagement with my hon. Friend as to Public Business after Easter. It must be for the House itself to make such progress with the necessary Business of the country as to enable questions of this great importance to be adequately discussed.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—THE VOTE ON ACCOUNT.

In reply to Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton),

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, that, without consultation with his Colleagues, he was unable to state the amount of the Vote on Account of the Civil Service Estimates, or the length of time which it was intended to cover.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (RULES OF PROCEDURE)—RULE 1 (CLOSURE OF DEBATE).—RESOLUTION.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [TWELFTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Main Question, as amended,

"That, after a Question has been proposed, a Member rising in his place may claim to move, 'That the Question be now put,' and, unless it shall appear to the Chair that such Motion is an abuse of the Rules of the House, or an infringement of the rights of the minority, the Question, 'That the Question be now put,' shall be put forthwith, and decided without Amendment or Debate :

"When the Motion 'That the Question be now put,' has been carried, and the Question consequent thereon has been decided, any further Motion may be made (the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld) which may be requisite to bring to a decision any Question already proposed from the Chair; and also if a Clause be then under consideration, a Motion may be made (the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld) That the Question, That certain words of the Clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause, or That the Clause stand part of, or be added to the Bill, be now put. Such Motions shall be put forthwith, and decided without Amendment or Debate :

"Provided always, That Questions for the Closure of Debate shall not be decided in the affirmative, if a Division be taken, unless it shall appear by the numbers declared from the Chair, that such Motion was supported by more than Two Hundred Members, or was opposed by less than Forty Members, and supported by more than One Hundred Members."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Mr. E. R. RUSSELL (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to move to insert, after the words "decided without Amendment or Debate," the following words:—

"Provided, That whenever the Chair does not withhold its assent to a Motion of Closure which, if carried, would withdraw from consideration any Amendment of which Notice has been given, the Chair shall declare whether such an Amendment is an abuse of the Rules of the House or has been sufficiently discussed under some other form."

I deprecate the idea that the passing of this Amendment will have any prejudicial effect upon the legitimate action of the closure. For some years I have been an advocate of the closure, although I am anxious to see such a measure of closure as could be legitimately applied and which might reasonably be believed to be successful. The discussion which took place on Friday night turned on the possibility of the closure being applied to a debate on a clause of a Bill, and the consequent exclusion from discussion of certain bond fide Amendments to such clause. Several suggestions had been made for meeting the case in point, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) moved an Amendment which, however, he subsequently withdrew in order to allow further time for consideration. It is that same Amendment which I am now again submitting to the judgment of the House. In the discussion on Friday night the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) said that those who supported this proposal were seeking the right of unlimited Amendment. That, I can assure the House, is not our intention, and we do not believe that such a result can possibly ensue from the provisions which we propose. At the same time, the right of very free Amendment is essential to the usefulness of Parliament, and has tended very materially in the past to the improvement of legislation. I have noticed with much satisfaction that a number of eminent Members on both sides of the House have expressed great tenderness for the right of moving Amendments. I refer especially to the views which have been put forward on the subject by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Basingstoke Division of Hants (Mr. Solater-Booth), the hon. and learned Member for the Kingwinford Division of Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill), the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair), and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck). By means of Amendments persistently pressed great improvements were introduced into the Prisons Act and the Army Discipline Act. There was a time, I believe, when my hon. Friend the present Chairman of Committees (Mr. Courtney), in the debates on the South African Bill, found it necessary to press his right of moving Amendments to an extent which, at the time, was considered to be vexatious. If it is said that the right of moving of Amendments to clauses in Bills will, if preserved in an unlimited form, be liable to abuse, I would reply that the two points placed in my proposal for the guidance of the Chair, and on which the Chair is required to pronounce an opinion, are a quite sufficient safeguard against any such danger. The Chairman, under this process, will only exclude such Amendments as are an abuse of the Rules of the House, or else have been sufficiently discussed under some other form. If the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) is willing to concede some safeguard, but prefers to give it in more general terms, then I will suggest that instead of this Amendment, the right hon. Gentleman should accept one which stands on the Paper in the name of my hon. Friend (Mr. John Ellis), and which requires that, when the closure is permitted by the Chair in a form that will shut out Amendments, the Chair shall declare generally the reasons why each such Amendment shall be so withdrawn from consideration. The right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), who in all these discussions on Procedure has shown a fair spirit, and spoken in the tone of a statesman, has confessed the possible dangers of this new Closure Rule, and the difficulties that may arise under it; but he urged us not to attend to such alarms, because the outlook was full of evil portent. I consider that, if the House keeps its head, we need not be afraid of evil portents. We can always manage our own Business, if we direct our efforts to that end. We accept the contention of the Government that, on a Motion of Closure, the Speaker shall have a right to veto; but as the Rule stands at present, the Chair will be placed in an extraordinary and novel position in regard to Amendments to clauses, as distinguished from the application of the closure on a single question which has been adequately debated. If, however, the Proviso which I propose were adopted, the Chair would be able on its own responsibility, and as the fit channel of the general good sense of the House, to discriminate as to what Amendments should, and what should not, be withdrawn from consideration.

Mr. W. H. Smith

It may be said that this Proviso is inconsistent with the former contention of the Opposition—that the Chair should not exercise any discretion; but I would point out, in the first place, that the principle of the Chair exercising discretion has been accepted by the House, and is finally determined on; in the second place, surely the machinery to deal with such Amendments to a clause as are liable to be swept away without reference to their reasonableness, is very different to the machinery which we should wish to have employed when the Chair has to consider the stoppage of discussion on a distinct question under debate. The First Lord of the Treasury has urged that only bogus Amendments will be shut out by the Rule as it stands; but we have only the right hon. Gentleman's word for that, and he may not hereafter be in a position to give us that security which his occupancy of his present Office may fairly be said to afford us. The noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) has admitted that the Rule, as proposed by the Government, will unduly preclude the discussion of Amendments, and the noble Marquess has himself introduced an alteration with the view of meeting that defect. The alteration, however, does not go far enough, although as far as it does go it is a distinct improvement, and I think we ought to have his Lordship's support for the Proviso that I have moved, as it will secure the object we have in view without being open to any objection, and without being liable to abuse. I cannot imagine that, under any circumstances, it can be abused, and that is a strong argument in favour of the Proviso. We cannot have a worse "portent" than for this House to reject an Amendment that cannot be abused, in favour of a Regulation which is admitted by many of our most eminent and, so to speak, most Parliamentary Members to be not only absolutely novel, but open to grave objections. It has been a matter of satisfaction to hear Gentlemen in various parts of the House speaking, not from a Party point of view, nor even from the point of view of desiring to press Business forward with greater speed, but with a genuine sense of the noble traditions of this Assembly as a place of political debate and for the discussion of everything which concerns the welfare of the nation. In conclusion, I move the insertion of my Proviso, believing that it is not liable to any abuse, that it will not weaken the legitimate use of the closure, and that it will furnish an automatic and satisfactory method of securing that every substantial and reasonable Amendment to a clause shall be brought before the House for examination and decision.

[Twelfth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In line 12, after the word "Debate," to insert the words "Provided, That whenever the Chair does not withhold its assent to a Motion of Closure which, if carried, would withdraw from consideration any Amendment of which Notice has been given, the Chair shall declare whether such an Amendment is an abuse of the Rules of the House, or has been sufficiently discussed under some other form."—(Mr. E. R. Russell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I regret that the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Mr. E. R. Russell) has thought it necessary to raise this evening a question that was debated on Friday evening at considerable length and ultimately withdrawn.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): Not at considerable length.

Mr. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool says that it was not debated at considerable length; but my impression is that my right hon. Friend opposite the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) spoke three times upon it in the course of the evening, and referred to the question frequently in a debate which lasted for some hours. It is unusual that a question of this character should be raised in almost precisely the same terms at the next Sitting after it had been distinctly withdrawn. At the same time, I believe that the Motion of the hon. Gentleman is perfectly in Order. I have only referred to that matter incidentally as an illustration of the extreme difficulty we have in making progress in the discussion of these Rules which are of vital importance to the House, and are intended to save the time of the House so that important questions may receive the consideration which ought to be given to them. The hon. Gentleman asks the House in his Amendment to lay down a Rule which is absolutely novel in the practice of the House. It is altogether novel that the Speaker or Chairman of Committees should, by order of the House, give a reason for any decision on any duty imposed on him by the House in the discharge of his duties. I regret to say that almost every night now the Speaker has to interpose on Questions of Order, and it frequently happens that reasons are given; but it has never occurred to the House before that the Chair should be called upon to state the grounds upon which its decision has been given. It is important, I think, to see that under the terms of this Rule we do not impose a new duty upon the Chair; and hitherto it has never occurred to any hon. Member to require the Chair to state the grounds on which a particular decision has been arrived at. It, therefore, seems to me that it would be an unfortunate departure for this House to take if they make it imperative to say—"Such a duty shall be imposed upon the Chair under all circumstances." It seems to me to open the way for the raising of questions as to the validity of the grounds on which the Chair may have taken a decision; and I can quite see how it is calculated seriously to impair the efficiency of the Chair. It would expose the Chair to question as to whether a right and sound judgment had been exercised; and hon. Members will readily conceive what a large amount of inconvenience would be created by an absolutely universal compliance with such a stipulation. If we are to adopt Rules of this nature we are bound uniformly to adhere to certain principles, and we must place responsibility and trust in the Chair. The traditions which surround the Chair are such as give the House and the country absolute confidence in the impartiality of the Speaker. The House has already passed Rules which may be enforced in case of emergency, and I cannot see any ground whatever for this new departure which the hon. Gentleman is endeavouring to induce the House to accept. We are told that we can always manage our own Business with accuracy and success. I entirely disagree with that statement. As a matter of fact, if we had not entirely broken down in the management of our Business it would not have been necessary to ask the House for this increased power. The hon. Member has alluded to the right of free Amendment, and free discussion; but, for my own part, I think the right of moving Amendments, and the right of free discussion, will be greatly forwarded and assisted and not hindered by the restraint which the House is about to put on itself in the absolute waste of time in Amendments which must be acknowledged to be frivolous and mere repetition. More than that, they have the effect of depriving the House of the opportunity of giving a real consideration to important questions that are presented for decision. On these grounds I cannot accept the Amendment of the hon. Member, and I trust that the time which the House has already devoted to this matter on Friday last may be allowed to count in the more rapid disposal of the question now.

Mr. E. R. Russell

Mr. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) has alluded to the course which I took on Friday last in reference to this matter; but I think he has entirely forgotten what really occurred on that occasion. What happened was this. We were discussing, late at night, several Amendments to the latter part of Rule I. We had arrived at the Amendment of my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) and an Amendment to that Amendment. In the early part of the evening, somewhere about 8 or 9 o'clock, I stated what I had urged on the previous Tuesday—namely, that the Rule as drafted would be dangerous unless some Proviso were introduced into it to prevent safe, sound, and proper Amendments from being blocked out by the operation of the Rule in its original shape, which allowed one Member to propose the closure on an early Amendment and the Chair to sanction it as against all subsequent Amendments. I said then that after the Amendments had been disposed of I thought the Government might propose certain words which would meet that difficulty; and I added that if the Government did not do so I would try and draft an Amendment myself. What happened was this. I think we arrived at the point whether these words should be introduced at about half-past 12, and, having explained what I proposed to do, I move the words I suggested. How was my suggestion received? I was answered by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, not having in his hand the words on the Paper, attributed to me in regard to the latter part of the Amendment a precisely opposite intention to that which I really had. He said—"How can the House ascertain whether an Amendment has been sufficiently discussed if that Amendment has not been before the House?" quite forgetting that the Amendment assumed that it would have been discussed in some other form. The House then got into a wrangle, which lasted for some time, and I thought that the best way out of it was to ask the House for leave to withdraw the Motion with a view to its being brought up afterwards and really discussed. That is the history of the matter. This Amendment is an important one, and I will now endeavour to say one or two words in order to show that the right hon. Gentleman has not appreciated our present position in approaching this subject. He said that it would be a new duty to impose on the Speaker or the Chairman that he should have to give reasons for any action which might be taken in connection with questions of closure. He laid great stress on that argument. But, Sir, what happens now? The existing Rule as to closure says that—"When it shall appear to Mr. Speaker, or to the Chairman of Ways and Means, in a Committee of the Whole House, during any debate, that the subject has been adequately discussed, and that it is the evident sense of the House, or of the Committee, that the question be now put, he may inform the House or the Committee."

That is to say, that under our present Rules neither the Speaker nor the Chairman of Committees can apply the closure except by assigning a reason that "it is the evident sense of the House or of the Committee that the Question be now put." I think that the First Lord of the Treasury must have forgotten that the Speaker or Chairman is bound to assign a reason, and, therefore, that there is nothing novel in requiring the Speaker or the Chairman under this Rule to give a specific reason for any course of action he may think fit to pursue. Let me remind the House, as it has been extremely well put by the hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Mr. E. R. Russell), that we are dealing in this matter not with closure simply, but with exclusion. Closure means that when we have had adequate time to the discussion of a particular question the debate should be brought to a close at once; whereas exclusion means that the House refuses to allow a question to be debated at all, and not even to be put to the vote. Therefore, the two questions are totally different, and I think that we are bound, if the power of excluding any question from debate and division is given, to surround that power with certain obligations on the part of the Chair to state clearly why a particular Amendment is not to be put. This question is one which came up before; and I would remind the House of what took place in 1881, when the Urgency Rules, which were very stringent, were laid down, and when a question precisely analogous to the proposal now made arose. In regard to the Urgency Rules of 1881, in the first instance, Mr. Speaker Brand did not make any rule about clauses in Committee on a Bill. But on the 17th of February he laid on the Table a number of additional Rules, one of which provided—I think it was the third—that Amendments and new clauses not yet disposed of in Committee on a Bill might be put forthwith, and if the proceedings of the Committee were not concluded, then the Chairman might leave the Chair and Report the Bill to the House. Therefore, under the Rule of Urgency it was laid down most carefully on the part of Mr. Speaker Brand that every question must be put before the Committee had concluded its labours. But on the following day Sir Stafford Northcote, who appeared not to have been quite satisfied with that Rule, believing that it did not give sufficient security for the consideration of all Amendments, came down to the House and used these words at the beginning of Business. He said that he hoped the Speaker would alter the Rule of Urgency, because, as he pointed out—

“They understood from the Rules that, in the event of their adopting the Motion that it was intended to propose, it would be impossible for the House, after the hour of 12, not only to discuss, but even to vote upon any Amendments that had not before that been reached, even though such an Amendment might have been long on the Paper, might be in itself of importance, and might involve matters that had not been touched by any previous Amendment.”
—(3 Hansard, [258] 1236.)

Sir Stafford Northcote, in spite of what at first sight were the clear words laid down by Mr. Speaker Brand, considered it necessary on behalf of his Party to provide, as an absolute necessity, that all Amendments, whether they had been reached or not, should be dealt with before the Urgency Rule was applied. Mr. Speaker Brand on the same day substituted a new Rule of Urgency, in which it was provided that Amendments and new clauses standing on the Paper should, after a stated hour, be put. That modification was satisfactory to the House, and under these circumstances all the clauses of a Bill and substantial Amendments under the Urgency Rules were put. What I would ask the House now is this. Were not the Rules of Urgency satisfactory as to Amendments to clauses on the Paper, and why do the Government propose to introduce a much more drastic closure than that which was so provided for? In March, 1881, I find instances of a great number of Amendments being put without debate under the Rules of Urgency; but I cannot find any indication that such Amendments were either frivolous or vexatious, or more in number than would be natural as Amendments to the clauses of a Bill. I know that in one case there were two, and in another three, Amendments to a particular clause; but the operation of the Rules of Urgency protected hon. Members in insisting that all Amendments should be put, and that provision was absolutely satisfactory. I do not care about the exact words of the Amendment; but I had hoped that the House would introduce into the present Rule a safeguard something like that which is now proposed, and, as I have shown, they will be acting in accordance with the decision arrived at under Rules of Urgency. I trust that the hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow will persevere in his Amendment.

Mr. Childers

Mr. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr.): I wish to express my astonishment at the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), that it would be a novel practice for the Speaker of the House to give a reason for enforcing the closure. Let me recall to the recollection of the House what occurred three or four nights ago when you applied the closure to a Motion proposed by the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) for the adjournment of the House. On that occasion you distinctly stated that you did so because you considered the Motion to be an abuse of the Rules of the House. The right hon. Gentleman and his supporters loudly cheered that announcement on the part of the Speaker. The right hon. Gentleman also referred to the judicial action of the Chair in stopping speeches of hon. Members of the House on various occasions. Certainly that has occurred, and in doing so, Sir, you have distinctly declared from the Chair the reason why you have done so. For instance, you have said, "I have warned the hon. Member that he was wandering from the subject, and as he is continuing the same irrelevancy I call upon him to resume his seat." Personally, I cannot recall a single instance from my own experience in which the Chair has intervened in order to enforce the closure without expressing the reason why such extraordinary action was taken by the Chair. I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury does not understand the full meaning of this Amendment. As a matter of fact, it carries out the object which the right hon. Gentleman professes to devise—namely, it stops unreasonable Amendments, while permitting substantial and reasonable Amendments to be proposed.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH (Hants, Basingstoke): I wish to point out that the Amendment is rather inconsistent with what the House has already decided—namely, that the intervention of the Speaker or the Chairman should be changed from giving assent or being a party to the Motion for the closure into a mere veto. The Amendment would practically bring back the Speaker or the Chairman into the arena, and make him a party to the whole proceeding in regard to the closure; and, after the decision which the House has already arrived at on that point, I cannot consistently vote for the Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON (Lancashire, Rossendale): I think that the adoption of the Amendment would introduce a most unfortunate confusion into the language of the Rule, which ought to be, above all things, clear, simple, and intelligible. It would introduce into the Rule the term "abuse of the Rules of the House" twice, and in different senses; and, further, I do not think that the Amendment would effect what its advocates desire. It would not really give any protection to hon. Members who might wish to move Amendments. I cannot admit that the Rule as it now stands is more drastic than the Urgency Rule of 1881. The operation of the Urgency Rule of 1881 was that at a certain date and hour we should practically conclude the consideration of a Bill in Committee, and then all Amendments on the Bill, whether important or trivial, are to be put and decided upon, but without debate—that is to say, that discussion on what might be most important Amendments is excluded. It has been said that the operation of that Rule is perfectly satisfactory; but I ask hon. Members below the Gangway whether they think it is a satisfactory Rule, and whether it would afford them any substantial satisfaction to be able to vote upon Amendments that are put without any discussion? That appears to me to be a far more drastic Rule than the one we are now considering. What I think the Mover of the Amendment really means is that the Chairman should prohibit the closure Motion unless he is able to make the declaration proposed to be required of him. Now, I cannot admit that there is on the part of hon. Members an inherent right of moving an indefinite number of Amendments any more than there is an inherent right of the indefinite prolongation of discussion. The House has a right to the disposal of its own time and to the conduct of its own Business, and the majority, with certain safeguards, not only have a right to stop discussion, but to state the conditions on which Amendments should be proposed. Whether the right of the House to dispose of its own time and to manage its Business in its own way is more struck at by the undue prolongation of debate or by undue Amendments to a Bill is rather a question of degree than of principle; but, I think that we are not likely to obtain the results we are endeavouring to secure by this Rule if we allow its operation to be limited as the Amendment proposes. That Amendment goes in the opposite direction to the line taken in the discussion up to the present time by my right hon. Friends on this Bench. Their object up till now has been to make the closure more simple and more effective, and at the same time to relieve the Chair from any unnecessary new responsibility that Amendment would render the closure less effective and less simple, and would cast upon the Chair a new responsibility in having to make a declaration which the Chair is not now called on to make. Instructions have already been given to the Chair as to the mode in which it is to exercise the veto conferred on it; and I do not believe that either greater protection would be afforded to the minority or greater power given to the House for the due conduct of its Business if we seek further to fetter the Chair by requiring it to make the declaration contemplated by this Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I understand the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale to argue that the House and the Speaker together may prevent the House from discussing an Amendment, although that Amendment may not be an abuse of the Forms of the House, and although it raises a perfectly new question, which has not been discussed. But then, says the noble Marquess, the object of the New Rule is to relieve the Speaker of responsibility; and you are now proposing to give him a new responsibility. Upon that basis, I contend that the noble Marquess is bound to vote for the Amendment, because, as a matter of fact, it relieves the Speaker of an immense responsibility. What is the Speaker to do? He is now made the sole authority, whether the Amendment proposed is reasonable or unreasonable, frivolous or not frivolous, and he may expose himself to unpopularity and dislike; and it is impossible to say whether that unpopularity and dislike may, or may not, be justified. The logical consequence of the doctrine laid down by the noble Marquess would be the millennium that is looked forward to by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who thinks that when a question has been thoroughly discussed in the country, half-an-hour would suffice for its discussion in the House. I should be much surprised to find that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury is prepared to accept the doctrine put forward by the noble Marquess. I cannot say that I assent to the description which has been given of this Amendment by the First Lord of the Treasury. He has said that in principle it was fully discussed on Friday night. Now, I never heard an important Amendment discussed with more brevity. The attention of the House was entirely taken up with the question of adjournment; and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) took part in the discussion, without understanding the terms of the Amendment, and succeeded in entirely misrepresenting its character. As a matter of fact, no discussion at all took place upon the Amendment, except the few words with which the right hon. Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) prefaced his observations. I am certainly surprised at the way in which the Amendment has been received by the noble Marquess. I look upon it as a perfectly reasonable Amendment; and I should have expected that it would have received the support of the Government. My contention is that no Amendment ought to be excluded from discussion if it raises any new question of principle. It is intended to make the Speaker the sole authority to decide whether an Amendment is reasonable or frivolous. Thus, without assigning any reason, he might sweep a number of Amendments off the Paper. No Speaker can discharge such duties without incurring the dislike, and even the hatred, of a section of the Members of the House.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): As the Rule now stands, important Amendments may never be put at all; and the object of the proposal of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. E. R. Russell) is to secure that all Amendments, as far as possible, shall be submitted to the judgment of the House, and not be excluded altogether from discussion without the House having had an opportunity of arriving at a definite decision in regard to them. If we had an undertaking from the Government that Amendments would not be choked off, I might be satisfied to allow the Rule to go through as it is; but, as I have no such assurance, I think I am entitled to press for the acceptance of the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow, and I believe, further, that it would have been a great misfortune if it had not been moved to-night. When the Amendment was under discussion the other evening, only two speeches were made; and it was withdrawn not on account of the unwilling-ness of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) to put it, but on account of the impossibility of getting a fair discussion at 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning. The position of the Chair having been reduced to the mere imposition of a veto is one reason why the Chairman refuses to interpose his veto, and to give his reason for doing so. But the whole system of closure is altered by these Rules; because, instead of the initiation of the closure resting with the Chair, the initiation is now placed in the hands of any Member of the House, who may not happen to be a Member of the Government, but simply an irresponsible private Member. Under such circumstances, it is only fair and just that the Speaker, or the Chairman, should have the opportunity of stating whether his assent is withheld or not, and of assigning the reason. At present, there is no obligation on the part of the Chair to assign a reason for giving or withholding his sanction; and the consequence would be that, in the event of any misunderstanding, the conduct of the Chair would be constantly exposed to misconception. I think my hon. Friend the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) has shown that the Rule might be applied with drastic effect, and that there would be no safety for any Amendment, however important. The noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington) combatted that theory. He stated that under this Rule there are undoubtedly great theoretical powers. We know that, and we also know that they will be used to the fullest extent whenever it suits the object of the Government to put them in force. Therefore, what we want is some safeguard against the misuse of these theoretical powers, and we desire to impose a legitimate limitation upon them. Let every Member understand thoroughly that individual Members will not be allowed to push the Rules to their theoretical extreme, and that they will never be used in any emergency in a way that would be palpably contrary to their real spirit. I think the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow is admirably adapted to secure that end.

The Marquess of Hartington

Mr. GEDGE (Stockport): Notwithstanding the discussion which has taken place, I remain of the same opinion as that which I expressed the other night. The Amendment itself is inconsistent with what the House is doing. It requires the Speaker or the Chairman of Committees to explain his reasons for the course he proposes to take, and he is not to be allowed to put the Question unless he goes out of his way to say something about the Amendment. The answer to the objections of the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) is this—we must assume that the whole of these Rules will have brought to bear upon them the common sense of the Chair. The case has been mentioned of a clause with a considerable number of sub-sections. In such a case is it to be supposed that the Speaker or Chairman would allow a decision upon the 1st sub-section to rule out Amendments on the 2nd and 3rd sub-sections and the whole of those which followed, even when, as is suggested, they relate to different matters? We have hitherto been careful to render it unnecessary for the Speaker or the Chairman to do anything except in the case of withholding his consent. The Amendment would oblige the Speaker or Chairman to explain his reasons for doing nothing, and, therefore, I hope that the Amendment will be negatived.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 146; Noes 215: Majority 69.—(Div. List, No. 62.)

Mr. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town): The next Amendment stands in my name—namely, to insert at the end of line 12, the words—

“Provided always, That, in Committee of Supply, when a Vote is under consideration, and to the particular items of which more than one Notice of Amendment has been given, if, after discussion on one of such items, the Rule for closing that discussion is put in force, the fact of its adoption shall not be held to apply to Amendments to the other sub-items of that Vote.”

I may explain that my object is to prevent the application of the closure in Committee of Supply from excluding all discussion upon items in a Vote which were not reached until after the application of the Rule on an Amendment to a preceding item. If there is one part of our duty as Members of Parliament which is more essential than another, it is that of considering questions relating to the expenditure of the country in Committee of Supply. Hon. Members are aware that in Committee of Supply a certain Vote is brought forward—it may be for £100,000, but it is made up of some 10 or 12 items, and what I want to guard against is that the machinery of these Rules shall be applied to the closure of the discussion upon one item, and shall act as a closure upon the discussion of every remaining item.

[Twelfth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In line 12, at end, to insert the words, "Provided always, That, in Committee of Supply, when a Vote is under consideration, and to the particular items of which more than one Notice of Amendment has been given, if, after discussion on one of such items, the Rule for closing that discussion is put in force, the fact of its adoption shall not be held to apply to Amendments to the other sub-items of that Vote."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I wish that the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had expressed a little more fully the object he has in view in proposing this Amendment, seeing that the actual words which constitute the Amendment are somewhat vague. I presume that his object is simply to prevent the Rule from being applied, so as to exclude the discussion of all the items contained in any Vote which may be submitted in Committee of Supply. Now, I think it would be a very regrettable incident if substantial Amendments to a Vote were to be shut out in consequence of the application of the closure to a preceding item; but I wish to point out that in regard to the first Vote of the Army Estimates, which was under consideration last night, it contains no less than 164 items. The hon. Member, as far as I understand his Amendment, desires that after an Amendment has been disposed of to the first of these items, it shall be competent to move Amendments upon the subsequent 163 items. It is quite possible, as Lord Beaconsfield once observed, that two determined men might render the whole work of Committee of Supply hopeless, and really exclude, for an almost indefinite period, the possibility of getting more than the first item of the Vote. Not only so, but two Amendments might be moved on each item; one to reduce the amount, and the other to omit the item altogether; and, consequently, we might have 326 Amendments discussed upon the first Vote in the Army Estimates alone. Is it not better to trust to the common sense of the Chairman of Ways and Means to protect us against an interminable and useless discussion, which might otherwise take place? We have been told that exclusion is a novelty; but, as a matter of principle, exclusion is no novelty. It is an old and well known practice, to which frequent recourse has been had, by submitting to the judgment of the House the Previous Question. If the Previous Question is carried, it is impossible for any subsequent Amendment to be moved. Therefore, the principle of exclusion is one of the recognized practices of the House.

Mr. Dillwyn

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I am surprised to find that the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) objects to the principle of this Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) has already accepted the Amendment of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), which places restrictions upon the application of the closure to the clauses of a Bill, and which provides against all the subsequent Amendments to a clause being closed by the fact of the closure being applied to a previous Amendment. The effect of the Rule as it now stands would be to leave it open to the Chair to shut out discussion on any item in Supply, however important it might be, when there are a great many Amendments which hon. Members wish to move. If that is so, it is important that there should be some restriction on the closure in the case of items discussed in Committee of Supply. The right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General says that if we adopt this Amendment we shall practically do away with closure altogether. I entirely dispute that statement of the right hon. Gentleman. The adoption of the closure in the first place would prevent bogus Amendments on the particular item under discussion, and it would shut out any discussion upon items of the Vote to which no notice of Amendment had been given. I do not see how it is possible that we can consent to shut out discussion on the items of Supply to which notice of Amendment has been given, and which are bond fide. I hope after the Division which has taken place, which shows how substantial a feeling there is in the House on this subject, that the right hon. Gentleman will give way, and that if the present Amendment is unsatisfactory as to form, that he will move an Amendment of his own which goes in the same direction. I think I may appeal to my noble Friend below me (the Marquess of Hartington) to use his influence, which I know is paramount with the Government, in favour of the Amendment of my hon. Friend. The noble Marquess has already obtained a relaxation of the Rule in respect of the clauses of Bills, and I trust he will also secure for the House similar relaxation with regard to Amendments to Votes in Supply.

MR. CLANCOY (Dublin Co., N.): The admission that has come from the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) is one which justifies every word that was said in favour of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Childers); and I say that it also justifies everything that will be said on these Benches, even if the discussion now going on is continued until 12 o'clock. The Committee of Supply affords to private Members the only chance they have of bringing forward grievances, and there is a clear distinction in that respect as between Committee of Supply and Committee on a Bill. It is not open to hon. Members on other occasions to direct attention to the grievances of which their constituents complain; but this one chance of private Members is now to be swept away by a Rule which is now admitted to be nothing else than the power to exclude any Amendments which private Members have to propose. It seems to be assumed that there has been too much discussion on Votes in Supply. But I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that there has never yet been sufficient discussion on any branch of Government Business in this House. Take the figures given by the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General himself; in the Vote discussed last night, he said there were 25 sub-heads and 164 items. And one night is considered sufficient for that! If that is the idea of sufficient discussion which exists in the Government mind, I will say no more on the point than that it differs very greatly from the ideas of other hon.

Members of the House. I regard the present Amendment as the most important of any that have yet been brought forward to this Rule, and I say that it demands the most serious attention of every hon. Member of the House, who cannot be too much impressed with the fact that, if it is not carried, they cannot hope for any opportunity hereafter of bringing forward the grievances of their constituents. I say that the admission of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General is most important. It is clear that this Rule is equivalent to moving the Previous Question, and I say it is giving the power to a Minister at the head of a majority in this House to exclude Amendments in Supply from discussion. The Government have dealt, up to the present stage of the discussion, chiefly in assumptions. It is assumed that the Chairman and the majority of the House in Committee of Supply can do no wrong; but I must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury on the change which has come over his opinion since 1882, when he held that a Chairman of Committees might possibly commit all sorts of irregularities.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I do not see that any difference can be maintained as between Amendments to clauses of Bills and Amendment in Committee of Supply. In the case of Bills there is a logical connection between the clause and the Amendments; but there is no such logical connection between Amendments and the Vote in Supply; and, therefore, to say that because the closure should apply to one item in Supply it should also apply to another, is a connection which I fail to see. Take the Vote for the Transport Department of the Army Service; Sub-head G is an item of £10,000 for police at Woolwich; but the last item in the list is a charge on account of Cyprus of £80. Now, it might happen that, although it might be reasonable that discussion on the Woolwich Vote should come to an end, it would be perfectly monstrous to say that no discussion should take place with regard to the Cyprus Vote, which might involve a question of the utmost importance. The Rule, as proposed by the Government, is, as I understand, not to limit debate, but to prevent discussion on whatever question may be disagreeable to the majority. A more ingenious way of preventing discussion could not possibly be devised. For private Members this kind of closure simply means annihilation, for it is only upon Votes in Supply that they can bring their grievances before the House. I agree with the principle of closure; I think that the House ought to have the most stringent powers for managing its own Business; and that, however unreasonable it may seem, the majority should have power to put an end to debate. But I regard this principle of exclusion of discussion as a very dangerous one. After all, the great function of this House is not so much legislation as the control of the Government, and in this respect this House differs from similar assemblies in other parts of the world; and I am convinced that if we do not watch with the greatest jealousy the proposals of the Government, we may find that the power of discussing items of Supply has been seriously endangered. Another point is, that if there is to be any advance in the direction of economy, it can only be made by the discussion of details; and that in itself is an argument which ought to commend this Amendment to the approval of the House.

[Twelfth Night.]

Mr. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): The Government, in my opinion, ought logically to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). We have already decided by the acceptance of the Amendment of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) that the closure shall be limited to a single clause in a single Bill. The clause of a Bill is a very different thing from a Vote in Supply. Take the case of a Minister asking for a Vote of £500,000 on account of the Civil Service. Each of the items in the Vote are in themselves infinitely of more importance than nine-tenths of the Bills which pass through the House in the Session; and yet, while limiting the closure to clauses of Bills, the Government refuse to limit it in the case of Supply. I certainly expected that the Government would make the same concession with regard to Supply as they have made with regard to clauses of the smallest Bill that may come before the House, and I shall, of course, vote with the hon. Member for Swansea when we go to a Division.

Mr. Hunter

Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I support this Amendment in the spirit in which I have always supported Amendments tending to preserve the rights and privileges of hon. Members of this House. It has been pointed out, and it is an unanswerable argument, that no matter how important may be the power of moving a clause to a Bill, or of moving an Amendment to a clause of a Bill, the right of every hon. Member of the House of Commons to move Amendments in Committee of Supply is of far more importance. It is one of the great historical rights belonging to the Members of this House, and if the House of Commons at the present day occupies a proud position, it is because Members of the House have insisted on exercising this power in dark and troublesome times. In view of the high position which this House has always taken up with regard to Supply, we have a right to expect that Her Majesty's Government should give some support to this very important Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General says that by accepting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) we should practically exclude Committee of Supply from the operation of the Rule, and the right hon. Gentleman tried to prove his point by quoting a saying of Lord Beaconsfield, to the effect that two determined men could put a stop to Constitutional Government by debating every item of Supply. But can it be supposed that any two Members, or 20 Members, would so degrade the Committee of the House in the eyes of the country by pursuing so ridiculous and senseless a course? The idea is one which no man of business habits would entertain. To my great surprise, the Postmaster General, in reply to the hon. Member for Swansea, says, with an air of nonchalance, delightful to see—"We do not intend any encroachment on the liberty of the House by applying the closure in Committee of Supply." But, Sir, he contradicts his own statement when he refuses to accept the Amendment before the Committee. If we have not the protection which is afforded by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea, it will be practically in the power of the Government of the day, after a few items have been taken in Supply, to bring the whole discussion to an end by pressing for this Rule of Closure, and, having got it, shut out every Member who may have wished to speak upon another portion of the Vote. The noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) made a stand for economy in the expenditure of the public funds. Time alone will show whether he was justified in resigning his position in the Government on the ground that he could not get that economy carried out; but it is quite as essential that private Members of the House, sent here, as the great Radical Party are, to represent constituencies of working men, should exercise their right to examine the details under the sub-heads of all the Votes that come before the Committee of Supply. I cannot see that the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General has given us any satisfactory answer to the case put forward in behalf of this Amendment, so very briefly and, at the same time, so ably proposed by the hon. Member for Swansea.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): It has occurred to me, having listened to this discussion, to put it to the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) that his Amendment is quite unnecessary. I understand the Proviso to mean that if the closure be moved upon a particular item in the Vote, the decision come to by the House upon Division shall not be held to apply to subsequent Amendments. But, Sir, it does not do so. If the hon. Member looks at the Rule on the Paper he will find it stated on the first page that the House has already decided that—

"When the Motion 'That the Question be now put,' has been carried, and the Question consequent thereon has been decided, any further Motion may be made (the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld) which may be requisite to bring to a decision any Question already proposed from the Chair."

Suppose that an Amendment that a reduced sum shall be granted instead of the amount asked for was the Question before the Committee. If it seemed to any hon. Member that the discussion has been adequate, and that the House ought to be allowed to come to a decision, he would rise and move that the closure shall be applied. It is perfectly true, after the closure has been applied, that a Minister or any hon. Member can move the closure to the Original Question; but unless some such Motion is made and carried, the next Question, as will be evident to the House, would be the following Amendment on the Paper. If that be so, it is clear that the object which the hon. Member desires to secure is secured by the present Rule. If it is desired to apply the closure to the Original Question, which would be the Vote itself, then the consent of the Chairman will have to be obtained, and the Chairman will have to consider whether such Motion is an infringement of the rights of minorities or an abuse of the Rules of the House. If this be so, I submit that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea is not quite in Order, because that what it provides has already been agreed to by the House.

Mr. DIXON (Birmingham, Edgbaston): It seems to me that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) is in conflict with that of the right hon. Gentlemen the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie). The right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General said that there might be 163 Amendments upon a particular Vote. I assume that those Amendments would have been already on the Paper; and, if so, are we to understand that they may be moved and debated?

Mr. RITCHIE: Unless the closure was moved and the consent of the Chair obtained that the closure should be put to the Committee with reference to the whole Vote.

Mr. DIXON: I do not know how that would be; but, according to the language of the Postmaster General, there may be a large number of Amendments, many of which he, of course, assumes are put on the Paper for the purpose of delay. But the right hon. Gentleman must admit that a certain number of them would be justifiable, and therefore deserving discussion. Now, the difficulty is this. How are we to be assured that justifiable Amendments are not to be excluded? If the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury would assure the House, as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has assured us, that there is no intention to exclude those allowable and justifiable Amendments, then I shall be disposed to do what I have hitherto done, that is to vote with the Government. I confess, however, I do not see my way to do so at present.

[Twelfth Night.]

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): My right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) has explained to the House exactly what the situation is with reference to the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), and his remarks, I believe, were entirely in accordance with what has been stated by my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes). The Amendment of the hon. Member assumes that the fact of the closure having been applied to one Amendment would exclude all the other Amendments, and to that my right hon. Friend replied that the application of the closure to one Amendment would not be held to extend to other Amendments. It is not the intention of the Government that it should be so extended to other Amendments on a Vote in Committee of Supply. The intention of the Government is that the question should remain open, and that further Amendments should be discussed; but the power is undoubtedly given, if—as my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General suggests—there are 163 Amendments on the Paper, a large number of which are frivolous, to make a further Motion with the consent of the Chair, when, if the Motion is not withdrawn, the closure would apply. The point is that there is no intention of any kind on the part of the Government that the discussion on one Amendment should exclude discussion on another; but the closure may, of course, be put unless the Chairman withholds his consent, on the ground that the Motion is either an infringement of the rights of the minority or an abuse of the Rules of the House.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): I have always thought that the precautions to be adopted with reference to Amendments to a clause should be in excess of the precautions and safeguards to be adopted with reference to proceedings in the Whole House, where there is only one Main Question and one Secondary Question in the nature of an Amendment to the Main Question. We are now considering the case of a Vote in Committee of Supply, and endeavouring to guard against cutting off bond fide Motions for the reduction of the Vote, or bond fide discussions on the items of which the Vote may be composed. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) says that it is not the intention of the Rule to prevent such Motions being put. But he says that we may have 163 Amendments put down to a Vote in Supply for the purpose of Obstruction, and that, therefore, we are bound to meet the case in some way so as to prevent Obstruction arising out of such proceedings. I submit that, in endeavouring to closure such anticipated Obstruction, the right hon. Gentleman does a great deal more. By the method he has devised he cannot meet Obstruction of that kind without killing out bond fide discussors of the Vote. It necessarily follows that, if such Obstruction be resorted to of putting down, say, 20 Amendments against different items of a Vote, the result would be that, if you proceeded to closure the first of these Obstructive Amendments, the bond fide Motions further on against the same Vote would be clôtured also. I ask the Government whether that is not a fair representation of the case? The result would simply be that, by closing debate on the first or succeeding Motion for the reduction of a Vote, you will be preventing debate altogether on subsequent bond fide Motions for reduction. You fail in this case in your endeavours to prevent obstructive proceedings; you fail to give fair play or freedom of debate on clauses of a Bill or on a Vote in Committee of Supply; and this will show the Government that some additional protection is necessary in reference to Committee of Supply. May it not be better to give the Chairman power to sort out Amendments, supposing that the Chair considers there are obstructive Amendments on the Paper? What is the objection to giving to the Chair power to refuse to put Amendments? In that way you would safeguard the rights of bond fide debaters who are desirous of moving, later on, Amendments to a Vote. Again, it will be possible, under this Rule, for a series of Obstructionist Members to place a number of Amendments on the Paper to a Vote in Supply before a bond fide Motion can come on later, and by that means prevent its being discussed by forcing the Government, or those in charge of the Business of the House, to move the closure. In that way a bond fide Motion for the reduction of the Vote would be killed out. I think, Sir, that this is a very important question. You have not provided, with reference to a clause, to give any extra power to the Chair to sort out and discriminate between obstructive and other Amendments, so as to allow those which are not obstructive to come on; and I must say that this is a very serious blot on your new Rule, and which will, in my opinion, have very injurious effects as regards freedom of debate. I think the picture of Obstruction which the Government have presented to the House is very much overdrawn. There is no foundation for it with regard to this section of Members of the House. Take our action with regard to this first Rule—we have only moved up to the present time 16 Amendments, of which only 14 have been taken to a Division, and I say that in providing safeguards against such action as that, you practically provide safeguards against dangers which have no existence. I believe the Government will some day bitterly regret the course which they are taking. In their eagerness to obtain the means of excluding bond fide discussion on their contemplated Irish Coercion Bill, they are fashioning a weapon which, although it will strike down innocent Amendments, cannot possibly forward the Business of the country.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I venture to say that the speeches of the right hon. Gentlemen the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) and the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) are totally inconsistent. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board declares that there is no such power in the Rule as that against which the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) is aimed, whereas the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer says that the power may be made to apply; but that it exists theoretically in the Chair. The power against which my hon. Friend moved his Amendment does undoubtedly exist, and the question is whether the Amendment of my hon. Friend would have the precise effect which he himself desires. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board is incorrect in saying that there is not such power in the Rule as it stands. The words are—

“When the Motion ‘that the Question be now put,’ has been carried, and the Question consequent thereon has been decided, any further Motion may be made (the assent of the Chair, as aforesaid, not having been withheld) which may be requisite to bring to a decision any Question already proposed from the Chair.”

Now, the only two Questions which can be proposed at all are the Vote on the Paper or that a reduced sum be granted to Her Majesty's Government. One of these Amendments being disposed of—the closure—the next Motion would be that the Main Question be put. If that is carried, the remainder of the Amendments are clôtured, and therefore I say that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea is directed at what is already in the Rule. I do not think the Amendment would necessarily have the effect of insuring a discussion on each item brought before the House or the Committee. The Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) is directed to Votes in Supply, and I need not remind the House of the great importance of considering questions of detail in Committee, and of regarding them with much greater scrutiny than ordinary Questions in Committee, or than ordinary Questions which arise on measures in other stages. Questions in Committee of Supply really constitute the only necessary Business of Parliament. After voting Supply, the Government may close up the Parliament, or rather postpone its sitting, and there is no law to compel them to bring forward legislation, which is only a secondary concern. Everyone knows that the country could get on very well without legislation. Questions brought forward in Committee, and questions brought forward at other times, stand on totally different grounds, and this is the reason why the consideration of details in Committee of Supply should be more carefully guarded than the consideration of the ordinary stages of Bills. That is the reason why I am anxious to safeguard our proceedings in Committee of Supply against unfair application of the Clôture Rule. If the Rule is allowed to stand as it is proposed, a Government will be able, practically, to close the discussion upon the Estimates, and press forward enormous Votes hurriedly, and without giving time for discussion. On this very point Ministers display a most astonishing inconsistency, because this was a point they insisted upon in 1882 with great vehemence and skill; and I have no doubt that if hon. Gentlemen opposite happened to sit in Opposition, they would hold similar views to mine to-night. It is merely because hon. Members opposite sit where they do, and consider themselves bound to bring forward some measure to facilitate the progress of Business, that they consider they ought to adopt the line of action of the Government of 1882. I would point out that it is impossible in Committee to bring forward an Amendment similar to one which has been already disposed of. There is no inherent right of moving an interminable number of Amendments in Committee. The Chairman already possesses power to limit the number of Amendments proposed, and he can rule out Amendments which he considers frivolous. I submit, therefore, that if a Member were to come forward and put down an enormous number of Amendments to a single Vote—say, 100 or 130—probably more than half, or even four-fifths, of those Amendments would be ruled out of Order, as clashing with each other. Therefore, to talk about the possibility of an hon. Member putting down an enormous number of Amendments is simply begging the question. The right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) is a high authority on Procedure, having filled the position of Chairman of Ways and Means for many years, and he must know that we are right on the present occasion. He must acknowledge to himself that he is endeavouring to evade the issue by imagining a state of facts which cannot arise. The fact of his assuming that an enormous number of Amendments will be put down in Committee is the clearest possible proof that we are right and that he is wrong. We know that the Government voted over £4,000,000 last night in the course of a very few minutes; and, as a matter of fact, it is very seldom that we have protracted discussions in Committee of Supply. During the whole time I have been here, I remember very few occasions on which such a thing has happened. I do, however, remember on one occasion a protracted debate taking place upon a small item, at the instance, I believe, of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill). The question raised was with reference to the execution of a certain Egyptian, accused of incendiarism in Alexandria. The life of this man depended upon the decision of the Committee, and the question was a critical one, inasmuch as the execution was fixed to take place within 24 hours of the night on which the discussion occurred. The debate was continued for a considerable time, although without particular advantage to the person principally interested. There may be occasions in the future, however, when the extension of debates on similar questions would be attended with different results, and we have here a clear reason why debates of this kind should not be unduly restricted. No doubt it is to the interest of the Government to limit discussions in Committee of Supply. Every Government is anxious to do that; but we recognize the fact that the Opposition has certain rights, and that if we allow a Government to get Votes too easily, once they get the money they will do as they like, and care nothing for what we may say. It is because we claim our right to discuss Votes in Committee of Supply with full freedom—although we do not wish to exercise that right to any excess—that we shall vote for the Amendment. It will not secure us the full measure of freedom that we desire; but it will, no doubt, have some effect in that direction.

[Twelfth Night.]

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I labour under some difficulty as I have not heard the speech in which the Amendment now before the House was proposed, nor the arguments of the Government in opposition to the Amendment—although these latter have been represented to me as meagre enough. I find in this Amendment one word which is objectionable—namely, the word "Notice" of Amendment. Speaking with very little knowledge of Parliamentary practice, I may say I think that "Notice" means "put down in the ordinary way." To my mind, Amendments of very far-reaching consequence have frequently been proposed to this House without Notice. If the hon. Member had eliminated the word "Notice" from the Amendment, it would have been possible for me to have given his proposal a more thorough support. I do not suppose the hon. Member attaches much importance to the word, his desire being to prevent Amendments being disposed of in a blind and informal manner. To show the necessity of this Amendment, I would ask the House to consider what the effect of the Rule as it is proposed might be in relation to the passing of the Vote for the Royal Irish Constabulary. The Main Question would be that a sum of £1,412,315 be voted for the Irish Constabulary. There are a number of sub-heads under this Vote. There is, for instance, item "A" which relates to salaries. Well, I do not suppose anyone in this House, Irish or otherwise, would ever raise the point that the salaries of the Royal Irish Constabulary are either inadequate or superfluous. I do not remember anyone in this House ever saying that the Irish Constabulary are paid too much, nor do I remember any advocate of the Constabulary alleging that they are paid too little. During my experience here, I have been very intimately interested—at any rate as a listener—in this Vote, and I do not remember anyone, on either side of the House, ever having raised a point as to the salaries of the Irish Constabulary. No one can say they are paid too much. If we want such a Force, the men must be paid fair salaries—

Mr. M. J. Kenny

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to discuss the question of the Irish Constabulary on this Amendment.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON: I will not discuss that matter, Sir; but if you will allow me, I will suppose, by way of illustration, that the Vote relating to the Irish Constabulary was under discussion. No one would object to the item for salaries, but later on, under sub-head "R" for Transport Service, some hon. Member might have an important discussion to raise, and I wish to know from the Government what opportunity he would have of raising such a discussion under the Rule as it is proposed to pass it? One of the first formal items of the Vote may have been discussed by some English, Scotch, or Welsh Member, who has chosen to take advantage of his privilege as a Member of this House and as a guardian of the public revenues. A discussion of inordinate length may have occurred, and under such circumstances, I ask now will it be possible for us to reach the vital parts of the Vote? In referring to this particular Vote, Sir, I did not wish to enter into the merits or demerits of the Irish Constabulary Vote, or the merits or demerits of any of its items. I should be sorry to cross such an important discussion as the present with lengthy reference to any particular Vote relating to Ireland; but my strongest point is this—how can we have any guarantee that after a tedious discussion upon an unimportant item to which the clôture has been applied, the points we desire to raise and upon which we desire to hear the opinion of the Committee expressed, will not be blotted out by the application of the clôture? I would ask the Chairman of Committees, whether it is not his experience that the practical discussion of a Vote takes place upon the sub-items? Last time I spoke in this House, I was incorrectly reported upon this very point. I was represented to have said that the clauses of the Bill are sometimes more important than the Bill itself. I did not say that; what I said was—and I say it again, though it looks like a paradox—the discussion on a particular clause of a Bill may often be a more important discussion than that on the Bill itself. In the same way a discussion on a sub-item of a Vote may frequently be of more importance than what is called "the general discussion" of the Vote itself. I believe sub-heads "A," "B," "C," of the Irish Constabulary Vote would be carried nem. con., and yet there are many subsequent items in the Vote—for instance, that of £200 for Police Escort and Conveyance of Children to Industrial Schools—upon which really important and serious discussions might be raised. I assert that more than three-fourths of the items in the Irish Constabulary Vote would be passed without demur by both sides of the House. Under the circumstances I do not think we are going too far in again and again impressing on the Government the necessity of making some provision by which, though a Vote may be substantially given to them without discussion or demur, we should have some power and privilege of discussing items in which we may be especially interested. The Government so arrange these Votes in Committee of Supply, that they really get the money they require under the first two or three sub-heads, and leave us to discuss their policy upon remaining items; and what we object to is, that in giving them the money, we should also give up all grasp and grip upon them. I do not expect the Government will assent to the Amendment of my hon. Friend. They have not assented to any Amendment which has come from this side. ["Yes!"] If anyone can show me the contrary, I will sit down at once. No doubt they did yield to the noble Marquess on this side (the Marquess of Hartington); but it strikes me that their's was the sort of obedience that a child yields to its father. The noble Marquess leads in the same way that a person may be said to lead by having hold of the rope that is attached to the ring that passes through the nose of a bull. The rope is in the hands of the noble Marquess; it is tied to the ring, and the ring is in the nose of the Government, and the Government must come whenever the noble Marquess pulls the rope. Why, I would ask, do not the Government find it worth their while to yield to the hon. Member for Swansea? The hon. Member does not occupy the position of the noble Marquess, or any position of authority; but he presents to the House a concrete and substantial Amendment which, if we could know the real minds of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, we should find they are thoroughly in harmony with. I am afraid that whatever I say to Her Majesty's Government will have but a very transitory effect upon them, and will pass off like water dropping from a duck's back. But I would venture to suggest to them that they should realize—and I am sure they have realized it already—the position in which we shall stand, when this Rule is passed, in relation to a Vote the sub-heads of which may be represented by the 26 letters of the alphabet, if a Member can be got to discuss one of the least important of them to the pitch of weariness. A Member on either side of the House may be prompted to do that by the Government themselves; for we do not know where their Supporters are not to be found. Their Supporters may be amongst hon. Members below the Gangway opposite, or amongst right hon. or hon. Members above the Gangway on this side of the House; it may be the Leader of the Irish Temperance Party above the Gangway on this side, or the Leader of the Catholic Tory Party below the Gangway opposite; but, from whatever quarter it may proceed, they will not find it difficult to get someone to bring about the application of clôture to an unimportant item of a Vote, and then they will be in a position to shut out discussion on all the remaining items. It must be remembered that the reason why a Member will rise and propose that a Vote shall be put to the House, will be because to his mind the subject has been adequately discussed, and because he wishes the House to pronounce upon that which he thinks there has been sufficient debate. The question is whether hon. Members should not have present to their minds the interest of the people who pay the taxes. One hon. Member may be satisfied that there has been sufficient debate, but we must remember that it is not that one hon. Member whose interests are at stake. We must remember that we represent people who cannot come into this House, or even into Palace Yard to make a demonstration, in order to show you that they are dissatisfied with the way in which you are dealing with the Votes in Supply. We are tired of this discussion; and complaints have been made that some hon. Members are rendering it wearisome. Some hon. Members opposite may think that I am wearisome. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" and counter cries of "No, no!"] There seems to be a divided opinion upon the matter. Who is to be the judge?

[Twelfth Night.]

MR. SPEAKER: For the second time, I must ask the hon. Gentleman to speak more relatively to the subject before the House.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON: Very well, Sir. Granted that the discussion has taken a wearisome turn, and that, as the result of that weariness, the clôture has been applied to a discussion, on an early part of the Vote, although there may be important Amendments on the Paper to remaining sub-heads, it will be within the competence of any Member to rise and propose that the whole Vote should be put. I do not know that I should be in Order in discussing the question of the constituted authority in the House at the moment that that Vote would be put from the Chair. It must never be forgotten that the question is to be put by the Chairman of Committees, and it must never be forgotten that the Chairman of Committees is an official elected by the majority of the day, or, in other words, the Government. It must not be forgotten, therefore, that the Chairman is imbued with the spirit of the Government, which spirit is, to show as much work as possible to the nation.

Mr. Edward Harrington

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): In supporting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea, I wish to say that I cannot help thinking that the Government have conceded something to the spirit of my hon. Friend's Amendment. It is strange, then, that we cannot come to a form of words to carry out what the Government and my hon. Friend mean. What perplexes my hon. Friend is the fear lest this Rule, as it stands, will prevent the House from discussing the various items of the Votes in Committee of Supply. Impressed as I am with the importance of leaving the House entire power over the expenditure of the country, I am anxious that on this point there should be no doubt; and I think it would be wise of the Government to meet my hon. Friend by adopting, at least, a portion of his words. I think they would find it easy to adopt words which would secure that the object he has in view should not be misunderstood. I understood the right hon. Gentleman the head of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) to say that the Government desire that there should be no misunderstanding with regard to this part of the Rule. If the Chairman has power to strike out all irrelevant Amendments, surely the Government, not desiring to strike out all the substantial Amendments, should have no hesitation in adopting words to make that perfectly clear. My experience in this House is that the House has not sufficient control over the expenditure of the country at present; and I think that any curtailment of the control they at present possess will be a great loss to the country and to the power of the House.

The greatest function that this House to fill is the guardianship of the expenditure of the country; and I, therefore, think that we should have the greatest facility for the discussion of questions of finance, so that the House may fulfil its highest function in regard to the protection of the national purse. My great fear in regard to the application of this principle of clôture is that it will be brought into play in Committee of Supply in a way that will prevent the House from safeguarding the expenditure of the country. We are called upon, at half-past 1 o'clock in the morning, to Vote millions of money. That is not a proper way of doing Business; and I think that, if we are to have the clôture applied, the House will drift away from that control of expenditure which it ought to possess. On that ground, I shall support the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and I shall do so in the hope that, before it is put, the Government will meet us, and so alter the Rule as to make it clear that it shall not be obstructive to discussion.

MR. T. P. GILL (Louth, S.): There are one or two matters which I wish to call attention to in Committee of Supply; and one of them, I feel certain, will be squashed if this Rule is allowed to stand in its present shape—I refer to an item which comes on at a very strange place—namely, at the end of the Stationery Office Vote. I refer to the item for the translation of the Brehon Laws of Ireland. Last year, I called attention to the matter, but the discussion of the Stationery Vote had gone so far, and had been continued to such a late hour, that I was precluded from bringing the subject forward. I feel perfectly certain that that item which appears in the Estimate under the letter "Q" at the very end of the Stationery Office Vote will be held to be a frivolous matter when it is reached—seeing that under the Vote, many matters of general importance will have been discussed. I feel satisfied that if the attention of the Chairman is directed to any Amendment I may move, he will hold it to come under the head of frivolous Amendments. But the item is one of great interest, and has reference to a matter on which there is a great deal to be said, and on which I sincerely hope I shall be able to make some suggestions which the Government will be ready to accept. As I say, last year I had to drop the subject in Committee, and was obliged to refer to it on the Report stage. There is another matter in connection with the Vote—namely, the Royal Irish Academy—to which I should like to call attention; but, any Amendment with regard to which, I am afraid, would be looked upon as frivolous, and would be shut out by some Clôture Motion. I mention these things as examples of what the House generally may consider small matters, but which certain hon. Members may take a very deep interest in. I am afraid that the Government with the assent of the Chairman of Committees would be able to treat such discussion as frivolous. I believe that if the Amendment before the House were adopted, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury would find that the efficiency of his Rule would remain unimpaired. What is the use of taking away from the House the privilege of discussing such items as I have mentioned? And yet you propose to leave the power of taking away that privilege from hon. Members in the hands of the Chairman. You leave the Chairman a discretionary power that under this Rule, as framed, you will strike this privilege out of our hands without power of recovery, once the clôture is applied. The only argument urged by the Government against the Amendment was that, if it were adopted, every item in a vote would be used as a peg on which to hang an obstructive debate. I protest against that argument. The experience of the House is against such an assumption. The House has got along for a very long period, indeed, without a Rule of Procedure like this affecting Committee of Supply, yet, practically speaking, there has been no such thing as protracted discussion on any item. Members have had, up to the present moment, the power of raising obstructive discussions on Votes in Supply; how is it, then, that such obstructive discussion has never taken place? What right has the Government to use that argument, when the experience of the House is against them? Therefore, I say that the argument of the Government is a perfectly illusory one, and, if I may say so, amounts to an impertinent one.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The Conservative Party have taken refuge in silence on this Amendment. ["Hear, hear!"] They shout "Hear, hear!" and I believe that they are quite right in doing so. They have never been the advocates of economy, and have never tried to lower taxation. ["Hear, hear!"] One Conservative Member again cries "Hear, hear!" He and his Friends are right to do what they can to fetter our discussion in Committee, because, under this Rule, they will be able to swell the Estimates. It is true that Conservative Members sometimes occupy a great deal of time in Committee. We had four excellent speeches from them last night; but they were not in favour of economy—on the contrary, every one of them was in favour of increasing the Estimates. But the object of this Amendment is to retain to the House the facilities we have for diminishing expenditure; and, no doubt, the Government, from their point of view, are right in not only refusing to answer our arguments, but in sitting in silence under the furore that reigns outside, and taking that which will enable them to pass over Amendments with a minimum of discussion. This new Rule will give a Conservative Government every opportunity for increasing the Expenditure of the country. It seems to me a remarkable thing that we should be, at the present moment, passing a Rule to stifle discussion on the items of the Estimates, seeing that only six weeks ago a Conservative Chancellor of the Exchequer resigned his position because he considered the Estimates were unduly swelled. We have it from that late Chancellor of the Exchequer that he was the only Member of the Government in favour of economy. Well, is it not strange that immediately after his resignation we find the Government proposing the clôture, and saying, when an Amendment is proposed, "We will take very good care to limit debate on the Estimates?" Who is it who has brought in this Amendment? It is not one of the Irish Members. Had it been an Irish Member, you would have said we bring it in because we want to obstruct. Who has ever accused the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) of obstructing? He has always been a great authority on the Rules of the House, and has sat here patiently, Session after Session, doing his best in Committee of Supply to keep down the Expenditure of the country. I do not think any Conservative Member can say the same. The hon. Member has had a seat here for a very long time, and has made the best use of it, and I defy the Conservative Party to point out on their side of the House any Member who has attended so constantly, and whose opinion deserves so much consideration as that of my hon. Friend. Then, I think the Government choose a very singular day for the refusal of our appeal. We voted yesterday no less a sum than £4,000,000, and yet they are going to pass a Rule which will prevent us from discussing the items of Votes in Supply. No doubt it would be well to limit discussion upon many Votes—say, to two or three minutes, just to enable questions to be asked and answers to be returned by the Government. I approve of the limitation of speeches; but, at the same time, I think you ought never to stop the question in Supply—you ought never to stop any discussion upon any particular item. I admit that it is quite possible to call attention to any matter on Report; but I am persuaded that if we are clôtured in Committee, we shall be clôtured on the Report stage next day. It is a most dangerous and novel principle to introduce into the proceedings of the House of Commons, that a Minister can rise in his place, and after there has been debate, say, upon an item of £50,000, insist upon £1,000,000 or £2,000,000 sterling being voted without any discussion whatsoever. By the adoption of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea we shall be saved from that danger. I have known a great deal of difficulty in getting Supply; but I never knew the Committee to discuss a Vote item by item. Personally, I am of opinion that we do not pay sufficient attention to the Estimates. Instead of spending too much time in Committee of Supply we do not spend enough time. By the rejection of this Amendment the Government take upon themselves the entire responsibility for the Estimates. The Estimates are never impeached; but the Government are now taking power to shut the mouths of Members, and in doing so it seems to me they are incurring a responsibility which no Ministers have ever ventured to undertake in the previous history of England.

Mr. T. P. Gill

MR. DEASY (Mayo, W.): It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we really do not know where we are. We have had most conflicting opinions from right hon. Gentlemen opposite regarding this Amendment, and, therefore, it is not unreasonable that we should now ask for some authoritative expression of opinion on behalf of the Government upon this question. Now, it is quite true that, upon occasions, certain contentious Votes have been discussed at some length; but I am not aware of a single instance in which an obstructive Motion has been put down to the Estimates. As a rule, there are not more than three or four, or half-a-dozen, items in an Estimate which are contested, and yet hon. Members tell us that it is because it is quite possible to have 120 or 130, or even 300, obstructive Motions on one Estimate, that this Rule is considered necessary by the Government, in order to enable them to carry on the Business of the country. Now, desirous as hon. Members may have been in past times to retard the progress of Business in this House, I do not know a single instance where Members have put down any large number of Motions against any item in the Estimates with a view to Obstruction. But, after all, if we are not to be permitted to have the privilege we now enjoy, of discussing each item in itself, there is nothing to prevent Ministers moving Votes in a few general phrases. It is a most convenient plan, and it would have the effect of effectually preventing an answer being given by the Treasury Bench to any question to which they are disinclined to give an answer. Now, inasmuch as for the last six years there has been nothing in the shape of Obstruction directed at the Estimates, I fail to see on what ground the Government propose to carry this Rule into operation. This portion of the Rule does not merely provide for the clôture; but it puts an end altogether to the discussion in the House of grievances. It also puts an end to the privileges of private Members, because, judging from the manner in which the Government has been acting of late, it is perfectly evident that private Members will not have an opportunity of moving Motions they have given Notice of for Tuesdays and Fridays, or for Wednesdays. I, as an Irish Member, must protest against this curtailment of the rights and privileges of Members. Had we, the Irish Members, not had an opportunity of exposing many grievances during the last five years, I feel certain that we should not have been able to have brought about so salutary a change in the public opinion of this country in regard to Irish affairs as that which has taken place.

Nor would we have been able to induce the Government to make alterations of considerable importance in the administration of justice in Ireland. There are many other questions which we have still to bring forward; but I am afraid this Rule will be put into operation much more frequently against Irish Members than against any other Members of the House. I am afraid the Government will use the powers which Parliament is now about to give them, for the purpose of suppressing the voice of the Irish Representatives, and it is mainly for this reason that I take exception to the Rule and support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn).

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I cannot congratulate the Government on its obstinacy in declining to accept any Amendment that comes from this side of the House, except it proceeds from the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington), who, with perhaps some questionable taste, sits on the Front Bench above the Gangway. I consider that this Rule will have a disastrous effect upon all future legislation; and I cannot but regret the adoption of such a Rule as this, if, as we fear, the effect of it will be that a vote is to be taken after a discussion upon the first item upon the whole Vote. Now, let me give one or two instances of the ill-effect this Rule will have. If this Rule had been in operation last year, one or two very important changes would have been prevented on one Vote. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) brought under the notice of the Committee the state of things that existed in regard to the equipment of the Army in Egypt—a state of things which was a disgrace to the country and dangerous to the men engaged in carrying on the military operations in Egypt. It will be remembered that my hon. Friend brought under the notice of the Committee the fact that the harness and saddlery and other portions of the equipment were absolutely rotten and totally unserviceable. The exposure resulted in an inquiry, and in this terrible and disgraceful state of things being rectified. Now, during the discussion on the question of Army clothing, I brought forward the fact that a certain firm in Ireland did not get its due share of the work that was put out to contract; but I was met with a blank refusal by the Government. I was driven to a Division, and though I was ignominiously defeated, so impressed were the Government with the statements that were made on behalf of the Limerick Factory that, in the course of a few days or weeks, they entered into negotiations with the managers of that establishment, and a contract was given that was most beneficial to the people of the locality, and certainly most advantageous to the Public Service at large. Now, if this Rule had been in force, it would have been impossible for my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton to have brought these matters before the attention of the Government. What is desired is that we should have, in black and white, what really is the position. We have at present the word of the Government, through the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), that this Rule will not be put in force. I am not inclined to put my trust in any Government. Members on this side of the House have been so often misled, if not deceived, by the Government that I decline to place reliance in any Government whatever. It is quite clear that if the Rules of the House provide certain procedure, any assurances of right hon. Gentlemen, in a direction contrary to the spirit of the Rules, is of no value whatever. I hold that, as the Rule stands at present, it is very vague, and that we are entitled to ask that the Rules of this House shall be made as plain as the most ordinary understanding can comprehend. It is at present in the power of the Government and the Speaker to shut off all discussions upon various items that may be put forward in Committee.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman has not yet spoken at all relevantly to the subject before the House. I must warn him to be more relevant.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker; but I thought I would be in Order in referring to its being made clear to the Committee—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is confusing between the items of a Vote and the clauses of a Bill.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Well, Mr. Speaker, I support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr.

Dillwyn), because I believe it to be necessary that this House, and the Committee of the Whole House, shall have ample opportunity for the discussion of every item that comes before them. I have taken some part in the discussion of items in reference to the Army and Navy Estimates, and grievances I have brought forward still remain unredressed; and it is my intention to bring them forward again when an opportunity presents itself. If this Rule be passed in its present state, I fear greatly that I shall be precluded from the privilege and the right we have hitherto enjoyed of discussing these items and bringing forward grievances. For these reasons, I appeal to the Government to reconsider their determination—their obstinate determination—to reject, not only the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea, but every Amendment that comes from this side of the House.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): This discussion has certainly not tended to encourage the hope that any Amendment, however well grounded, is likely to be received with even reasonable favour by any Gentleman sitting on the other side of the House. Now, if I were a Supporter of the Government, instead of an opponent, I should certainly be disposed strongly to urge upon the Government to reconsider their decision in regard to this particular Amendment. I am afraid many hon. Gentlemen opposite do not realize the practical effect of this Rule, if this Amendment, or something like it, be not accepted. The Rule would not work very much mischief if each particular Vote related exclusively to one subject only; but such is not the case. The majority of the Votes submitted to the House and to Committee of Supply include a great variety of matters under one head. Take, for instance, the Home Office Vote; you will find in that a considerable number of different services, with regard to each one of which a Member of the House might reasonably be expected, when in Committee of Supply, to offer substantial observations likely to prove of use in the administration of the Home Office. The same is the case with the Vote for the Local Government Board and the Board of Trade. Now, if the closure were put in force upon the first item of the Vote, the result would be that all Amendments relating to subsequent items would be summarily excluded. I do not believe that the Government can intend anything of the kind; but I am perfectly certain of this, that when closure is in the air, when hon. Gentlemen who sit below the Gangway opposite, and are not vested with responsibility, become restive, it will be difficult for the Government to resist the clamour for the closure. A few nights ago, when the Supplementary Army Estimates were in Committee, the first item related to the contribution paid on account of Army Services by Egypt, the next item related to the Commissariat Staff, the third item related to the manufacture and custody of Stores, and the last item related to the Special Grant of £110,000 to an inventor on account of the marine torpedo. Each of these particular items was a fair subject for separate discussion in the House; but if this Rule, without such an Amendment as is now moved, had been in force, the result would have been that, after a discussion, more or less prolonged, upon the question of the contribution of Egypt to the Military Expenditure of this country, your questions relating to the manufacture or custody of stores, to the Commissariat Staff, and to the remuneration of an inventor for a real or a pretended discovery or patent, would have been summarily ruled out. That is a possibility against which this House ought carefully to guard.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I should like to point out, in the first place, that the House will be acting unwisely and unreasonably if it rejects the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). The House has already accepted the spirit of this Amendment, so far as the clauses of a Bill are concerned, and there is no conceivable reason why it should not be accepted in the case of Votes in Committee of Supply. The importance of the discussions which take place in Committee of Supply cannot be overestimated. It is within the recollection of every Member of the House that Her Majesty's Government recently suffered a very severe loss, owing to the fact that the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) found it inconsistent with his sense of duty to retain his Office as Chancellor of the Exchequer when extravagant demands were being made by the Government for money. In spite of the outcry which has been raised in the country, we know that last night, so far from the Committee being desirous unreasonably to protract debate, it voted £4,500,000 in one half-hour. It has been pointed out, in opposition to the Amendment, that it would be possible to raise a discussion upon every item in the Vote. Now, in the case of one of the Votes passed last night, there were no less than seven pages of items, and, if you divide the Vote into sub-heads, you will find that there are, instead of 200 or 250 items, only 25 sub-heads, each of which makes provision, on an average, for £100,000. Now, I intend to propose an Amendment upon the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) which will enable any person to move the closure to each sub-head, and in doing so, I need not point out that the different items of the Army and Navy Votes and other Votes are very clearly set out under separate sub-heads. My proposition will necessitate the application of a separate closure to each sub-head of a Vote, and I hope the Government will see their way to accept it.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To leave out from the word "consideration," to the end of the Amendment, in order to add the words "it shall not be competent for a Member to make any Motion to bring to a decision any Question already proposed from the Chair for the granting a whole Vote, in case any Member proposes to move the reduction of the Vote by omitting or reducing a sub-head thereof, the omission or reduction of which has not been previously moved."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I do not think there is very much difference between the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Chance). If the Government will consent to one they will consent to the other. The difficulty which really leads to more prolonged discussion than we desire on this side of the House is that the Government never seem to know their minds. They have brought in a Rule, and they do not seem to understand what it means; there is no consensus of opinion among them. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) argued that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea was not necessary, because every guarantee contained in it was already contained in the Rule. That view was also taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen), and the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes), speaking with the authority of an ex-Chairman of Committees, said that he was going to vote against the Amendment because it introduced something which was not in the Rule. Surely, therefore, before we go much further we ought to have a distinct explanation from the Government as to which of these views is adhered to by the Government. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary (Mr. Matthews) has just entered the House; surely he will be able to speak with authority for all his Colleagues upon that Bench. I, for my part, think that the Postmaster General was entirely right. My hon. Friend the Member for Swansea evidently thinks so, too, because he has moved this Amendment. So far as I can see, if the Rule passes without this Amendment, the Chairman of Committees will always have it in his power, if he sees fit, to say there has been sufficient discussion upon the whole Vote under discussion; and, whether there be an Amendment upon items which have not been under discussion or not, he, and the majority of the House, may insist upon a Division upon the whole Estimate. It is said that there may be obstructive Amendments. I believe there can be no obstructive Amendment having for its object the reduction of the Estimates; I believe that every proposal to reduce the Estimates is invariably right. I have always voted for reduction. This Government came in with great professions of retrenchment; but, after all, we know that it is a Government of classes, and we know that a Conservative Government only exists by expenditure of money among the classes. Allusion has been made already to-night to what has taken place on the Estimates. I have never obstructed on the Estimates; but I have moved frequent reductions in diverse parts of the Estimates. What was the case with the Estimates of last year? They were hurried through the House, and we, on these Benches, were told, even if we devoted five minutes to discussion, that we were obstructing, and that hon. Gentleman wanted to get away to their shooting. The truth is that the Estimates have gone through far too speedily already, and I trust there will not be the same speed with regard to the rest of them. We do not admit that this Amendment is surplusage, as the Government contend, and I shall support, together with my hon. Friend, the Amendment before the House.

Mr. Chance

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): What the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) has said is only a repetition of the argument used in support of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), and which, with painful iteration, has been put forward over and over again during the evening. This, I think, is an instance of the ingenious mode of discussion by which the time of the House is wasted. The object of the Amendment is to provide for the discussion of every item of a Vote. The Government believe that ample protection is provided for every Member who desires to move substantial Amendments to the Vote, and if they are bona fide, that the wisdom of the Chair will not shut out any substantial Amendment which would remain to be discussed.

Mr. STOREY (Sunderland): If the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War thinks he has reason to complain that this discussion has been unduly prolonged, I must say that he has taken very good care not to submit personally to the unpleasant task of listening. I have been in the House during the greater part of the evening, and I perfectly agree with the right hon. Gentleman that there has been considerable reiteration of argument on this Amendment. But the reason of that has been that on this particular point we have not been able to ascertain what the Government actually mean. I listened to the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) with the respect due to the Office which he held in a former Parliament, and I think he was entirely wrong in his contention. I listened also to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie), and I admit that he was more nearly right than the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General in the construction which he put upon the clause. The view of the former right hon. Gentleman was that in the Rule there is ample protection for discussion by the Opposition of every item on the Estimates. If I held that view I should be content. But I ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider a point which, I believe, has not yet been raised in the discussion. I very much regret, Mr. Speaker, that you are permitted to interfere in this matter at all; but if you are to do so the House has defined exactly when you are to interfere; and although personally I object to what has been laid down in that respect, yet in the interest of the House I am willing to submit to it. But I ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider with me what the clause contains. Suppose there is a Vote under discussion; the Vote contains a number of items; upon item number one say there is an obstructive discussion, and at last the Leader of the House interferes and secures the consent of the Chairman to the Motion for the Closure and the discussion is forthwith closed—what follows? According to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board you can proceed to discuss the next item unless the Leader of the House chooses to call for the closure. That, Sir, is going a step further than we have already gone, and I say that in this way all subsequent Amendments can be shut out. I submit that this is going too far. I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House that, having met the objections taken on this side of the House, to the extent of giving power to the Speaker to put the Amendment to part of a clause to enable the rest to be discussed, the Government should allow similar words to be inserted in the Rule with regard to Committee of Supply—that the Chairman should be permitted to put certain items of the Vote, and that we may be then at liberty to proceed with the discussion of other items without the threat of the closure being held over us. I wish to press it again on the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that we want to be delivered from the fear that we may not have the fullest liberty to discuss every item without the leave of the Chair. We do not, as Members of Parliament, wish to have to submit to the Chair; and of course, in saying that, I trust that you, Mr. Speaker, and the House will understand the sense in which I make the remark—we desire to have absolute freedom of discussion. I submit that the effect of the Rule is that because A has obstructed on the first item, I, B, am only to be allowed to discuss a second Amendment if the Chairman and the Government think fit. Sir, I have a higher right than that. I have the right of a Member of Parliament sent here by his constituents to speak on all questions, and it is my intention to do my best to preserve that right, particularly where the money of the taxpayer is concerned. I submit that if the right hon. Gentleman will apply to Votes in Supply the same principle which he has applied to Bills in Committee, he will meet the objections of hon. Members on this side of the House.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I must, in reply to the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) point out that the provision he suggests appears to me unknown in connection with Committee of Supply, and, as I honestly believe, absolutely unnecessary. The hon. Gentleman has laid great stress on his duty as a Member of the Committee of Supply to discuss any item which he thinks it desirable to discuss. I say, Sir, that it is the right and the duty of hon. Members in Supply to make their voice heard at any time for the protection of the pockets of the taxpayers; but does the hon. Gentleman really believe that that unlimited liberty of speech which he desires to preserve is the best method of discharging the duty of a Member of the Committee of Supply? I do not think it is. The hon. Gentleman admits that there has been considerable obstruction in Committee of Supply; he admits that obstruction is possible, and I say that this Rule is directed against that obstruction, and is so directed in order that the rights of Members in Committee of Supply may be secured. I say again that the hon. Gentleman is hardly doing justice to the majority of this House, and the responsible Member who may move that the Original Question be now put, or to the responsibility which rests on the Chairman of Ways and Means, if he supposes that it is possible that a substantive Motion which ought to be discussed in Committee of Supply can be passed over and shut out by the united action of a Minister who may move, a majority who may support, and a Chairman who may permit, an improper closure of debate. I repeat that I regret beyond anything I can express the necessity of limiting discussion even upon trivial Amendments with the view of protecting discussion on Amendments of importance. I know of no method by which we can secure that proper discussion so completely as to make it the duty and responsibility of the Chair to see that there is no abuse of the Rules of the House, and that no right of the minority is left unregarded. For that reason I am unable to accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, and I believe that in resisting it we shall be securing to this House the just and proper control in Committee of Supply which, without some such regulation as we propose, would be found to be impossible.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): My advocacy of this Amendment is grounded upon the rights of the taxpayers of the country, and not on the rights of hon. Members of this House. We claim that the finances of this country are subjected to the control of the House of Commons, and that this House shall be allowed to exercise that control. That is our proposition. The right hon. Gentleman is always speaking about the rights of Members of Parliament in this matter; but it is the rights of the taxpayers that we are contending for. I wish to put a Question to the Government in reference to the Estimates. You set forth in them the salary of the lowest official in the country and the salary of the First Lord of the Treasury, the Lord Chancellor, Secretaries of State, and the porter who carries the messages of the charwoman who lights the fires in the morning; and that is quite right, because it is a Constitutional Rule that not one penny shall be spent without it is open to the criticism of Members of Parliament. But the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has set forth a new Rule, that the money of the country shall be spent without that criticism if the majority in a discussion declare that it shall not take place. The right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General quoted a saying of Lord Beaconsfield, that two determined men could overturn the Constitution of the country if they had Supply in their hands; but we have here the proposal that a Minister shall take from the House of Commons the ancient right of criticizing Votes in Supply. I say that that is the fundamental right of the House of Commons; and to say that it shall be dependent on the caprice of any Minister, or any Member of a Section of the House, is a most revolutionary proposition. I maintain, Sir, that under this Rule the Chairman of Committees is the creature of the majority of this House, and that nothing which you can do by means of a Rule like this will make him anything but a creature of the majority of the House. Suppose that Vote 24 for Diplomatic Buildings is the subject of discussion in Committee of Supply. I find there are 21 sub-heads, and that these relate to buildings in various parts of the world. Under the Rule as it stands, if a Member wants to make a long speech on one of the items—relating, say, to a building in Africa—he would have it in his power to shut out discussion on all the other buildings. The right hon. Gentleman says we must have some power to curtail obstructive discussion. I say you have better means in your power than what we find here. I maintain that you have full power to put down obstructive discussion in Committee, and the right hon. Gentleman probably forgets that, even if the Amendment of my hon. Friend were passed, the power of the closure would still exist. My hon. Friend does not want to prevent you from stopping obstructive discussion on Sub-head A; he wants to prevent you from stopping discussion on all the rest of the sub-heads in the Vote. That is his contention, and I hope my hon. Friend will go to a Division, in which case I shall certainly follow him into the Lobby.

Mr. Storey

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I wish to point out that we are endeavouring to induce the Government to introduce into the first part of the second clause of the first Rule the words which the House has already accepted at the suggestion of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess Hartington). I think the Government would do well by accepting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) to introduce into the Rule, with reference to Supply, that very important principle which the noble Marquess put forward with regard to Bills in Committee. I wish to put it to hon. Members whether they really understand on what question they went into the Lobby on the occasion referred to, and to suggest that they will be stultifying themselves in the vote they are about to give if they do not support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea. I do think that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, in replying to the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey), ought to have said that he had accepted the Amendment of the noble Marquess, and that he would carry the principle out logically to the end. If it were important to apply that principle in the case of the clauses of a Bill, it is more important to apply it in the cases of Votes in Committee of Supply. But the Government have refused to do so, and the result is that there will be no Proviso or means, in the second part of the first Rule, by which you can save yourselves from rushing through an entire Vote, even if the Committee wish to discuss the subsequent items. I ask the House to be consistent, and accept the principle of the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question put,

"That the words 'Provided always, That, in Committee of Supply, when a Vote is under consideration, and to the particular items of which more than one Notice of Amendment has been given, if, after discussion on one of such items, the Rule for closing that discussion is put in force, the fact of its adoption shall not be held to apply to Amendments to the other sub-items of that Vote,' be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 130; Noes 216: Majority 86.—(Div. List, No. 63.)

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The Amendment I have given Notice of is a simple one. Although hon. Members here are some of them extremely well acquainted with the Rules, I have always found that there are many Members who, notwithstanding that they can make able speeches, cannot tell the difference between Monday and Tuesday and Thursday and Friday. It takes six or seven years before a Member can tell the day of the week—I mean before he knows the difference between the class of Business taken on different days of the week. Of course, Mondays and Thursdays belong absolutely to the Government. I do not wish to deal with those days. Friday is a kind of half-and-half day. It belongs nominally to the Government; but the practice has been for private Members to take possession of it, to a certain extent, by putting down Motions on going into Committee of Supply. I do not wish to touch Fridays, but I limit my Amendment to Tuesdays and Wednesdays. On Wednesdays private Members bring in their Bills, and I think we ought to be very jealous of our privilege. I should like to point out to the House how totally unnecessary it is to have the clôture on Wednesdays, because we already have it by the fact of the clock arriving at 6.45 p.m. The clôture proposed might be used injuriously by the majority against the minority, as it would enable them to clôture Bills before they had been adequately discussed, in order to enable them to proceed with other measures in which they were interested, but for which they had failed to get priority on the Paper. I think such a course would be an unjust interference with the rights of private Members, and I hold that the first Bill should continue to have the priority which it has always been understood to possess. I should not object to the adoption of some new system by which a selection of Bills might be made for Wednesdays, but I think it unfair that the power of selection should be given to the majority by this Clôture Resolution. With regard to Tuesdays, our procedure differs on that day from our procedure on Wednesdays. Tuesday is the only day private Members can get for the moving of substantive Resolutions. On Friday only one substantive Motion can be moved; but on Tuesdays several Members may put down Motions, and may take Divisions on them. Many important measures have been brought forward in this way on Tuesdays by private Members, and long debates have ensued, which have served to enlighten the country, and prepare it for the ultimate adoption of the proposed reforms. Now, if the clôture is carried as at present proposed, the objection which I pointed out with regard to the course of Business on Wednesdays will apply, because the Government will select, by the process of clôture, that subject which they wish to have debated. They will be able to clôture Resolutions number 1 and 2, in order to bring on number 3, which may be of very little public importance. I think that the Government, by proposing to deprive private Members of the control of one day in the week, are not only doing something very unnecessary, but something very dangerous, because they are depriving the majority of their rights—because they themselves are really the Representatives of a minority. Owing to the present fortuitous state of Parties in the House on every subject except that of Ireland, they will be silencing the majority. By this Rule, the Government will have an easy method of getting rid of an awkward Resolution. No doubt, the Leader of an Opposition will always be able to get a day from the Government for a discussion; but there are always a great many questions cropping up with regard to which the Leader of the Opposition does not care to ask for a day, and which private Members should be allowed the opportunity of discussing.

[Twelfth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

At the end of line 12, to insert the words, "Provided, That no Motion for a Closure of the Debate may be made on a Tuesday or a Wednesday."—(Colonel Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): It frequently happens that really interesting questions, which the House is anxious to discuss, cannot be reached by reason of the undue protraction of the discussion on some subject of small interest which precedes them. I think that if the House is of opinion that the debate should be closed on any question under discussion, it should be at liberty to close it. Moreover, of late years Governments have been obliged to ask for Tuesdays, and the effect of the Amendment will be to exempt those evenings from the closure when Government Business is under consideration. I do not think that the closure should be denied to private Members who have Motions and Bills before the House, and who may wish a decision to be come to with regard to them. It seems to me that it would be fair and reasonable, and more for the proper conduct of Business, that the Closure Rule should be applied universally.

Colonel Nolan

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): So far as I am concerned, if the clôtüre is good for the Government, it is also good for private Members. The proposal of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Galway (Colonel Nolan) is to exclude Tuesdays and Wednesdays from the operation of the clôtüre. He started his speech by saying that Members did not get into proper count of the days in the week until they had been six or seven years in Parliament. Well, he himself seems to have lost count, because he appears to have lost sight of the fact that Tuesdays and Wednesdays are the days on which it would be very advantageous to private Members to have a guarantee that their Motions will not be closed by lapse of time. I have known cases in which hon. Members have spoken for a very long time on Wednesdays for the purpose of defeating a Bill. I remember Dr. Lyons speaking for an hour and a-half in order to talk out the Irish Sunday Closing Bills. I cheered him ironically, and I recollect his coming across to me afterwards and thanking me very earnestly for the encouragement I had given him. If the Government would exclude the operation of the clôtüre on Tuesdays and Wednesdays, whenever Government Business is set down for those days, I should have no objection; but if it is proposed to exclude the operation of the clôtüre on Tuesdays and Wednesdays merely, when private Members' Business is before the House, I should say that we ought to decline to accept the proposal. I do not know whether my hon. and gallant Friend intends to force his Amendment to a Division. I cannot think the alteration he proposes would be a good thing to private Members. I think, on the contrary, it would be a disadvantage to them. It is said that hon. Members in connection with Bills that are discussed on Wednesdays very frequently deliver long and carefully-prepared speeches. I do not think he can refer to the Irish Members, because it seems to me that we are able to pursue a debate at any time without very long notice. I do not see any way to support the Amendment of my hon. and gallant Friend, believing that it would cut against private Members rather than in favour of them.

COLONEL NOLAN: I withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SPEAKER: The next Amendment in Order is that of the hon. Member for South Kilkenny (Mr. Chance), in line 13.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I have the following Amendment on the Paper:—In Rule 1, line 12, after "Debate," insert—

"Provided that no Motion that the Clause or any portion thereof stand part of, or be added to, the Bill shall be made until all the Amendments of which Notice have been given have been disposed of."

MR. SPEAKER: I have ruled that Amendment out of Order, because I consider the principle was contained in the Amendment of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington).

MR. PARNELL (Cork): In the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for South Kilkenny, I beg to move for him the following Amendment:—In line 13, after the word "that," to insert the words—

"Questions that the Question that certain words of any Clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause, or that any Clause stand part of or be added to the Bill be now put, shall not be decided in the affirmative if a Division be taken, unless it shall appear by the numbers declared from the Chair that such Question has been supported by a number of Members at least twice the number of the Members voting against it, and that other."

The object of this Amendment is to provide an additional safeguard in the shape of a proportionate majority in the case of a decision come to, to apply the clôtüre to questions with reference to the putting of a clause, or in the case of an Amendment which may be moved to that clause. I think this is an Amendment which will commend itself to the sense of the House, because the whole tone of the discussion which has taken place on the question of the safeguards to be adopted for a close have shown the necessity for the adoption of some other and better safeguard than that which is provided in the Rule of the Government as it now stands. It will be in the recollection of the House that this question of the proportionate majority was debated in the last Parliament on the first Clôture Rule introduced by the Liberal Government. The Conservative Party, as a body, then took a very strong and decided stand upon that, occupying many nights with the discussion of the question as to whether a bare majority or a proportionate majority should decide the question involved in the clôture. That question was decided adversely to the views of the then Conservative Party by a majority of 44; but it excited very considerable interest at the time, and it is possible that when the time comes for discussing the question as to whether a bare majority shall be maintained in reference to the whole operation of this Rule, or whether there shall be some proportionate majority, the Conservative Party will be again beaten. The question involved is one of a minor character, referring only to the application of the clôture to a clause. When the majority takes the very unusual course of stopping discussion on a clause, and cutting out a number of Amendments, there should be a decisive consensus of opinion in favour of that step against the minority; in other words, that it should not be in the power of 200 Members, or considerably less than one-third of the Whole House, to apply the clôture to the clauses of a Bill. I think that this is a case on which the Tory Party should return to their old policy of insistence on the virtue of a proportionate majority, and that the Liberal Party should divert from the path which they originally marked out. I am reminded that in 1882 we voted against proportionate majority and in favour of clôture by a bare majority. We had then in view a clôture applicable to important Divisions like those in second readings and important Resolutions; we did not think it was a weapon which could be conveniently used in Committee. Besides, the old Clôture Rule was brought in by the then Government as a weapon which would be very rarely used; but there can be no doubt that this Clôture Rule will be frequently and indiscriminately used. We are therefore entitled to press very strongly upon the Government the necessity of giving the safeguard which my hon. Friend the Member for South Kilkenny (Mr. Chance) suggests. The adoption of this Amendment will not at all prejudice the question of proportionate majority later on. Now Sir, if you call to mind the many reforms which have been carried of late years, you will remember that they have not been adopted without considerable insistence in Committee. Take, for instance, the case of the Army Discipline Bill, or, as it was called, the Mutiny Bill. If the Government had been allowed to clôture the Amendments proposed in Committee to that Bill, I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that the Amendments which were entirely instrumental in obtaining the reform of the law comprised in the abolition of flogging in the Army and Navy would never have been carried. Our Amendments in those days were looked upon with great repugnance and impatience by the whole body of the Government Party. We could scarcely obtain leave to make ourselves understood by the House at large, so great was the impatience which was exhibited. Now, similar impatience and a similar situation will undoubtedly arise in future, if you leave it in the power of a bare and simple majority to rush headlong and not only stop discussion, but prevent discussion. There can be no hardship whatever in insisting upon proportionate majority, such as my Amendment requires, and I shall be very curious to see what the Conservative Party, which, in 1882, supported so stoutly a proposition for a proportionate majority in reference to the application of the clôture, have to say now, in 1887, in opposition to an Amendment which only provides that there shall be a proportionate majority in those cases where there is the greatest risk; nay more, almost absolute certainty of an abuse of this Rule by a strong and excited majority. I beg to propose the Amendment which stands in the name of the hon. Member for South Kilkenny (Mr. Chance).

[Twelfth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In line 13, after the word "that," to insert the words "Questions that the Question that certain words of any Clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause, or that any Clause stand part of or be added to the Bill be now put, shall not be decided in the affirmative if a Division be taken, unless it shall appear by the numbers declared from the Chair that such Question has been supported by a number of Members at least twice the number of the Members voting against it, and that other."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. Parnell

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I understand the argument of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Parnell) to be that the proceedings in Committee require a different treatment, as regards closure, than the proceedings in the House. I am unable to accept the proposition of the hon. Member. I do not think there is anything in Committee on a Bill, or a Committee of Supply, which should induce the House to make a distinction as to the conditions under which the closure should be applied to debate in Committee, than to debate upon a second reading or Motion. I cannot help thinking the safeguards introduced in this Rule are sufficient. I believe also that the Rule itself is necessary to enable the House to conduct its Business, and therefore I cannot consent to hamper its operation by putting into the hands of the minority power to prevent the House discharging its duties.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I regret I was not in my place to move this Amendment, of which I had given Notice; and I have to thank my hon. Friend and Leader (Mr. Parnell) for proposing it. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) has overlooked a very strong argument in favour of introducing a different Rule as to the necessary majority in this case than in other cases. When you have a simple question of closure on one single point, I am entitled to assume the House will be divided into two distinct Parties. One Party will be composed of such Members as do not desire further discussion, having made up their minds upon the subject at issue; but when you come to the case of a closure, by which you will suppress a number of different Amendments, the House will assuredly be split up into many Parties. One Party will desire to get rid of one question, another Party will desire to shelve a second question, another Party will desire to prevent discussion upon the third question, and so on, in accordance with the number of Amendments which are to be summarily suppressed by one Motion. On the other hand, you will find a small number of Gentlemen who consider there is something in every one of the Amendments, and who will be unwilling to consent to any one of them being suppressed. This is an argument which cannot apply to other instances of the application of the closure; and, therefore, there is a very distinct case made out for this proposition—a case which the right hon. Gentleman has not answered at all. It is intended that 40 Members will be able to get rid of the opposition of 39 Members; but that if one Member be added to the 39, it will be necessary that 161 Members be added to the 40, before the closure can be adopted. At the same time, 201 Members will be able to carry the closure against 200. That seems to be a most extraordinary and illogical proposition. Now, my Amendment would get rid of this absurdity. This Amendment will also be more efficacious than the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, especially in the case of small Divisions. For instance, 81 Members will be able to carry the closure against 40; while, under the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, 201 Members would be required to vote in the majority. I trust the First Lord of the Treasury will reconsider the position he has taken up in regard to this Amendment.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): The question of the majority, by which the closure is to be put in force, is one of great difficulty. It was discussed at great length five years ago, and I am not at all sure that the conclusion then arrived at was regarded as satisfactory. Such as it was, it is embodied more or less in the Rule submitted by the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith); but a mere glance at the Paper containing the Amendments will show that very conflicting views are entertained upon the point, not only by Members upon the Opposition Benches, but also by Members who rank as Supporters of Her Majesty's Government; a variety of propositions have been proposed, of 2 to 3, 1 to 2, 1 to 3, and so on. Now, it is impossible, in considering the question, to lose sight of the position the Speaker occupies in this matter. The old Constitutional Rule of this House is, that every question should be decided by the majority; and with regard to all ordinary Business, it is right and reasonable that the opinion of the majority should prevail. But the imposition of the closure is not an ordinary proceeding. The Government will probably admit that the imposition of the closure is an exceedingly strong measure, and should never be resorted to unless the evident sense of the House in support of the proceeding is clearly manifest. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that any mere proportionate majority, where the majority is a small one, must be unsatisfactory; because the majority may be a chance majority, and the Speaker, recognising the majority which happens for the moment to be before him, will give his consent—or rather will not withhold his assent—to the proposal that the closure should be inflicted. It may well be that, on many occasions, closure will be put in force under circumstances in which only a small portion of the House is really present. I have considered this question of majority from all points of view in which I could regard it, and I am satisfied that there is no satisfactory solution of the difficulty, except one, and that is the one which is akin to the traditions of the House—namely, an absolute majority. I do not mean an absolute majority for the time being. Closure is an exceptional measure, and should be enforced by an exceptional majority; and a proper and Constitutional majority is a majority of the House as a whole. An absolute majority of the House is, of course, 336 Members; and, if we resolve upon such a majority, we shall relieve the Chair at once of all the invidious responsibility which is now cast upon it. You will free the hands of the Chair; because, in submitting the Question to the House, the Chair will know perfectly well that if the closure is imposed it will be imposed by a majority of the entire House. Having regard to these considerations, I do not look with very great favour upon the precise wording of this Amendment; but, at the same time, if the larger proposal—and what I regard as the sounder and more Constitutional proposal—is rejected, I shall be obliged to go into the Lobby in support of this and other similar Amendments:

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): The least we ought to expect is that when the closure is imposed it should be imposed by a majority of the House as a whole, otherwise we have no guarantee that the House is not opposed to the closure. While I consider the adoption of the suggestion of my hon. Friend (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) would be the best solution of the question, I think the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Kilkenny (Mr. Chance) is extremely reasonable. Of course, we have ceased to hope that the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) will accept an Amendment proposed on this side of the House; he has steadfastly refused to do anything of the kind; and we continue to move Amendments, in the hope that sooner or later the House will be struck by the reasonableness of our demands, and accept our Amendments in spite of the opposition of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I must confess I am not in favour of this Amendment. It is proposed that when the closure is applied to a clause of a Bill there shall be a two-to-one majority. The closure upon a Vote in Supply is, according to our own argument, much more important than the closure upon a clause. I submit that as the House has let so much go by default, they should let the whole go by default, and let the Government have its way. The hon. Member for East Donegal (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) has suggested that the closure should only be applied when an absolute majority of the whole House votes in favour of it. I have not had very much experience in this House; but I have had a good deal of experience of public bodies in the North of England, and I never understood a majority to be anything but a majority of those who at the time being are attending to their business. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman, who has a very logical mind, does not see that his proposal would be impracticable and un-English, if it be not un-Irish. Sir, I thoroughly deplore the necessity there is for the House to take these proceedings at all. [Ministerial cheers.] I think that if the hon. Gentlemen who cheer that sentiment had been a little wiser, if they had brought certain constituencies in this country, and certain Members, into harmony in this House, there would have been no necessity at all to propose these un-English Rules. However, they have adopted their own course. They, who opposed the closure by a bare majority in 1882, tell us they have now grown wiser. I am one of the minority who resisted the closure then, and who resist it now, and I am only sorry we have not now the support of the Conservatives in preventing this Rule being adopted. But I maintain that if we are to have the clôture, let us have the clôturé. The House has adopted the principle of a simple majority in the matter of second and third readings and in Supply, and I do not see how we can make an exception in this particular case. Therefore, if there be a Division, I shall feel it my duty to vote, for once, with the Government.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): As one of a body of Members who are likely to most frequently be in a minority, I desire to give my warmest support to this Amendment. It is quite possible that if on the clauses of a Bill there were but two Parties in the House, it would be undesirable to ask that there should be a majority of two to one; but when there is a third Party in the House that Party has a right to see that it receives that protection which the much larger minority receives. The regular Opposition requires no protection, as far as I can understand; but the Irish minority is the one which we seek to defend by this fair and reasonable Amendment.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): The House must clearly understand that this Amendment does not extend to the closure discussed in the first part of the Rule. My hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) simply asks that when the closure is adopted in regard to the clause of a Bill, there shall be two to one in favour of its application. The state of things under the Rule as it now stands reminds me of the new machine gun. More care is required in using the machine gun than in firing the ordinary rifle, and the man in charge of the machine gun has to take all due precautions to avoid danger to his own friends. What my hon. Friend who has moved this Amendment says is, that when the House is in Committee on a Bill, when, as it were, the irregulars are in the field, to apply the machine gun suddenly and without proper precautions, might be dangerous to one's friends, whatever might be the effect with regard to the enemy. I think my hon. Friend has very fairly put the question to the House, and that he has shown that when the House is discussing Amendments to a Bill in Committee, when hon. Members are able to speak two or three times on the same question, when some hon. Gentlemen are not so much interested in the matter immediately before them as in the safety of the measure to which it relates, there will probably be a tendency, unless some such safeguard as that which is now proposed be carried, to resort to the application of the clôture. My hon. Friend has, therefore, provided for such a contingency. My observations have merely been intended to convey to the House what it is that my hon. Friend proposes; and I think that having shown what is his intention, and how much he narrows down the question, I have said sufficient to recommend his Amendment to the House.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): What I should like to see is, that the House should be brought into such a state of harmony of mind that there should be no necessity for us to divide on this question at all; but that, I fear, is too much to expect. I may say, however, that although there have been a good many acceptable arguments in favour of the proposal we are discussing, there have been very nearly as many against it; but I do not mean to say that I have risen for the purpose of opposing it. What I say is, that proposals like this do not exactly express the ideas we desire to embody. They are the consequential and necessary subsidiary parts of what is being forced upon us by the action of Her Majesty's Government. If I were asked my view of the proposal submitted by my hon. Friend, I should say I do not agree with it altogether; but looking at it as bearing on what the Government have already done, and is likely to do, I should say that, as one of a possible number of evils, we had better accept it. Now, what is the Amendment of my hon. Friend? He proposes, in Rule 1, line 13, after the word "that," to insert the following words:—

"Questions that the Question that certain words of any Clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause, or that any Clause stand part of or be added to the Bill be now put, shall not be decided in the affirmative if a Division be taken, unless it shall appear by the numbers declared from the Chair that such Question has been supported by a number of Members at least twice the number of the Members voting against it."

What I desire to say is this—I do believe it to be necessary that the House of Commons should have the same privilege and power as any other body of Gentlemen in any other Assembly in the world possesses by inherent right—the power and privilege of closing its own discussions when the majority so wish: although I do not know that the proposition thus put is very acceptable to hon. Gentlemen opposite. Whenever the majority of this House desires, and there and then declares it to be desirable either for the public convenience, or, to put it at its lowest phase, even for the convenience of its own Members, that a discussion should cease, I hold that it ought to be in its power to make and act on such declaration. But it is a far different thing to say, as this Amendment proposes, that when, what I may for the moment be allowed to describe as a mechanical majority of two to one shall declare that a discussion shall be at an end, the discussion shall therefore terminate. And here I want the House to understand what is meant by a majority of two to one. In order to understand this, let me ask how do we stand to-night, or on any other occasion when the Government is supported by a strong majority for the purpose of carrying, not only these Rules, but anything they like in the shape of Procedure? They may, by means of a four or five-line Whip, or even of a twelve-line Whip, have prepared a majority of two to one, or even of three to one. Although I support the Amendment of my hon. Friend, I think it does not go far enough. It stops short of what I want to see in regard to the division of the House on the closure question. What I wish to put before the House is this—that although, at the present moment, a majority of two to one might be got to vote against me, it is at the same time quite possible that a majority of the whole House could not be got to vote against my hon. Friend's Amendment. What we want, although the words of the Amendment of my hon. Friend do not suggest it, is, that in order to enable the closure to be put on any Vote in Committee of Supply or otherwise, there should be a majority of the Whole House in favour of the closure; and, if the House should so decide, then I say that no hon. Member occupying a place in this House could, for one moment, pretend to represent the democratic views of any constituency in the Kingdom, if he maintained that he could stand against that decision. The position of any hon. Member taking such a course would, I venture to say, be a very dangerous one.

[Twelfth Night.]

Mr. Edward Harrington

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 191: Majority 142.—(Div. List, No. 64.)

Main Question, as amended, again proposed.

MR. GEDGE (Stockport): At this hour of the morning, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Gedge.)

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH): In assenting to the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, I hope the House will bear in mind the necessity for making progress with these Rules, and that we may be enabled to decide the question of the number requisite to apply the closure to-morrow.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

MOTION.

BANKRUPTCY OFFICES (SITES) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. David Plunket, Bill for the acquisition of property, and the provision of new buildings for the Bankruptcy Department, ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Plunket and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 197.]

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 16th March, 1887.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—National Provident Insurance, Mr. Byrne disch.; Mr. Thomas Gill added.

PUBLIC BILL—Ordered—First Reading—Reformatory Schools Act (1866) Amendment* [198].

ORDER OF THE DAY.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (RULES OF PROCEDURE)—RULE 1 (CLOSURE OF DEBATE).—RESOLUTION.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [THIRTEENTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Main Question, as amended,

"That, after a Question has been proposed, a Member rising in his place may claim to move, 'That the Question be now put,' and, unless it shall appear to the Chair that such Motion is an abuse of the Rules of the House, or an infringement of the rights of the minority, the Question, 'That the Question be now put,' shall be put forthwith, and decided without Amendment or Debate :

"When the Motion 'That the Question be now put,' has been carried, and the Question consequent thereon has been decided, any further Motion may be made (the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld) which may be requisite to bring to a decision any Question already proposed from the Chair; and also if a Clause be then under consideration, a Motion may be made (the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld) That the Question, That certain words of the Clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause, or That the Clause stand part of, or be added to the Bill, be now put. Such Motions shall be put forthwith, and decided without Amendment or Debate :

"Provided always, That Questions for the Closure of Debate shall not be decided in the affirmative, if a Division be taken, unless it shall appear by the numbers declared from the Chair, that such Motion was supported by more than Two Hundred Members, or was opposed by less than Forty Members, and supported by more than One Hundred Members."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Mr. GEDGE (Stockport): I beg to move, in Rule 1, line 15, to leave out all after "by," in order to insert—

"A majority which consists of not less than one hundred Members and which bear to the minority the proportion of three or more to two."

I little thought when I gave Notice of this Amendment in the 15th line of the first Rule that 15 days would elapse before I should be able to move it, and though Pliny's maxim—Nulla dies sine linea—was a good rule for the minimum of work to be done by a student, I doubt whether the country at large will consider that there is sufficient justification for the inordinate length of time which has been taken up in the discussion of this Rule, line by line. However, here we are, and I hope the House will make an end of the Rule to-day. I should not persist in moving the Amendment if I had not convinced myself that if the Rule is to be made of any real use for the purpose for which it is intended, my Amendment, or something very like it, ought to be adopted. I will endeavour to show the difference between the Rule as it stands on the Paper and as it will stand if the Amendment is accepted. I take leave to say that I am not answerable for the questionable English on the first three lines of this part of the Rule—

"Provided always that Questions for the closure of Debate shall not be decided in the affirmative, if a Division be taken, unless it shall appear, by the numbers declared from the Chair, that such Motion was supported by more than two hundred Members,"

&c. "Such Motion" can scarcely refer to the plural "Questions" in the first line, and I take it ought to mean "any Question" instead of "Questions." The Rule goes on to say—

"Unless it shall appear, by the numbers declared from the Chair, that such Motion was supported by more than two hundred Members, or was opposed by less than forty Members, and supported by more than one hundred Members."

I propose to get rid of the "Two Hundred Members" altogether, and to say, instead, "supported by a majority which consisted of not less than 100 Members, and which bore to the majority the proportion of 3 or more to 2." I find that anything in the shape of an arithmetical problem is a puzzle to many hon. Members, and therefore I think it is best to explain that the majority shall be half as many again. We talk of a majority being "five" when, as a matter of fact, the majority is 305 to 300. That is not the majority I mean. What I mean is that the greater part or majority must bear to the smaller number or minority the proportion of 3 to 2. In regard to the figure of "100" which makes provision for a larger quorum than the ordinary quorum of 40, it is laid down in the Rule that the closure shall not be applied unless there are 100 Members who desire to close the debate. It is put in this way in order to secure a quorum of 100 present; for if it had stated that there must be a quorum of 100, and 90 were in favour of closure and 15 against it, the 15 would walk out and so reduce the quorum below

[Thirteenth Night.]

100, and the debate must go on. Now there is considerable authority in favour of having a proportional majority, instead of a bare majority, for the purpose of the closure of debate. In 1882, in a full House of 597 Members, my right hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott) proposed that consent should not be given to the closure by a bare majority, and was defeated by the small number of 39, although it was opposed with all the force which the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) and the large majority he possessed at the time could bear to bring upon it; 279 Members voted against the proposal that the closure should be carried by a bare majority, and among the 279 were the then Leaders of the Conservative Party and most of their followers. I do not blame them for having changed their opinions. There can be no doubt that "old times have changed, old manners gone," and it is imperative that some form of closure shall be adopted in order to restore by Rule that control over the proceedings of the House which was formerly secured and regulated by the gentlemanly feelings which prevailed among its Members. Hon. Members from Ireland tell us that their constituents have sent them here to attain certain objects, and they consider that the best way of attaining those objects, both in Ireland and here, is to substitute anarchy for law, and to paralyze the action of the House. They avow that as their object with cynical fairness, and they do not leave us in the dark about it and the results they desire to obtain. Some few years ago it was the practice of the Speaker to call first upon one side of the House and then upon the other, so that each side should have an opportunity of answering the arguments which had been put forward by their opponents; and the time when the Division was to be taken was fixed by agreement between the two Front Benches. This, however, is now entirely changed, and the custom is for Member after Member to rise from the same part of the House and to repeat over and over again the arguments which have been put forward by previous speakers, with the avowed object of delaying the Division. I do not blame the Irish Members; but, on the other hand, I say that those who represent the great majority of the constituencies of the country have also rights and have also duties. We come here with a mission or a mandate, as it is the fashion to call it, to prevent the Irish Members obtaining the object they desire, and to prevent it by any means necessary. If they have a right to destroy the spirit of our Rules and avail themselves of the Forms of the House, in order to paralyze the action of the House, we have also a right to do all we can to restrain them. Our constituents expect that we shall do so; and if the weapons we have hitherto employed are not strong enough, it is our duty to see wherein they have failed, and to amend them so that they shall fail no longer. They have no right to blame us if we endeavour to deprive them of the weapons with which they fight with a view to obtaining the victory which the country expects us to obtain. It is our bounden duty, sent here, as we are, to pass any Rule that is necessary to enable the House to resume its control over its own Business, and to pass the Estimates and laws as soon as they have been fairly discussed, without procrastination of any kind intended only to prevent the House from arriving at a decision. It is admitted on all sides that the Rule which was framed in 1882 has failed altogether. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, who introduced it, has confessed that it has failed; and the present Government have made a similar confession, because they are now endeavouring to amend it. Then let us examine it thoroughly, in order to see where it has failed, and why the Government, on attempting to amend it, are leaving the last part of it untouched. Why do they retain the extraordinary provision of 200 Members and a bare majority? They are making no alteration whatever in that part of the Rule. As a matter of fact, they are simply taking away the initiation of the Chair, and are giving to the Chair a power of veto. What I desire to know is, why, when the Government admit that the Rule has failed, they do not proceed to amend it in the particulars in which it has failed? When a weapon fails, the skilful workman mends the part which is faulty, and this shows us which part has failed, at least, in his judgment. The Government must clearly be of opinion that the Chair, for the last five years, has not done its duty, seeing that that is the only point on which they have proceeded to amend the Rule. The Chair was to do this—when he thought that a matter had been sufficiently debated, and that this was the evident sense of the House, it was his duty to report that fact to the House, and, if supported by a majority of at least 201, the closure was to be applied. But the closure has not been applied when wanted; and all the Government propose now is to alter the power and duty of the Speaker; and therefore it is quite clear that, in the view of the Government, the Rule has failed to have the operation it was intended to have, not because of any difficulty as to the 201, but because the Speaker has omitted to state the evident sense of the House, and therefore the closure could not be applied. The Government now propose to take that power out of the hands of the Speaker. Now, I do not believe, for one moment, that that is the cause of the failure. I believe that the Chair throughout has done its duty; and the reason why he has not made the necessary declaration has been that he did not believe there was a majority of 201. Our special object is to put down anything in the shape of Obstruction, from whatever quarter it comes, and to enable the House to obtain complete control over its own Business. Now, Sir, when it is that this Obstruction generally takes place? Is it in a full House, when some Vote of Want of Confidence in the Government is being debated, and when there happen to be 500 or 600 Members present? Nothing of the kind; but it is generally in a House of 200 or 300 Members. Therefore, if this Rule is to be effectual to do its work, it ought to be made weak in a full House, and strong in a small House; whereas, as it now stands, it is exactly the reverse. The closure may be applied if a quorum of 100 vote for it and 39 against it, and the Speaker would be perfectly right in refusing to interpose his veto when he found there was a large majority in favour of the closure and only a small minority against it; but if there are 40 Members against it—one Member happening to come in at the last moment, perhaps because he failed to find a pair—the application of the closure will be prevented. In that case, there must be 200 Members in favour of the closure before it can be applied. Why should that 40th man have such an enormous power? Are we to look upon him as the Fortieth Stripe which the Jews dare not give, or the Fortieth Article which Theodore Hook offered to sign, and was very nearly sent down by the Dean of Christ Church for his impertinence? What I venture to propose is an absolute 3 to 2 majority all round, which would make it more easy to apply the closure when necessary, especially in a small House. There are 670 Members in this House; one-half is 335. According to the Government, there must be 201 in the majority, with half the House, or 335 Members present. That leaves 134 in the minority; and if the minority be anything between 40 and 134 it equally requires 200 to beat them; but if you adopt my proposal, a majority of 100 would stop 66; 120 would stop 80; 150 would stop 100; and so on until you reach 134, who would require 201 to stop them. Again, by the Government Rule, 301 could insist on the closure of debate against 300 who may wish it to continue. We know from past history that it has frequently happened, in a debate upon a great question, when the mind of the country has been aroused, the discussion which has occurred here has instructed the country, and caused a considerable difference in a Division. If the Government have 301 supporters, it would probably be worth their while to do all in their power to stop the debate as quickly as possible. The Speaker is unable to tell how many there are in the minority, because there may be Members in the Smoking Room and elsewhere who do not think it worth while to come into the House to listen to the debate. But there would be a rush of Members when the Division bell was rung, and 301 would apply the closure against the wish of 300 who desired it to go on. Now, I say that that is not right, and I am of opinion that 300 should have the power of insisting that the debate should go on. As the Rule now stands, the Speaker must often be in a difficulty on a Motion being made to apply the closure. He is doubtful whether he ought to consent or not. In the end, he allows the Motion to be put; hon. Members rush in, and it is carried by a small majority—say, 201 to 200. Such a circumstance as that would, I think, make the Speaker exceedingly careful in future; and he would determine always to interpose his veto unless he was quite certain that there was a large majority in favour of the closure. With the Rule as I propose to amend it the Speaker would do nothing of the kind, because he would know that the minority would be able to protect itself if large enough. I am satisfied that if you pass the original Rule you will, in the end, have to come to my Amendment, or something like it. It is said that a bare majority governs greater matters, and ought to prevail in this instance. In 1882 the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian mentioned five historical incidents to show that great majorities always had their own way in important questions; but upon examination of them it will be found that really they all tell the other way. For instance, as to the first which he mentioned, it is true that the Reform Bill of 1831 was carried by a majority of 1; but the result of the smallness of the majority was that the Government were unable to make way with it, and they found it necessary to dissolve. The Reform Bill of 1832 was carried by 2 to 1. Small majorities may be powerful to prevent a particular thing from being done; but they are powerless to carry their own will in any particular direction. Then it is said that a proportional majority is a new-fangled idea—that it is something un-English and undemocratic. Now, in the United States of America it takes a majority of 2 to 1 to override the President's veto, or to make a radical change in the law. In our own country, in the case of Joint Stock Companies, there is a proportional majority of 3 to 1 required before any change can be made; even the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian did not venture to propose a bare majority in the case of urgency, and in the very Rule before us 200 cannot beat 199, and it takes 201 to beat 40—that is to say, 5 to 1; so that this sacred principle of the bare majority does not come into force unless there are 400 Members present. It is, therefore, too late to say that it is un-Constitutional to have anything but a bare majority. We are told that the Whips are against it—that they know when there are 200 Members in the House, but they would not know how they can count upon an unknown quantity. But I assert, Sir, that it ought not to be a question of Whips, for that gives it a Party character. Unless the general body of the House on both sides come to a conclusion that a debate ought to be stopped and the closure applied the debate ought to proceed; and I would venture to point out, as a Member of a Party who, for practical purposes, are in a majority, that one day or other we may be in a minority, and may then regret that it is in the power of a bare majority to stop an important debate in order to please the whim of a Government. The closure ought never to be made a Party question; personally, I think it ought to be taken out of the region of Party and placed in that of the general good sense of the House. It may be said that there is no danger, and that no bare majority will venture to use its power; but I strongly object to put a weapon in the hands of any Party on the mere supposition that they will not use it. Let me quote what a high authority—Mr. Grattan—said in 1792. He made this wise statement—

Mr. Gedge

Mr. Gedge

“When the liberty and security of one Government depend on the honour of another, the one country may have much honour, but the other will have no liberty.”

We are fairly warned as to what is going to be done. One hon. Member said to me in the Lobby—

“I intend to make the closure as hard as I can, because I know that you Tories will not dare to use it against us, although when we are in power we will use it as tightly as we can against you.”

And the right hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) said much the same openly in this House a few nights ago. He is like the boy at Eton who, being unmercifully thrashed by his master, consoled himself with the reflection, “When I get a fag of my own won't I lick him.” I think we ought to do what we believe to be right without regard to what may happen when we get our chance. If the Government and their followers vote in favour of the Rule as it is now placed before them, and which, as I have shown, will be useless for the purpose required, and may be turned to their injury hereafter, they may live to regret it. I appeal to the Government to state publicly that this is not a Party question, and that no Member who votes for my Amendment will be looked upon as voting against the Government. Last June the danger we are afraid of now actually occurred. The hon. Gentlemen whose conduct we are obliged to resist were then as numerous as they are now, and it was considered desirable to look into the matter and see whether the Rules relating to closure were sufficient to give the House the command of its own time for Business. The Rule of 200 Members and a bare majority came under the consideration of that Committee, which was presided over by the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington). On the Motion of the hon. Member for the Bodmin Division of Cornwall (Mr. Courtney) the present Rule was negatived in that Committee without a Division. So bad was it thought that not a hand was held up in its favour, and instead of it two other proposals were made, both of which got rid of the 200 Members, and required a proportional majority of either 3 to 2 or 2 to 1. The 3 to 2 proposal only found 10 present in favour of it. And why? Because 18 Members present preferred the proposal of 2 to 1, and that was adopted in the Report after having received the support of a considerable number of the Members of that Committee. Only six voted against it, and 23, at one time or other, voted in its favour. I do not know whether the Members who served upon that Committee were the same as certain hon. Members of this House; but I find that the six who opposed were Sir William Harcourt—who was in favour of a bare majority—Mr. Cecil Raikes—who was against any closure at all—Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Leake, Mr. A. O'Connor, and Mr. Sexton. The 23 who voted in favour of it were Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Mr. A. Bass, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, Mr. Courtney, Sir William Hart Dyke, Mr. Duff, Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Dillwyn, Sir John Gorst, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Holms, Mr. Illingworth, Sir John Mowbray, Sir Richard Paget, the late Mr. Peter Rylands, Mr. Solater-Booth, Mr. Craig-Sellar, Mr. W. H. Smith, Mr. E. Stanhope, Mr. Whitley, and Mr. Whitbread. Under the shelter of this high authority, I think I am not doing too much in submitting this Amendment to the House. I trust that the Government will make it an open question, and that every Member will vote upon it in reference to its real merits. If that be done I shall not be afraid of the result. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name on the Paper.

Amendment proposed,

In Rule 1, line 15, to leave out from the word "by," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a majority which consisted of not less than One Hundred Members, and which bore to the minority the proportion of three or more to two."—(Mr. Gedge.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'more than' stand part of the Question."

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I entirely agree with one of the objects of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Gedge)—namely, that of simplifying the arithmetical puzzle which now exists; but the hon. Member has complicated the question by attaching to the Amendment a proportional closure, to which, for my own part, I am altogether opposed. If the Government are to go back now and make a retrograde step, we shall have lost all the advantage of the last three weeks' discussion. Every speech made by the Government on these Rules has been made on the assumption that the Rule is to be founded upon simple closure, and to that they have remained firm, the only case in which they have altered their Rule having been where, in accordance with the general feeling of the House, they omitted the previous consent of the Speaker and substituted his veto. I cannot believe that the Government will turn their backs upon all their previous arguments, and therefore it is not necessary to go further into the question. I fully agree that it is desirable to get rid of the arithmetical puzzle, and that the real reason of the Rule having proved useless has not been the action of the Chair, but the fact of a majority of 200 being necessary. I cannot see why 40 Members should neutralize 200, while 301 are enough to prevail against 300. I do not see what magic there is in the number of 40. I should prefer that we should have a simple closure, the necessary quorum being fixed. The object is to make the will of the majority prevail, and also to prevent a snatch Division on the subject. I should like to see some words substituted instead of the arithmetical puzzle, and I would suggest that the majority should be double the minority. I hope that the hon. Member for Stockport will not go to a Division, but will withdraw his Amendment, so that we may be able to go into the question and decide what the quorum should be. By the means which I suggest we should simplify the Rule and get rid of the arithmetical puzzle.

MR. CLANCOY (Dublin Co., N.): I cannot help thinking that the Amendment now under consideration is simply a bogus Amendment—that it is not intended to be prosecuted seriously, but simply to prevent another which stands lower on the Paper from being discussed. That sort of thing shows that what we have dreaded is very likely to occur—namely, that some irresponsible Member on the other side of the House will be found resorting to tactics not of a very creditable kind against a particular section of the House. Whatever the Government may think of the matter, after the speech of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Gedge) no doubt can be entertained as to what is meant by these Rules by the hon. Member and those with whom he acts. He speaks of the real foe to be encountered in the matter as the Irish Party. We have asserted over and over again that these Rules are wholly, solely, and expressly intended to be used against the Irish Party. Now, I maintain that the Irish Members, notwithstanding the charges of obstruction which have been made against them, have not been guilty of such obstruction as to call for the sweeping censure which would be implied in the application of the closure. The admissions of the hon. Member certainly make out a case of resistance to these Rules which I do not think the Irish Members anticipated would be forthcoming from the other side of the House. The majority of the House, I am afraid, will at certain times act unjustly, very much like Caliph Omar, when he burned the Alexandrian Library, when he declared that books containing anything consistent with the Koran were superfluous, while those which contained anything inconsistent with the Koran were mischievous. It is exactly the same case here. If the views of the Irish Members are in accordance with those of the Government they are superfluous, and if not they are mischievous, and should be summarily disposed of. There is something like malice in the suggestion of the hon. Member for Stockport—that the Rule should be further strengthened, so that it may strike us more heavily when we are in a minority. He knows very well that we shall always be in a minority, and, therefore, it will be constantly applied to us, while it will never be allowed to hurt the Tory Party when they are in a minority.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I shall not follow hon. Members in attempting to vindicate the closure as a Rule, or the necessity for the closure. I think the House has had enough of that argument. I will, however, express a hope that in the remaining discussions the House may be enabled to confine itself to the particular Amendment under debate, and that it will not be diverted into the consideration of other questions which have been decided over and over again by majorities of the House. I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Gedge) will not think that I am wanting in respect for him if I fail to notice his arguments in favour of the closure. My hon. Friend has made an elaborate argument in favour of a different system of closure from that which the Government propose. I will not go so far as to say that the hon. Member has not made an argument which, considering the figures which should be applied to closure in the first instance, and supposing there had been no system of closure in existence, might not have been considered by the House with great advantage; but the House is not in such a position. It must be understood that the Government, in proposing this Rule for the consideration of the House, have based it upon certain conditions in a Division, under the belief that those conditions are necessary to secure the complete liberties of the House—the liberties of the minority as well as the rights of the majority—and that any departure from the principle upon which this Rule is based, as far as Divisions are concerned, would not be an act of good faith on the part of the Government with the House itself. My hon. Friend has asked the Government to leave this matter an open question, and not to make it a Party question. Throughout these debates I think I have made it clear to the House that the subject of closure is not regarded as a Party question. It has been my duty to press this Rule on the attention of the House, because I have been placed in a position which rendered it imperative that I should submit conditions which are thought necessary for the conduct of the Business of the House. I may recall to the recollection of the House that I stated clearly and distinctly that the Rule is not a Party question, although it is a matter which we consider to be necessary and imperative for the conduct of the Business of the House. If any hon. Member is in favour of the Amendment, of course, he is quite at liberty to vote for it; but, as a Member of the Government, I am bound, as being responsible above all for the conduct of this particular debate, to be no party to changing the principle of the Rule. My hon. Friend laid stress on the fact that the 40th man, under the Rule, will enjoy a power and influence which are undue and improper; but under no circumstances can we get rid of the extraordinary power we are obliged to give to that one man. If there is no 40th man, there will be in the proposal of my hon. Friend some man who will have precisely the same influence. My hon. Friend objects to the condition that if there are more than 39 Members who vote in one way, there must be more than 100 who vote the other; but, under his Amendment, he requires that more than 139 should vote in order to close the debate.

MR. GEDGE: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. He is taking the difference between the majority and the minority under the Rule. I do not propose anything of the kind; but I provide, whenever the majority is in the proportion of 3 to 2, it shall have the power of closure.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The Rule provides that when the minority is less than 40 the majority shall be more than 100, and unless the 100th Member can be found the application of the closure will be prevented. It is scarcely necessary for me to refer to the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) intends to propose. The right hon. Gentleman objects to the existing Rule because of the arithmetical puzzle it involves. If it be a puzzle, it is one with which the House is familiar. The Chair has not always been informed as to whether there were really 200 Members in the House who were prepared to support the closure, and I have myself always seen the extreme difficulty by which the Chair would be surrounded in the attempt to ascertain whether that was the case or not. From that responsibility the Chair under this Rule will, to a great extent, be relieved, as the responsibility will be cast on the Member who proposes to apply the closure. Under all the circumstances I trust that my hon. Friend will rest content with having raised the question, and will spare the House the necessity of going to a Division on a subject upon which it has already expressed a conclusive opinion.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I do not know that I should feel inclined to object to the first part of the Amendment, but in regard to the last part I do not think the Amendment is fair, or that the hon. Member has succeeded in making it clear to the House that it is one which ought to be accepted. The hon. Gentleman has indulged in a considerable amount of invective against the Irish Party, and has accused us of making the same speeches over and over again for the purpose of obstruction. No more unfounded charge was ever made, for we have always been extremely careful not to repeat speeches made on this side of the House. At the same time I may point out that a great portion of the argument of the hon. Gentleman consisted of an abstract of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Chance). With regard to the Amendment on the Paper, I have given Notice of a further Amendment to that Amendment to leave out at the end "two" and insert "one" with the view of securing what I believe would be a better safeguard for the rights of minorities. The Rule, as it stands, undoubtedly does tell in favour of small minorities, and it cuts against large minorities. I believe it will always be the desire of Parliament to protect small minorities, and it will be the duty of the Chair in all cases to have regard to the rights of minorities, and especially of small minorities. I will not travel over the important part which small minorities have played in this House in past times. It would only be tiresome to recite the number of instances in which small minorities, by their perseverance, activity, and sometimes by their doggedness, have succeeded in bringing about useful reforms and alterations of the law. Large minorities are generally able to protect themselves, and a Minister would hesitate to apply the closure to them. I have myself, therefore, put down on the Paper an Amendment to the hon. Member for Stockport's Amendment, the object of which is to require that the majority which is to be able to enforce the closure should never be less than in the proportion of 3 to 1. That, I think, would be perfectly fair. It has been repeatedly said by hon. Members who are destitute of solid argument that the proceedings of the House would degenerate into anarchy unless we adopt a most drastic Closure Rule; but I maintain that the Chair is already fully capable of preventing such a state of things, and I assert that during the last five years there has been nothing in the nature of obstruction on the part of the Irish Members, either in Committee of Supply or in Committee of the Whole House on Bills.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I support the suggestion of my hon. Friend, for the reason that the Rule is far better as it stands than it would be with the Amendment of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Gedge), and I protest against that hon. Member—who is responsible for having put upon the Paper bogus and decidedly obstructive Amendments—charging anyone on these Benches with obstruction. I would remind him that an ounce of practice is worth a pound of theory. We have had to complain of the conspiracy of silence on the Front Bench opposite.

MR. SPEAKER: I would remind the House that the subject under discussion is that of numbers. It would be more regular, therefore, for the hon. Member to confine himself to that Question.

MR. FLYNN: I wish to support the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone. The Clôture Rule is intended to put down obstruction and deliberate prolixity, and it will be apparent to the whole House that if there be obstruction and prolixity of debate a large number of Members will recognize the fact, and that there will be no difficulty, under the Amendment of my hon. Friend, in voting down those who may be anxious to prolong a discussion beyond what the majority think fair. In a House of 400 Members, if 300 think a discussion has lasted long enough, they will be able to close that discussion.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I maintain that if we act on the principle of the clôture we should always require it to be applied by a bare majority in a full House. The restrictions which it is sought to place upon the application of the clôture are for the purpose of preventing it being done by a snatch vote, and it certainly seems to me that the safest thing to do is to insist that the number of Members necessary to enforce the clôture shall be such that there will be no fear of the clôture being applied to a minority which would be a majority in a full House. In a House of 500 you would have a majority of 300 to vote down 200 under the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite; but that would always save the regular Opposition, and I maintain that if the clôture is to be adopted by the House, it should be adopted fairly. The principle should be laid down that the will of a bare majority in a full House should prevail, and there should be no arrangement made to save a certain Party or section of Members in the House. The hon. Member wants his Amendment as a possible protection for the Conservative Party. Can he, then, quarrel with us for seeking protection for a much weaker Party? If, in the future, the Tory Party is in the minority, it will always be a minority of more than 200, and it will have a great Party outside to appeal to. I submit that if you require a majority of three to one to enforce the clôture, it will be perfectly competent for the House to silence the Irish Members. I do, however, think it only fair that whenever the House is full, it should have the power of closing its debates by a bare majority. The desire of the hon. Member for Stockport is to so arrange the clôture that it may be used against the Irish Members, but against no one else. Of course, a large minority such as would bear the proportion of two to three would always be able to protect itself in this House, and will always have an appeal to a sympathetic country; but the minority which we seek to protect by the Amendment of my hon. Friend is one which is not protected by public opinion in this country—although, no doubt, it has public opinion at its back in Ireland. The influence of that Party is discounted by this House. We desire for it, therefore, the shield of the Rules of the House. I appeal in a spirit of fair play to hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I say to them that when they seek to apply a limitation they ought to apply the principle to its legitimate conclusion. I would appeal to hon. Members now on the Opposition side of the House who hold strong views with regard to the clôture, and I would tell them they would do well to vote with us on this Amendment, for the reason that they would be voting against the principle of protecting the minority of the future. What the House ought to do is to protect, not large minorities—which are capable of protecting themselves—but small ones.

Mr. M. J. Kenny

MR. DEASY (Mayo, W.): I also desire to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone. According to the proposal of the Rule, for the first time in the history of Parliamentary debate, the minority would be entirely at the mercy of the majority. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Stockport would probably be less objectionable than the Rule as it stands, but the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. M. Kenny) would make it possible for a small minority to make itself heard, whilst, at the same time, preventing a small minority from wrecking the proceedings of the House. Without the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Irish Party would be utterly powerless, if all the English Parties should combine for the purpose of closing the debate and preventing us from making ourselves heard. It would be impossible for 85 or 86 Members to continue a debate in the House for a quarter of an hour longer than the House generally desired, if the Opposition joined with the Government in enforcing the clôture. I have no doubt that every Englishman, whether belonging to the Government or the Opposition, and however much in sympathy with a certain section of Members, would put his foot down to prevent the degradation of the House by frivolous discussion and obstruction. If Radical Members in this House once thought that the Irish Party were introducing Motions and carrying on a discussion for obstructive purposes, they would not, I am sure, have the least hesitation in coalescing with the Government in order to prevent the carrying on of these tactics. Whether you have a majority of three to two or three to one can make very little difference to the Government of this country. The hon. Gentleman opposite acknowledges that the Irish Members have been sent here by the people of Ireland in order to discharge a certain duty, and that we consider ourselves conscientiously bound to discharge that duty. But he says the House of Commons cannot afford time to listen to us, and that that is the reason he brings forward his Amendment. He thinks it desirable to close the mouths of the Irish people. Well, I do not think a declaration of that kind can do the hon. Gentleman any good. I am sure the Government do not feel obliged to him for showing his hand in that way. However, I trust the House will not assent to the hon. Gentleman's Amendment, but will carry the modification suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): I can scarcely congratulate the hon. Member for Stockport upon the manner in which he has introduced his Amendment, which simply accentuates exclusion plus clôture. We have a Conservative Party made up of 320 Members, and the Whips of that Party are required to look after little more than half that number to put down the Irish Party. Looking at the fact that in a short time we shall have a Coercion Bill before us, some of the provisions of which will be sufficient to call from Irish Members a demand that they shall have a hearing, we cannot fail to observe that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Stockport will give power to a small part of the House to stop Irish Members from making their representations. The hon. Member let the cat out of the bag when he declared that we had usurped the time of the House. We know from perusal of the records that obstruction has come mainly from the Conservative side of the House. I have a Return of the number of Adjournment Motions moved in the House of Commons for several years past, and I find that out of a total of 27 such Motions the Conservative Party have moved no less than 13, whilst there have come from these Benches only four.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not confining himself to the Question of the proposition of three or more to two by which it is proposed to apply the clôture.

Mr. CONWAY : I am adducing this as an illustration.

Mr. SPEAKER : It is altogether irrelevant to the subject under discussion.

Mr. CONWAY : Then, I will pursue the argument with regard to the numbers relatively. I contend that this Motion of the hon. Member for Stockport is intended as a weapon to stifle our voices. As the Representative of an Irish constituency, sent here to express the grievances of the Irish people, I shall resist to the very utmost the Amendment of the hon. Member for Stockport, and shall give all the support I can to the suggested Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Tyrone, which seeks to make the majority at least three to one. Seeing that the Conservative Party consists of 320 Members, and that they have declared over and over again that it is their intention to stifle our voices, I think that this three to one is not a very great concession for them to make us. I appeal to the House to support, so far as the sense of fair play demands, the suggestion of my hon. Friend.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): The controversy raised by the hon. Gentleman opposite is one with which hon. Members who were in the last Parliament must be familiar. It will be remembered that when the question of Procedure was before the House in 1882, the Tory Party brought forward a Motion practically the same as that now moved by the hon. Member for Stockport. That Motion would have substituted a clôture by two-thirds for a clôture by a bare majority. The question was ably discussed by the Irish Members, and there were some among them who thought there was something to be said in favour of such a form of clôture. I think, however, that if there is to be a clôture it should be one that should apply equally to all Parties and sections in this House. The hon. Gentleman opposite thinks that you might leave untrammelled licence to the particular Party he is associated with, for the purpose of putting down a section of this House to which he did not scruple to make pointed and definite allusion. That is the objection we have been making all along. We have stated that that will be the effect of the clôture, and it has been denied over and over again by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. Now, at the close of the discussion, we have the cat let out of the basket by the hon. Gentleman, who tells us that the clôture is intended to operate against us. The Amendment of the hon. Gentleman would be to prevent the clôture being applied at all unless there happened to be more than 100 Members present, and the second result would be that if you had 100 Members present you could only put them down by a majority of 150, and if you had a minority of 200 the clôture could only be applied by a majority of 300. The effect of the Amendment would be to prevent the application of the clôture to any English political Party. The Conservative Party possesses 318 Members, which does not give them a majority in the House. Under the Rule they could be put down if, on a Division, there were 319 in favour of the clôture; but if the Amendment of the hon. Member were to be adopted, it would require 100 more Members than there are in the House to apply the clôture to that Party, which I submit is a reductio ad absurdum. If the hon. Member's Amendment were to pass, the Conservative Party would be protected under all circumstances, even if it were in Opposition. The plain, elementary question the House has to decide is this: Whether it is in favour of a clôture which will put down any minority that wants to override the wish and desire of the majority, or whether it wants to confine the clôture to a single section and nationality in the House? On such a question I cannot help thinking there should be no difference of opinion, except, perhaps, amongst a few irreclaimable and irreconcilable Tories. I trust that when the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman is put to the House it will be rejected, not only by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, but by the majority on this side of the House.

Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I trust that the clear declaration made by the First Lord of the Treasury will tend to reduce the number of Amendments on this Rule. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that he has acted all through these discussions in perfect good faith, and that the Government feel bound to adhere to the remaining portion of the Rule as it stands. A good many hon. Members have expressed views and recorded votes on former parts of the Rule on the assumption that the Government intend to adhere to the quorum mentioned in the latter part of the Rule. Whether the selection in that latter part of the Rule is the best one possible I do not know; but I deny that it is an arithmetical puzzle. We may, by breaking down these figures, extend this already protracted discussion to an interminable length. I think, with the right hon. Gentleman, that any alteration of this part of the Rule will be a departure from principle, and will tend to increase the number of Amendments.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I beg to move, in line 16, to leave out "Two Hundred," and insert "Three Hundred." This House is full in the evenings from half-past 4 o'clock to half-past 7, and empty from about half-past 7 to half-past 10 or 11; and what we want to guard against is, the application of the clôture in the absence of a large majority of the House, and at a moment when the House is not prepared for the Question of the clôture. The clôture is a thing which, in its essence, demands preparation, and ought to preclude surprise. In its very essence, according to its most earnest advocates, it is a thing which ought to be applied, not by an accidental majority at a particular moment for the purpose of winning a chance triumph, but should be an instrument permanently in the hands of the majority for ruling the Business of the House, with due regard to minorities and with due notice to them. We desire to prevent hon. Members, in moments of Party passion, snatching a victory from Gentlemen who are unprepared to meet the Question of clôture. It will be easy for an hon. Member who intends to move the clôture to give Notice to the Whip of his Party, and it would be easy for that Whip to have 200 Members in the House at 10 o'clock, to take other Parties by surprise and carry the clôture. What we fear is, that Members will be able, as the Resolution now stands, to carry the clôture by a coup de main. I am not going beyond the bounds of propriety when I say that you can imagine hon. Members doing a thing like that. If I myself had a Bill before the House, and found

hon. Members endeavouring, by foul means, to obstruct the verdict of the majority, I should have no objection to giving them a bit of a surprise by moving the clôture, and I should be able to do it by the means I have pointed out. This state of things will be provided against by the adoption of the Amendment I propose. I would point out that, since the new Parliament, there have almost always been 200 Conservative Members in this House. The Government are compelled, under stress of circumstances, to have a large number of Members present during the dinner hour, and the result will be, if the Rule passes in its present form, that they will always be in a position to carry a Clôture Resolution even between half-past 7 and half-past 10 o'clock, when the Members of the Opposition are dining, are at the theatre, or are somewhere else than in the House of Commons. We should not allow a fleeting majority to carry the clôture. Of course, speaking at 20 minutes to 3 o'clock on a Wednesday afternoon, I find it somewhat difficult to convince hon. Members that there may be occasions on which hon. Members may be carried away in a whirlwind of Party passion. The sacred dulness of the present hour is rather an obstacle to getting hon. Members to contemplate such a state of things; but hon. Members who have been in the House at 12 o'clock at night, at the close of a long debate, know that we not unfrequently find a large number of Members anxious for one thing, and one thing only—namely, to bring the discussion to an end at the earliest possible moment. The result of my Amendment would be this—that during an important discussion the clôture would never be applied until everybody said—"We are heart sick of this—the question has been adequately discussed, therefore let us now take a Division." The clôture would in that way be applied on a day and at a period of the evening when Members were in the House to take part in the Division. The clôture would never, under almost any circumstances, be applied until the Whips of the Ministerial Party said—"This is the night for the Division, and this is the night on which you must be in your place in the House of Commons." If you enable the clôture to be applied in a thin House, you will make it a matter of odium. You lessen the odium by broadening the responsibility, and you broaden the responsibility by having the Motion for clôture supported by 300 instead of 200 Members, which may be little more than half a Ministerial majority.

[Thirtieth Night.]

Amendment proposed, in line 16, to leave out "Two Hundred," in order to insert "Three Hundred."—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

Question proposed, "That 'Two Hundred' stand part of the Question."

MR. CRAIG SELLAR (Lanarkshire, Partick): As an Amendment, which stands next on the Paper, is in my name, and is, in the first part of it, identical with that of the hon. Member (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), I think I may save the time of the House if I now say what I wish to say in defence of my Amendment. I observe, however, a discrepancy between the statements of the right hon. Gentlemen on the two Front Benches, which might, perhaps, be explained before we proceed further. I understood the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House to say that he would sanction no departure from the principle of the existing Rule, and that seemed to me a very reasonable statement to make. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) put what seemed to me to be a gloss on the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury, because he said that the right hon. Gentleman had stated that any change in the Rule would be a departure from principle. I certainly did not understand the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House to say that. I hope I am right in what I imagined—namely, that he said he would sanction no departure from the principle of the Rule.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Perhaps it would be better that I should intervene at this moment. I cannot, of course, bind the House; but I am responsible for the proposal which I made. I consider that the figures as they stand on the Paper are figures that bind me. I am personally bound to ask the House to adhere to the Rule as I proposed it; and the debate has proceeded upon the assumption that I shall adhere to those figures. I have used the word "principle," and the hon. Member is at liberty, from his point of view, to attach to that word the interpretation he has done. Individually, while I cannot bind the House, I am bound by the figures I have placed upon the Paper.

MR. CRAIG SELLAR: I am glad, Sir, that this point is cleared up; and now I understand that, though the right hon. Gentleman considers himself personally bound to the numbers on the Paper, his followers need not consider themselves bound. I hope, therefore, that some, at least, of them will vote with me for my Amendment. The object of that Amendment is to reduce the necessary quorum. I hope that those who agree with me that the quorum ought to be less than 200 will support the Amendment now before the House for the purpose of getting rid of 200, and will then support me in inserting a lesser number—say 120, as I propose, or 140 if that number is preferred. There is no particular principle in 200, unless it is that it is five times 40. It is a number—a round number—taken very much at haphazard and without consideration, and we have great authority against it. In 1882 the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) said it was pushing things very far indeed in the way of protecting the minority to sanction so large a quorum as 200, and has not experience proved him right? Until the other night the closure has been applied only once by the Speaker, and that was in February, 1885, when a debate involving a Vote of Censure on the Government on account of its Egyptian policy was interrupted by a debate on the conduct of a policeman named Murphy. The closing of the latter debate was supported by 207 against 46, so that a collapse was prevented by only seven votes. From that time the Rule has been practically a dead letter, never applied by the Chairman, and only once by the Speaker. The reasons are—first, because the initiative has rested with the Chair; and, secondly, because so large a quorum was required. The first has happily been overcome. The responsibility has been removed from the Chair, because the responsibility of the veto is a mere feather-weight compared with the responsibility of the initiation. That part of the cause of failure is at an end. But the large quorum of 200 remains. It is true that on great occasions there would be no difficulty in bringing up 200 Members; but it is not on great occasions that Obstruction is really rife. On ordinary occasions, as in Committee on a dull Bill and towards the end of the Session, it is difficult to keep together 200 Members of the same way of thinking. The close of the Session is the time when the Government wants to get on with its Business, and when in order to do so it has to make compromises to depart from its policy, and, so to speak, to "square" Members. It is then that it is difficult to get 200 Members to join in stopping a debate. Well, Sir, how are we to meet the difficulty? By a simple process—reduce the quorum. The hon. Member does not wish to meet the difficulty; he wishes to increase it. He would make the quorum larger. I would make it smaller; and if the House agrees to my proposal—if it strikes out 200 and inserts 120 or 140—the difficulty will be met. But the number in the clause makes it a dead letter. You are forging an important weapon, which, as the matter stands, will be ineffective except on great occasions—you are putting a button at the point of your rapier. It is said that tyrannical majorities will rush measures through the House, and that the minorities will not be protected. We have most carefully protected minorities by the words inserted in the Rule a few nights ago, and by the duty of the Chair to protect their rights from infringement; but we have a still greater protection against the majority rushing to a Division in the opinion out-of-doors; and, that being so, I think everyone will admit that minorities are in no danger from the operation of the Rule. It has been said, on the other hand, that there might be occasions when the majority are asleep on which the minority would be able to snatch a Division; but there are, however, very watchful guardians whose duty it is to see that the majority are not taken at a disadvantage in that way. But there is a danger that, unless we make this closure effective by reducing the quorum to 120 or 150, so that it can be used on ordinary occasions, the House will not recover its character for dealing in a business-like way with the Business of the country. I certainly hope that the House will agree that it is desirable to make the closure effective, and that the only way in which that can be done is by reducing the number of the quorum. I am sure, if we do that, we shall have an instrument which will enable us to regain the confidence of the country and the respect of all civilized communities. I trust that hon. Gentlemen who agree that the quorum ought to be reduced will vote for the omission of the words "Two Hundred." If that is carried, I hope they will vote against the insertion of "Three Hundred," and we shall then have a blank space in which to introduce the number which I propose.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): There is, I think, no disguising the fact that there is an objection on the part of Members from Ireland to making the closure effective, because they are afraid of its being used to pass a Coercion Bill. But I would point out that the proposal they make would have no effect whatever, because the Conservative Party would have no difficulty in getting the requisite majority on a question of this kind. I contend that there is no section of the House which has so great an interest in making the Rule effective for legislation, as the Representatives of the smaller nationalities. It is Ireland, Scotland, and Wales which want legislation and have to wait for it, and their Representatives ought to join with us in trying to make the closure effectual for the purpose of bringing back the House to the position of an effective Legislative Assembly; and that will not take place until there is a reduction of the number of the quorum. I hope the time may come when the closure will no longer be required, and I believe that then the House will be ready to relax the Rule; but until we again make the House the first Legislature in the world, instead of what it has become—the laughing-stock of the world—it is in vain to hope for the legislation which the country requires. I therefore appeal to Members on both sides of the House to make this Rule efficient by reducing the number of the quorum.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The hon. Member for the Northern Division of Carnarvonshire (Mr. Rathbone) has stated that the smaller nationalities are most in need of the legislation which it is hoped will be rendered less difficult by these Rules of Procedure. I am not able to agree that these are the only portions of the Kingdom interested, because a great deal of general legislation has been delayed by the incapacity of the House to conduct the Business of the country. I shall not, however, go back to that question, which has been dealt with over and over again. The hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) proposes that the words "Two Hundred" should be left out in order to insert "Three Hundred;" but I would point out that if he carries the first part of his proposal, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Mr. Craig Sellar) is almost certain to be inserted. It is clear that the House will not consent, under any conditions, to increase the number of the quorum; and, therefore, hon. Members below the Gangway may be almost sure that if they exclude the words "Two Hundred" a smaller number would be introduced. If the House adheres to 200, it will do so because it is in the Rule which now exists, and because it has been inserted by the Government in this Rule; but I confess that if I were to take up the question again, I should be willing to insert a smaller number than 200. However, I trust that the figures on the Paper will make the Rule effective. I do not expect to see it frequently enforced, because I believe that Members in all parts of the House will put such a restraint upon themselves as will render it unnecessary that the House should inflict upon itself the humiliation of applying such a Rule as this. There is no doubt, however, that if this Rule fails in its object some other must be adopted by which that object will be secured, because the House will demand and procure for itself greater powers for the conduct of Business, and for regaining the confidence of the country. I repeat, with regard to this Amendment, my belief that no amount of discussion will induce the House to increase the number of the quorum which is on the Paper, and that if the number we propose is left out, its place will be filled, almost of necessity, by a number that may be less agreeable to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): As one of those who have had care in the past of majorities in this House, I would earnestly urge the reduction of the number of the quorum, if not to 120, to 150. I have been well acquainted with the difficulty of insuring the presence of 200 Members of the House when it was desired to put the closure in force. I think, if we are to have the closure at all, it should be one that can be easily and readily applied, and which will admit of application to those smaller matters which constantly arise, and which constitute the difficulty of conducting the ordinary Business of the House. Towards the end of the Session, when the House begins to empty, and Members, on one pretext or another, go into the country or abroad, it will be very difficult to insure a majority of 200 for the discussion of the Estimates and similar Business. It would seem that hon. Gentlemen opposite, in proposing this number, were considering the possibility that when the Rule comes to be applied against themselves the number requisite for its application will stand in the way of its being so used. I earnestly urge on the House not to follow the lead of the First Lord of the Treasury, but to consent to make the Rule effective, the first step towards which is to leave out the words "Two Hundred."

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I rise to protest against the adoption of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Mr. Craig Sellar). The arguments which have been brought forward in support of that Amendment are, in my opinion, fallacious. It is said that in July and August it is difficult to get 200 Members of the House together for the purpose of supporting the closure; but that is not consistent with the statement of some Members on the Front Bench, who speak of the necessity of having 200 Members present to prevent snatch Divisions being taken. I trust that the House will not agree to the proposal to reduce the number of the quorum.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton): I do not think that on an important question like this we ought to be guided entirely by the convenience of the Whips. It is assumed that the Rule which has been in force since 1882 has been a failure; that the House has been regularly obstructed and unable to carry on its Business. I utterly deny that. I say that since 1882, during the years 1883-6, there has been no obstruction of the ordinary Business of the House which needed the application of any closure whatever; and, so far as Committee of Supply is concerned, I cannot recollect a single instance since 1882 when, if this Rule had been in operation, it would have been enforced by the Chairman. Therefore, although hon. Members may contemplate some difficulties with regard to the future, we ought not to assume that the House has been reduced to the state of impotency which is alleged by the want of this Rule. The obstruction and paralysis of Business has arisen from causes more frequent and more deadly in their results than the prolongation of debate. In my opinion, if 200 Members, who do not represent one-third of the House, are not prepared to attend to the Business of the country, then I cannot see that such a serious Resolution as that of stopping all debate ought to be used at all. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that this will not be a Rule of daily application, and that it would be a discredit to the House if it became so. I appeal to hon. Members to take the sound advice given by the right hon. Gentleman, and not fall into the trap, by striking out a number whose place would be filled by a smaller number. Her Majesty's Government are in this position—they have put down this Resolution as a whole; they propose to the House a material variation in the Law of Closure; the question has never been raised during the last three weeks that there was to be any alteration in the number of the quorum; the Government are pledged to the number on the Paper, and it would be a departure from principle on their part if they were to alter the number now. I say it is now too late in the day to change front, and I hope the House will support the Government in the view which they take. I strongly urge hon. Members below the Gangway to agree to the proposal of the Government.

Mr. W. H. Smith

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): The right hon. Gentleman has himself told us that a smaller number than 200 might be desirable as the quorum; but he said also that we must be careful to guard against this becoming a Party consideration. The object of this Rule is to give back to the Members of the House some of the rights which they have lost in recent days, because of the interminable discussion which arises on almost every subject brought forward by the Government of the day. These are the only subjects which are able to be discussed. How are hon. Members to get back their rights? Simply by shortening discussion on these questions. It is in consequence of the length to which debates have been needlessly extended on subjects of comparatively little interest, that the time of private Members has been taken up by the Government, and it has been impossible for them to bring forward for discussion many subjects of great interest to the country. These Rules are to assist us in discussing and legislating on matters of interest to the people. We have been prevented from doing that, and we hope, by passing a stringent measure of this kind, that the present state of things will be remedied; and we believe that by placing this weapon in the hands of the majority the rights of all will be protected. I must join issue with the right hon. Gentleman below me when he says that we have had no obstruction during the last few years; and I am astonished that my right hon. Friend should have stood up and made that statement, because my experience, and I believe that of most hon. Members, is that during the period he speaks of there has been an intolerable amount of useless discussion. I hope hon. Members who object to the words "Two Hundred" will go into the Lobby to support the Amendment to leave them out, and then will come the question as to the proper number for the quorum.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: As I find that unconsciously I have got right hon. Gentlemen into a position of difficulty I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER: Is it your pleasure that the Amendment be withdrawn? ["No, no!"]

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): Mr. Speaker, I think the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House has furnished us with the strongest reason why we should go to a Division on this Amendment. While I have great respect for the abilities of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), I venture to regard the remarks that have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) as describing the true state of the case. I ask hon. Members whether, as a matter of fact, there were during the whole of last Session 200 Members always present? There have been many occasions in the autumn when the attendance of Members has been less than 200; and I ask how, if a similar state of things occurs again, we are to get the quorum which is necessary for the application of the closure? We have a right to vote on the question that the words "Two Hundred" be left out, and I think hon. Members ought to exercise that right. I am in favour of the insertion in the Rule of the number 150 instead of that proposed by the Government. If we beat the right hon. Gentleman on this Division, after what he has said, I think it is very likely that he will give way; but, at any rate, I hope hon. Members on this side will stand to their guns and go to a Division, whether they support the hon. Member below the Gangway or not.

[Thirteenth Night.]

Mr. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead): We are practically placing the Business of the House in the hands of the Government of the day by adopting this Rule; but it must be remembered that the legislation of this country is the result of the authority given by the constituencies, and that the matters treated in this House have wider ramifications and are more far-reaching in their consequences than the mere excitement which they cause here. I am anxious to contribute as much as I can to the speedy passage of these Rules, and I hope that hon. Members will bring about that result by all the means in their power. I support the Government in this matter, although I believe that the more latitude we give them the deeper will they stick in the mud.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 222; Noes 120: Majority 102.

AYES.

Abraham, W. (Glam.)	Balfour, Sir G.
Acland, C. T. D.	Bates, Sir E.
Allison, R. A.	Baumann, A. A.
Ambrose, W.	Beach, W. W. B.
Amherst, W. A. T.	Bentinck, Lord H. C.
Asher, A.	Bentinck, W. G. C.
Ashmead-Bartlett, E.	Beresford, Lord C. W.
Baden-Powell, G. S.	Dela Poer
Baggallay, E.	Bigger, J. G.
Bailey, Sir J. R.	Bigwood, J.
Balfour, rt. hon. A. J.	Blake, J. A.

Blake, T.	Fry, T.
Blane, A.	Fuller, G. P.
Blundell, Col. H. B. H.	Gathorne-Hardy, hon. A. E.
Bolton, J. C.	Gibson, J. G.
Borthwick, Sir A.	Gill, T. P.
Bradlaugh, C.	Goldsworthy, Major-General W. T.
Briatowe, T. L.	Gorst, Sir J. E.
Broadhurst, H.	Goechen, rt. hon. G. J.
Brodrick, hon. W. St. J. F.	Gourley, E. T.
Brooks, Sir W. C.	Grimston, Viscount
Burdett-Coutta, W. L. Ash.-B.	Grove, Sir T. F.
Burghley, Lord	Gunter, Colonel R.
Byrne, G. M.	Hall, C.
Cameron, C.	Hamilton, right hon. Lord G. F.
Campbell, Sir A.	Hardcastle, E.
Campbell, H.	Harrington, E.
Campbell, R. F. F.	Hastings, G. W.
Campbell-Bannerman, right hon. H.	Heath, A. E.
Chance, P. A.	Heaton, J. H.
Childers, rt. hon. H. C. E.	Herbert, hon. S.
Clancy, J. J.	Herron-Hodge, R. T.
Clarke, Sir E. G.	Hill, right hon. Lord A. W.
Cobb, H. P.	Hill, Colonel E. S.
Cochrane-Baillie, hon. C. W. A. N.	Hoare, S.
Colomb, Capt. J. C. R.	Holden, I.
Conway, M.	Holland, rt. hon. Sir H. T.
Cooke, C. W. R.	Holmes, rt. hon. H.
Corbet, W. J.	Hooper, J.
Corbett, J.	Howard, J.
Cosham, H.	Howard, J. M.
Craig, J.	Hoyle, I.
Cranborne, Viscount	Hozier, J. H. C.
Craven, J.	Hunt, F. S.
Cremor, W. R.	Hunter, Sir W. G.
Crossley, E.	Isaacson, F. W.
Cubitt, right hon. G.	Jackson, W. L.
Curzon, hon. G. N.	James, hon. W. H.
Dalrymple, C.	Johnston, W.
Dawnay, Colonel hon. L. P.	Kelly, J. R.
De Worms, Baron H.	Kenny, M. J.
Dimdale, Baron R.	Kenyon, hon. G. T.
Dyke, right hon. Sir W. H.	Kerans, F. H.
Elliot, Sir G.	Kilcourse, right hon. Viscount
Elliot, G. W.	Kimber, H.
Ellis, J. E.	King-Harman, Colonel E. R.
Ellis, T. E.	Knightley, Sir R.
Eslemont, P.	Lane, W. J.
Evalyn, W. J.	Lawrance, J. C.
Eyre, Colonel H.	Lea, T.
Farquharson, Dr. R.	Leahy, J.
Feilden, Lt.-Gen. R. J.	Lewis, T. P.
Ferguson, R. C. Munro-Ferguson, right hon. Sir J.	Lewisham, right hon. Viscount
Field, Admiral E.	Llewellyn, E. H.
Fitzgerald, R. U. P.	Long, W. H.
Fitz-Wygram, General Sir F. W.	Low, M.
Flynn, J. C.	Lyell, L.
Folkestone, right hon. Viscount	Macdonald, rt. hon. J. H. A.
Forster, Sir C.	Macdonald, W. A.
Forwood, A. B.	MacInnes, G.
Fowler, rt. hon. H. H.	MacNeill, J. G. S.
Fowler, Sir R. N.	M'Arthur, A.
Fox, Dr. J. F.	M'Cartan, M.
	M'Donald, P.
	M'Ewan, W.

Mr. Hennessy

Mallock, R.
 Mappin, Sir F. T.
 Matthews, rt. hon. H.
 Maxwell, Sir H. E.
 Menzies, R. S.
 Morgan, rt. hon. G. O.
 Morley, rt. hon. J.
 Mount, W. G.
 Mowbray, R. G. C.
 Mulholland, H. L.
 Noble, W.
 Nolan, J.
 Northcote, hon. H. S.
 O'Brien, J. F. X.
 O'Brien, P.
 O'Brien, P. J.
 O'Connor, A.
 O'Connor, T. P.
 O'Doherty, J. E.
 O'Hanlon, T.
 O'Kelly, J.
 Paget, Sir R. H.
 Parker, C. S.
 Parnell, C. S.
 Pearce, W.
 Pelly, Sir L.
 Plowden, Sir W. C.
 Plunket, right hon.
 D. R.
 Pomfret, W. P.
 Powell, F. S.
 Power, P. J.
 Rankin, J.
 Redmond, J. E.
 Ritchie, rt. hon. C. T.
 Roberts, J.
 Roberts, J. B.
 Robinson, T.
 Roscoe, Sir H. E.
 Rowlands, J.

Rowntree, J.
 Russell, E. R.
 Salt, T.
 Sandys, Lieut-Col. T. M.
 Selwyn, Captain C. W.
 Shirley, W. S.
 Sidebottom, T. H.
 Smith, rt. hon. W. H.
 Smith, A.
 Smith, S.
 Stack, J.
 Stanhope, hon. P. J.
 Stansfeld, rt. hon. J.
 Stevenson, F. S.
 Sullivan, D.
 Sutherland, A.
 Swinburne, Sir J.
 Tanner, C. K.
 Temple, Sir R.
 Theobald, J.
 Thomas, A.
 Trotter, H. J.
 Tufts, J.
 Wallace, R.
 Watson, J.
 Webster, R. G.
 Weymouth, Viscount
 White, J. B.
 Whitley, E.
 Whitmore, C. A.
 Will, J. S.
 Wilson, H. J.
 Winterbotham, A. B.
 Woodhead, J.
 Wortley, C. B. Stuart-

TELLERS.

Douglas, A. Akers-
 Walrond, Col. W. H.

NOTES.

Addison, J. E. W.
 Anstruther, H. T.
 Baird, J. G. A.
 Balfour, G. W.
 Baines, Major G. E.
 Barbour, W. B.
 Barran, J.
 Barry, A. H. Smith-
 Beadel, W. J.
 Beckett, E. W.
 Beckett, W.
 Bethell, Commander G.
 B. Biddulph, M.
 Birkbeck, Sir E.
 Bond, G. H.
 Bond, H. C. O.
 Bryce, J.
 Buchanan, T. R.
 Buxton, S. C.
 Caldwell, J.
 Chamberlain, R.
 Channing, F. A.
 Coghill, D. H.
 Collings, J.
 Colman, J. J.
 Commerell, Adml. Sir
 J. E.
 Crawford, D.
 Cross, H. S.

Crossman, Gen. Sir W.
 Davenport, H. T.
 Davenport, W. B.
 De Lisle, E. J. L. M.
 P.
 Dixon, G.
 Dorington, Sir J. E.
 Duff, R. W.
 Dugdale, J. S.
 Egerton, hon. A. de T.
 Elcho, Lord
 Elliot, hon. A. R. D.
 Elliot, hon. H. F. H.
 Ewing, Sir A. O.
 Finch-Hatton, hon.
 M. E. G.
 Fisher, W. H.
 Flower, O.
 Fraser, General C. C.
 Fry, L.
 Gedge, S.
 Gent-Davis, R.
 Green, Sir E.
 Grey, Sir E.
 Gordon, R. T.
 Hamilton, Col. C. E.
 Hanbury, R. W.
 Hardcastle, F.
 Hartington, Marq. of
 Hayne, C. Seale-

Heathcote, Capt. J. H.
 Edwards-
 Heneage, right hon. E.
 Hingley, B.
 Hornby, W. H.
 Howorth, H. H.
 Hubbard, E.
 Hughes-Hallett, Col.
 F. C.
 Isaacs, L. H.
 Jennings, L. J.
 Joicey, J.
 Kay-Shuttleworth, rt.
 hon. Sir U. J.
 Kennaway, Sir J. H.
 Knatchbull-Hugessen,
 hon. H. T.
 Knowles, L.
 Lafone, A.
 Lawrence, Sir J. J. T.
 Lewis, C. E.
 Macartney, W. G. E.
 Maclean, F. W.
 M'Calmont, Captain J.
 Malcolm, Col. J. W.
 Marjoribanks, rt. hon.
 E.
 Milvain, T.
 Montagu, S.
 Morgan, hon. F.
 Morgan, O. V.
 Morley, A.
 O'Neill, hon. R. T.
 Pease, H. F.
 Penton, Captain F. T.
 Playfair, rt. hon. Sir
 L.

Powell, W. R. H.
 Price, T. P.
 Raach, Major F. O.
 Reed, H. B.
 Robertson, E.
 Robinson, B.
 Russell, T. W.
 Saunderson, Col. E. J.
 Shaw-Stewart, M. H.
 Sidebotham, J. W.
 Spencer, hon. C. R.
 Stewart, M. J.
 Swetenham, E.
 Sykes, C.
 Taping, T. K.
 Taylor, F.
 Thorburn, W.
 Tollemache, H. J.
 Townsend, F.
 Verdin, R.
 Vernon, hon. G. R.
 Vincent, C. E. H.
 Walsh, hon. A. H. J.
 Waring, Colonel T.
 Wharton, J. L.
 Williams, J. Powell-
 Williamson, S.
 Wilson, Sir S.
 Wilson, I.
 Winn, hon. R.
 Wood, N.
 Wright, H. S.
 Yerburch, R. A.

TELLERS.

Rathbone, W.
 Sellar, A. C.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words,
 "Provided always, That this Rule shall be put in force only when the Speaker or the Chairman of Ways and Means is in the Chair."—(Mr.
 William Henry Smith.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E. R., Holderness): I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what would be the effect of the Amendment in the event of the Speaker or the Chairman of Ways and Means falling ill? If I am right in my supposition, all the labour we have gone through would be lost under those circumstances.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREA-SURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): It is intended that this Rule shall only be put in force by the Speaker or the Chairman of Ways and Means. The contingency to which my hon. and gallant Friend alludes is happily one of infrequent occurrence; but the arguments from all parts of the House as to the inexpediency of giving this authority to any Member of the House who might temporarily occupy

[Thirteenth Night.]

the Chair are so strong that I do not feel compelled to adhere to the words which are laid down in the proposed Rule.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I understand that this Rule is to prevent casual Chairmen exercising the power of closure. I fail to see that there is any real distinction to be drawn between the Chairman of Committees and a casual Chairman in this respect.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I have explained that no deputy or casual Chairman will have power to put the Rule in force. The observation of the hon. Member, therefore, falls to the ground. I take care to distinguish between the casual occupant of the Chair and the Member who takes the Chair as the result of the vote of the House. The observation of the hon. Member is of no value, because the Rule, as it stands, restricts the application of the closure to the Speaker and the Chairman of Ways and Means.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I rise to move, at the end of the Question, the addition of the following words:—

“Provided that the Member who shall claim the application of this Rule shall inform the House that he has previously had no communication with the Chair, direct or indirect, as to the propriety of making such Motion.”

I put forward this Amendment with the view of relieving the Chair of responsibility, and I think it right to claim for it the support of the House, including that of the right hon. Gentleman himself. From the very first, the right hon. Gentleman has put forward in favour of this Rule that it makes an important departure from the old Rule in relieving the Chair of responsibility. I do not assent to that proposition; on the contrary, I think the Rule, as it stands, leaves where it was, if it does not increase, the responsibility of the Chair. The meaning of the present Rule is that the occupant of the Chair is to stand as guardian and protector between the tyranny of majorities and the rights of minorities. I am desirous that the Chair should discharge that function, and I say that my Proviso will confirm and strengthen the position of the Speaker and the Chairman in protecting the rights of minorities. The gravest charge that could be brought against a Speaker or Chairman of Committees is that of collusion with the majority, and I desire to relieve the Chair of the remotest chance of coming under that suspicion. As the Rule stands, if a Member gets up and moves the closure, the inevitable conclusion will be that he has had communication beforehand with the Chair. Unless the words which I propose are adopted, I consider that the Rule, in this respect, will be inefficient. There are many ways in which you can hold communication with the Chair which are not direct; and therefore I think that every Member, and still more every Minister of the Crown, ought to be able, when he rises to propose the closure, to declare that he has not had any direct or indirect communication with the Chair. The Vice President of the Council has stated that when he was Tory Whip, during the Parliament of 1874-80, he was frequently sent by Mr. Disraeli to the then Chairman of Ways and Means, to complain that the Business of the House was not being conducted with sufficient speed, and to threaten him with Mr. Disraeli's displeasure if the Business was not got through more quickly. The Speaker and Chairman ought, so to speak, to be placed in quarantine; there ought to be a cordon around the Chair to guard it against infection from the Treasury Bench. I do not, of course, say that disrespectfully to right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench; but the great thing we have to do is to save the Chair from the suspicion of collusion, and it is for that reason that I venture to submit my Amendment to the House.

Mr. W. H. Smith

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words, “Provided that the Member who shall claim the application of this Rule shall inform the House that he has previously had no communication with the Chair, direct or indirect, as to the propriety of making such Motion.”—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The hon. Gentleman proposes that a cordon should be drawn around the Chair, and that a form of quarantine should be brought into operation; but the House must be aware that a proposal of that kind would be simply impracticable. The custom of the House, from time immemorial, has been for Members to go to the Chair for assistance, guidance, and advice, and it has never yet been suggested that there has been collusion as between the Chair and the Government. The hon. Gentleman has referred to some observations which fell from a Member of the House with reference to a former Chairman of Ways and Means; but we may be perfectly certain that in that case both the Chairman and the Minister were absolutely free from the desire to exercise any undue influence either on one side or the other. No Chairman whom I have seen in the course of my Parliamentary experience has been one on whom any undue influence could have been exercised either by a Member of the House or the Government itself. It is quite impossible that the Business of this House can be carried on unless there is some ability to refer to the Chair whenever the occasion renders it necessary for a Member of the House to obtain advice; and it is almost an insult to the Chair to suggest that it would consent to express an opinion inconsistent with the duty it owes to the House. The question before us is whether we suspect the Speaker and the Chairman of being liable to exercise undue influence, of being capable of exercising undue influence, and of being, therefore, open to motives which might unduly and improperly influence their decisions. I believe that is utterly impossible, and, therefore, it is that I cannot accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. T. P. GILL (Louth, S.): The reasons given by the right hon. Gentleman for rejecting this Amendment are based upon the assumption that no improper conduct on the part of the Chair is possible. My hon. Friend has pointed out that a Member on the Government Bench stated that when he was Whip he constantly approached the Chairman of Ways and Means on the subject of the Business in Committee. But there was a more notable instance in the days of Speaker Sutton, who was accused of being so active an instrument of the will of the Tory Party that the matter was brought before the House. It formed the subject of debate, and gave rise to a very strong opposition to the Speaker. These are two instances of the suspicion of collusion between the Speaker and Chairman of Ways and Means and the Governments of the day. It remains for us to consider, notwithstanding the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, whether this may possibly arise again. I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will reconsider his decision, and accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co. Mid): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the cloture is a very strong measure indeed, directed, in the main, rather against the privileges possessed by private Members than by minorities, it would be for the benefit of the House, and certainly for the benefit of the occupant of the Chair, that this Amendment should be accepted. I have not risen for the purpose of talking at any length, but to appeal to the senior and experienced Members of the House to consider what dangers and difficulties will probably be brought about by the rejection of this Amendment. Surely it ought to be one of the first cares of hon. Members to protect the House from injury, and to protect the Chair from suspicion. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) said the Chair has never been suspected of being in collusion with Members of the House. I do not like to indulge in any innuendo, but, during the first Session I was in the House, I frequently noticed one of the Whips going to the Chair—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must ask the hon. Gentleman not to pursue that line of innuendo.

DR. TANNER: I had no intention—

MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the expression he has used.

DR. TANNER: I shall most certainly withdraw any expression I used that would throw any innuendo on the Chair. I wish to be perfectly plain and above-board in this matter. It was not my intention to throw any innuendo on the Chair. I was saying that to a new and inexperienced Member of the House some proceedings appear somewhat strange. I say, distinctly, I believe the Chair is above all innuendo and all suspicion. I sincerely hope the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) will pay more attention to the protection of minorities. I trust that, for the future of this House and the Chair, he will accept this Amendment.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co. N.): The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ridiculed the notion that there can be any suspicion thrown on the Chair. I am surprised to hear that coming from a Colleague of several hon. and right hon. Gentlemen sitting upon the Ministerial Benches. If there is anything at all notorious, it is that in the debates on the Procedure Rules proposed in 1882, nearly every prominent Member of the Tory Party indulged in predictions that a Speaker might be elected in future who would act in collusion with the majority of the House. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the Ecclesall Division of Sheffield (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) "looked forward with dread to a possible time when the Government of the day would secure the election of a Speaker who would put the clôtüre into operation whenever the Government wished." Sir H. Drummond Wolff pointed to the possible contingency when the Speaker would be found acting in collusion with the majority of the House for the time being; and the Marquess of Salisbury, speaking at Hitchin in 1882, in reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), pictured the time when that right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chamberlain) would have a Speaker of his own appointed, and when laws would be passed without a shred of discussion, and the noble Marquess went on to say—

"If it is true, as it is true, that the Commons is asserting to itself all the power of the Realm, and when changes are taking place which are contrary to all the traditions of the British Constitution, including the Rules which are now under discussion, we should take care that everything is said that can be said on any subject introduced."

In the face of these observations it does not become the First Lord of the Treasury to wax indignant at the idea that the Speakers of the future will be so false to their duty as to act in collusion with the temporary majority of the House. The right hon. Gentleman said that the question raised by this Amendment was, whether we suspect the present Speaker or not. I indignantly deny that such is the question which the Amendment raises. The question raised is, whether the exercise of the great powers that are now to be entrusted to the Speaker, is not to be put entirely beyond suspicion. In my opinion, you cannot secure the immunity of the Chair from suspicion, except by the adoption of some such Amendment as this.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I do not think it altogether becomes the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) to lightly laugh away the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. T. P. O'Connor). The right hon. Gentleman virtually admitted that it was necessary to frequently consult the Chair for advice and assistance. Now, to define the difference between advice and assistance is extremely difficult, and the right hon. Gentleman admitted, in effect, that if the Amendment which my hon. Friend has moved is not accepted, there is nothing to prevent an hon. Member approaching the Chair, and consulting it upon the most delicate question whether the clôtüre should be applied. This Amendment is practically consequential upon the altered nature of the relations between the House and the Chair. Surely, there can be no objection to the distinct declaration that the Member moving the application of the clôtüre should have previously made no private application to the Chair; but that the application should be altogether public. The very fact of insisting upon spontaneity of action would be in itself a guarantee that the Motion for closure was, under the circumstances, justifiable, even whether the Motion was carried, or beaten. I am fully persuaded it would be an advantage to the Chair, and an advantage to the great body of Members, if the Amendment of my hon. Friend were accepted.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 304: Majority 249.—(Div. List, No. 66.)

MR. PARNELL (Cork): I now propose to ask the House and the Government to adopt a Proviso at the end of the Rule. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) will have any objection in accepting this Proviso; because it follows the Precedent he, himself, set in 1882, when he was in Opposition, in respect to the Rule of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). This Proviso is, with the exception of the word "collective," word for word with the one proposed by the right hon. Gentleman in 1882, and it gives an opportunity to a defeated minority to place on record its protest against the decision the House has arrived at. The application of this Proviso will be slightly different in the present case to what it would have been in the case of the Rule of 1882; because the Rule of 1882 was put in force by the Speaker. Under the old Rule, the Speaker had to declare that, in his opinion, it was the evident sense of the House that the subject had been fully discussed, and, thereupon, the Question "that the Question be now put" was to be moved by the Minister; consequently, the protest contemplated by the Proviso would have been directed, not so much against the action of the House, as against the action of the Speaker. From that point of view the Proviso was more open to objection than it is now. The minority may protest against the decision of the majority, and always does; but when it comes to protesting against the decision of the Chair, who is the umpire of our debates? It is quite another and far more serious matter. The action of the Chair under the recent Rules, and under the custom and usage of the House, is carefully guarded against all protest. It is true a Member of the House can put down a Motion against the action of the Speaker; but in no other way is a protest admissible or allowed. Consequently, the action the Leader of the House proposed in 1882, was of a less inoffensive and of a more extreme character than the action I propose. I simply propose that when the Rule has been put in force—

"Any number of Members exceeding Ten, who shall be dissatisfied with such decision, shall be entitled, at the next Sitting of the House, to make a collective protest in writing, which shall be recorded in the Journals of the House."

I think this is a most desirable Proviso. It may happen that the majority will act under circumstances of irritation with reference to questions of great importance. Their action may trespass upon the rights of the minority, and that action may be allowed by the Chair. At a grave and weighty juncture in the history of affairs, it is important that the minority should, at least, have the right of written protest. Is this right which the right hon. Gentleman proposed, and the Conservative Party supported in 1882, to be deliberately refused to us now? In support of my Amendment, I shall content myself by reading a short speech the right hon. Gentleman made in 1882 in moving this very Proviso:—

"Mr. W. H. Smith proposed on an Amendment to add at the end of the Resolution the following Proviso:—'Provided also, That any number of Members exceeding Ten, who shall be dissatisfied with such decision, shall be entitled, at the next Sitting of the House, to make a protest in writing, which shall be recorded in the Journals of the House.'"

The Amendment was amended by the insertion of the word "collective" before "protest," so that my Amendment is word for word with the right hon. Gentleman's. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

"If the action of the Speaker or the Chairman in closing the debate, pursuant to what he considered to be the evident sense of the House, was taken against a considerable minority of the House, it was impossible but that great dissatisfaction would prevail in consequence of the majority having tyrannically closed the mouths of the minority. Instead, therefore, of driving the minority to the country or the Press for the ventilation of their grievances, he proposed that the minority should in such cases have the power of recording the grounds of their dissatisfaction by a protest to be recorded in the Journals of the House, as was the case in the House of Lords."

But times change, and we change with them. The right hon. Gentleman continued—

"He could not conceive anything more dangerous to the House than that there should be no means of stating the grounds of dissatisfaction; and he thought it would be a far more Constitutional course to allow that dissatisfaction to find expression in the Journals of the House, than elsewhere. He believed that this would appear to be a moderate and reasonable course to the country at large. He wished to preserve the power of the House to deal with its own Business, so that its Members might not find a mode of giving expression to their wrongs elsewhere than in that House. He trusted, therefore, that the Government would consent to this addendum to the Resolution. He did not disguise the fact that he was opposed to the Resolution altogether; but if it passed, he wished it should do so with the least possible danger to the House; and he thought his Amendment would mitigate the evils which a very large section of the House felt were attendant upon the Resolution."—(3 Hansard, [274] 808-9.)

Sir R. Assheton Cross, Mr. Stanhope, Lord John Manners, Mr. A. J. Balfour, and Captain Aylmer supported the Amendment, and finally the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) set a good example to future Obstructionists by delivering a second speech upon his Amendment. I beg leave to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words—
“Provided also, That any number of Members exceeding Ten, who shall be dissatisfied with such decision, shall be entitled, at the next Sitting of the House, to make a collective protest in writing, which shall be recorded in the Journals of the House.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) regrets he has been obliged to leave the House; but he has deputed to me the duty of replying to this Amendment. I should have had great difficulty, perhaps, in so doing in the face of the speech my right hon. Friend made some years ago, and which was quoted by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), if it had not been for those wise words of prescience which were cautiously inserted in that speech. My right hon. Friend said, on the occasion referred to, “that times change, and we change with them.”

MR. PARNELL: I am afraid I have unwittingly led the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir John Gorst) into a mistake. Those words were an interpolation of mine.

SIR JOHN GORST: I am even more fortunate than I supposed I was, because if the hon. Member for Cork defers to the wisdom of my right hon. Friend, he will, I am quite sure, defer in a greater measure to his own wisdom. At any rate, in the words of the hon. Gentleman, “when times change, we change with them.” Perhaps, at the time the speech quoted was made many speeches were delivered which, after more mature consideration and experience of the House, the speakers had been induced to modify. It certainly is now the opinion of the Government that a Proviso of this kind might give rise to considerable inconvenience. The Speaker or the Chairman has to assent, or has not to withhold his assent, to the closure; and if an angry minority is empowered to make a collective protest in writing, which is to be recorded on the Journals of the House, it is the opinion of the Government that such a collective protest, however comforting it may be to the minds of the dissentients, will not conduce to the order and to the progress of the Business of the House. While admitting the ingenuity of the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell), in moving an Amendment which was formerly moved by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, I must say it is the deliberate and calm opinion of the Government that, on the whole, the wiser course for the House is to reject the Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I must say, Mr. Speaker, that what the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) is in the habit of calling the delicious irony of the situation is not entirely completed by the running away of the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith); because nothing could be more deliciously ironical than that the duty of vindicating the Order of the House against obstruction should be deputed to the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir John Gorst). The position of the hon. and learned Gentleman reminds me of a celebrated character in one of Balzac's novels. I am not going to make the reference too pointed, and I am sure the hon. and learned Gentleman will not misunderstand me. In one of Balzac's novels there is a character called Vautrian, who is unquestionably the ablest—I do not like to use the word “swindler” though it most correctly describes him—[A VOICE: Operator!] —operator of his time. When he had pursued his nefarious career for a great many years he got tired of it, and placed his services at the disposal of the detective force. In the same way, if the Government desire to put down obstruction, I do not know that they can do better than to secure the services of so experienced a man as the hon. and learned Gentleman. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not condescend to tell us why it was the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) was obliged to leave the House. Has he been summoned to a Cabinet Council; or is he afraid to meet his past utterances on this question, lest the House should see what a perfect turn and right-about-face the Tory Party have executed? Now, in addition to the right hon. Gentleman, the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) took part in the debate on this Proviso in November, 1882, and the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) and the whole Tory Party went into the Lobby in support of the Proviso. The very argument used by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir John Gorst) against the proposal now was used against it then. It was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) that it would be undesirable that Members should, in a moment of irritation, put upon the Journals of the House an expression of their strong and angry feelings upon a question. Does anybody suppose the Tory Party remained without a convenient answer to that? Sir R. Assheton Cross (now Viscount Cross), who at that time sat on the Front Opposition Bench, said—

Mr. Parnell

"The protest would not be entered, as the Home Secretary supposed, at the moment when those who made it were suffering under a sense of defeat, but on the next day, after time had been given for reflection."—(3 Hansard, [274] 811.)

I find that one of the ablest speeches made on that occasion was made by the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope). That right hon. Gentleman said—

"It appeared to him that the House of Lords would shortly be the only Assembly in which freedom of discussion would be allowed. In this House they were going to be gagged, and therefore they contended they had a right to enter their protest, in order that the country might judge of the course they had adopted."

It was argued in 1882 by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian that the protest would be, to a certain extent, a reflection upon the Chair. That is the very argument used by the Tory Party now. In 1882 the Tories said it was all nonsense to try to raise the Chair above criticism, and they asked why the Chair should be raised above criticism any more than anybody else. If the New Rule be carried, it is not the Speaker who will be responsible for the application of the clôture, but the Member who proposes it, and the majority who agrees to it. It is now argued in support of this Rule that the action of the Speaker is practically automatic, and therefore that the position of the Speaker cannot be affected by the operation of the Rule. This protest cannot cast any reflection on the Speaker, for it is merely a protest against what may be supposed to be the tyrannical action of the majority of the House.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I think that this Proviso is most skilfully drawn. It provides that this protest shall not be made when Members are smarting under defeat; but that any minority of Members exceeding 10 can deliberately and respectfully enter their protest next day against the action of the House in imposing the clôture. I shall be greatly surprised if we do not have the support of many Tories upon this question, because it is one in which the interests of the House are distinctly at stake. I do not see anything in this proposal opposed to the spirit of the traditions of the House, or opposed to the spirit of the Constitution; but, on the contrary, I think we should be merely acting in accordance with the traditions of the House and the spirit of the Constitution if we allowed a minority to enter their protest in black and white against what they consider an unjust use by the majority of the House of its power. It is well to bear in mind that it is not proposed that this protest shall be made in the moment of excitement, but at the Sitting following the imposition of the clôture. In that fact I think we have the very best protection against the possibility of any rash or precipitate action on the part of the minority. Naturally enough it will be to the interest of the minority that they should, during the 24 hours which will elapse between the application of the clôture and the next Sitting, see that they do not write anything to be recorded in the Journals of the House which may afterwards be used against them as evidence that they had been guilty of an obstructive use of their functions in the House.

Debate adjourned till Friday.

MOTION.

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS ACT (1886)

AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Dugdale, Bill to amend "The Reformatory Schools Act, 1886," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Dugdale, Mr. Whitmore, Mr. Curzon, Mr. Dixon, and Mr. Mark Stewart.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 198.]

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 17th March, 1887.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Pharmacy Acts Amendment (28).

Committee — Report — Incumbents of Benefices Loans Extension Act (1886) Amendment (39).*

Report — Glebe Lands (41-45).

Third Reading — Lunacy Acts Amendment (40); Justices' Jurisdiction (24), and passed.

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL—Third Reading — Local Government (Ireland) (Carriick-on-Suir) (30), and passed.*

PHARMACY ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Earl of Milltown.)

(NO. 28.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that its object, though extremely simple, was one of considerable importance to the general public. It was framed with the object of enabling the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain, which was formed in 1841, and received a Charter in 1843, to make adequate regulations for the education and curriculum to be followed by those who were enrolled among its members. Its purpose was to protect the public against the admission to practice of persons without the necessary training. Hitherto there had been great difficulties in the way of the Society dealing with that matter, the importance of which it was impossible to over-estimate, because the members had the exclusive right of dispensing and selling poisons. By the Pharmacy Act of 1852, it was made penal for any unauthorized person to assume the title of pharmaceutical chemist, and by the Act of 1868 "was made unlawful for any person not qualified to sell or dispense poisons, assume the title of chemist and let. Certain poisons of a particularly dangerous character, the sale of which was placed under special restrictions, were contained in a Schedule to the Act. That Schedule could be added to by the Society, from time to time, with the consent of the Privy Council. The Society consisted of members, associates, and registered apprentices, each of whom had a separate qualification, and passed a separate examination. It was intended that the apprentices should pass a preliminary examination before admission, and after a three years' apprenticeship should pass a qualifying examination; but it had been found that, owing to the development of the extensive system of cramming that now prevailed, the gentlemen who were known as apprentices trusted entirely to passing the qualified examination, and did not devote themselves to acquiring the practical knowledge absolutely essential during apprenticeship, although all operations in pharmacy required to be maturely practised for the safety of the public. By the 6th clause of the Bill of 1868, the Examiners were bound to pass those who answered their questions, which might be answered by those who had no skilful training at all. The Society accordingly framed bye-laws for remedying these defects and establishing a sufficient curriculum of study; but the Privy Council, to whom all bye-laws had to be submitted, felt unable to confirm them, as it considered that the Statutes did not authorize the Society to frame them; and this Bill, which had the unanimous assent of the Council of the Pharmaceutical Society, had been introduced into their Lordships' House to remedy this defect. Subject to a slight amendment in the phraseology of one of the clauses, his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council (Viscount Cranbrook) did not object to the Bill. He might add that the 2nd clause gave this Society power to dispense with the three years' curriculum in the case of those who had obtained technical skill in any part of the United Kingdom or the Colonies, but not with the qualifying examination. In moving the second reading, he might say, in conclusion, that the Bill did not apply to Ireland, as the Irish Pharmacy Act of 1875 did not require similar amendment. The Bill would have the effect of making the practice in the matter uniform throughout the Kingdom.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Milltown.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

LUNACY ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(NO. 40.) THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Halsbury), in moving that the Bill be now read the third time, said, that a question had been raised by the noble and learned Earl (the Earl of Selborne) on the new clause which he (Lord Halsbury) proposed to move to add to the Bill. The new clause provided that when a person had been received as a lunatic in any asylum under an order of a Judge of County Courts, magistrate, or justice, without having been previously seen or examined by him, he should have a right to be taken before a Judge, magistrate, or justice. It was provided by the clause that this jurisdiction should be exercised by "any Judge, magistrate, or justice other than" the one who made the order; and his noble and learned Friend desired that the same magistrate who made the order should have the personal interview with the alleged lunatic. If that were done, it would have the effect of making the magistrate practically hear an appeal from his own order. He could not take the responsibility of advising the House to adopt such an Amendment, and would leave the decision in their Lordships' hands.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3^a accordingly.

On Question, "That the Bill do pass?"

Amendment moved, after Clause 4 add a new clause:—

"(1.) When a person has been received as a lunatic in an asylum hospital or licensed house or as a single patient, under an order of a judge of county courts magistrate or justice, without having been personally seen or examined by such judge magistrate or justice, the person shall (subject as herein-after mentioned) have the right to be taken before or visited by a judge magistrate or justice, other than the judge magistrate or justice under whose order he has been received, except so far as the medical superintendent of the asylum or hospital, or the medical proprietor or attendant of the house, or the medical attendant of the single patient, within twenty-four hours after his reception, in a certificate signed and sent to the Commissioners (in the Form 3a in the First Schedule), shall state that the exercise of such right would be prejudicial to the person so received.

"(2.) Subject to any such certificate, the superintendent or proprietor of the asylum hospital or house, or the person having charge of the single patient, shall, within twenty-four hours after reception, give to the person so received as a lunatic a notice in writing in the Form 3b. in the First Schedule, and shall ascertain whether he desires to exercise such right as aforesaid; and if he, within seven days after his reception, expresses his desire to exercise the right, such superintendent proprietor or person shall procure him to sign a notice in the Form 3c. in the First Schedule, and shall forthwith transmit it by post in a registered letter to the judge magistrate or justice, who shall thereupon arrange, as soon as conveniently may be, either to visit the person giving the notice or to have him brought before him by the superintendent proprietor or person as the judge magistrate or justice may think fit. After any such personal interview the judge magistrate or justice shall send by post to the Commissioners a report thereupon, and the Commissioners shall take such steps as may be necessary to give effect to the report.

"(3.) For the purposes of this section the notice shall be sent to and the jurisdiction exercised by any judge magistrate or justice, other than the judge magistrate or justice who made the order for reception, then present within the petty sessional division or borough where the person received is, who shall be in such notice named by the person desiring the interview, or if no judge magistrate or justice is so named, any justice who shall, under arrangements which shall be for that purpose from time to time made amongst themselves by the justices in such division or borough, undertake such jurisdiction; and the notice shall, in such last-mentioned case, be sent to the justices clerk of such division or borough for transmission to the justice.

"(4.) The judge magistrate or justice shall be entitled, if he desires so to do, before making his report, to see the medical certificates and any other documents upon the consideration of which the order for reception was made.

"(5.) If any superintendent of an asylum or hospital, or any superintendent or proprietor of a licensed house, or any person having charge of a single patient, omits to perform any duty imposed upon him by this section, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, he did not see why the magistrate making the order should necessarily be prejudiced against the patient. He would not very willingly propose an Amendment to the clause, because they were all of one mind as to the general object and scope of the Bill. He had a very strong opinion, however, that the clause as it stood would have an effect which they did not intend it to have, and he would therefore move to amend the first sub-section by leaving out the words "any judge, magistrate, or justice other than." He proposed to insert instead thereof, a provision that the examination of a lunatic should be made by the Judge, magistrate, or justice who made the order for reception—

"If the person so received as a lunatic is still within the county or place in which such Judge, magistrate, or justice has jurisdiction, and in any other case by any Judge, magistrate, or justice."

His object was that the magistrate who had made an order for detention should be the magistrate to personally see and examine the alleged lunatic, for having had all the materials before him, he was better able to form an opinion than any magistrate would be who knew nothing of the case. There was no reason for supposing that the magistrate who made the order would be prejudiced in the matter, whereas to call in another magistrate would be making him sit as a court of appeal from the first.

Amendment moved,

In the new clause to be added after Clause 4. by the Lord Chancellor, subsection (3.), lines 2 and 3, leave out ("any judge, magistrate, or justice, other than"); line 4, after ("reception") insert ("if the person so received as a lunatic is still within the county or place in which such judge, magistrate, or justice has jurisdiction; and in any other case by any judge, magistrate, or justice.")—(The Earl of Selborne.)

On Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause?" Their Lordships divided:—Contents 40; Not-Contents 22: Majority 18.

CONTENTS.

Halsbury, L. (L. Chancellor .)	Milltown, E.
Cranbrook, V. (L. President .)	Northesk, E.
Cadogan, E. (L. Privy Seal .)	Onslow, E.
	Stanhope, E.
	Wharnccliffe, E.
	Yarborough, E.

Mount Edgcumbe, E. (L. Steward .)	Cross, V.
Lathom, E. (L. Chamberlain .)	Sidmouth, V.

Clarendon, E.	Ashbourne, L.
Feverham, E.	Balfour of Burley, L.
Harrowby, E.	Bateman, L.
Ilchester, E.	Brabourne, L.
Jersey, E.	Bramwell, L.
Leven and Melville, E.	Brodrick, L. (V. Middleton .)

The Earl of Selborne

Chelmsford, L.	Kintore, L. (E. Kintore .)
Colchester, L.	[Teller .]
Colville of Culross, L.	Norton, L.
Ellenborough, L.	Poltimore, L.
Elphinstone, L.	Salterford, L. (E. Courtown .)
Fermanagh, L. (E. Erne .)	Shute, L. (V. Barrington .)
Foxford, L. (E. Lime-riek .)	Stanley of Alderley, L.
Kenry, L. (E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl .)	Wigan, L. (E. Crawford and Balcarres .)

NOT-CONTENTS.

Bedford, D.	Foley, L.
Ripon, M.	Grimthorpe, L.
	Herschell, L.
	Kensington, L.
Camperdown, E.	Lingen, L.
Ducie, E.	Lytleton, L.
Granville, E.	Romilly, L.
Innes, E. (D. Roxburgh .)	Stratheden and Campbell, L.
Kimberley, E.	Sudley, L. (E. Arran .)
Selborne, E. [Teller .]	Thring, L. [Teller .]
Suffolk and Berkshire, E.	Thurlow, L.
	Tweeddale, L. (M. Tweeddale .)
Elgin, L. (E. Elgin and Kincairdine .)

Amendment disagreed to.

LORD HERSCHELL said, he thought it objectionable and very prejudicial to the lunatic himself, that he should be enabled to name the particular Judge or magistrate before whom he should be taken, as it would give rise occasionally to considerable inconvenience. He, therefore, proposed to amend the clause so as to dispense with the necessity of the lunatic naming the particular magistrate who should visit him, and enabling the justices of the borough or county to choose, from time to time, the magistrate or justice who should investigate the case of the alleged lunatic.

LORD HALSBURY, said he had no objection to the proposed Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Further Amendments made.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

GLEBE LANDS BILL.—(No. 41.)

(The Viscount Cross.)

REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

Clause 3 (Sale of glebe by or with approval of Lord Chancellor).

LORD NORTON moved, as an Amendment, to insert, in line 21, before "benefit" the words "permanent and prospective," and, in the same line, after "benefice" to insert "and without unfair prejudice to adjoining property." He remarked that, in Committee, it was moved that no glebe should be sold without the Bishop's and patron's consent. The object of the Bill seemed to be to prevent the Bishops in the Ecclesiastical Commission vetoing all sales of Church real property. Such an inclination seemed to be erroneous, as late legislation had made real property no securer than Consols; and to prevent all sales of glebe would be a senseless loss, especially of minerals, which the clergy could not work at all, or interlying pieces of land they could not improve. On the other hand, the Land Commissioners might feel themselves unauthorized to refuse a poor incumbent's pressing application for premature sale for immediate benefit to the prospective detriment of the living. The noble Viscount in charge of the Bill had suggested in the debate the words "permanent benefit." He proposed to take the noble Viscount's words and to add "prospective," so that the Land Commission might feel it their duty to take probable improvement of value into their consideration in consenting to a sale. The other insertion would meet such a case as lately occurred, where glebe lying in the middle of the patron's park, the incumbent wanted to sell for villa building, the site being very attractive to a neighbouring manufacturing town. The patron, like most landlords, was too poor to outbid the market; but, fortunately, an exchange of land removed the difficulty. But it ought to be within the Land Commission's power, as the Act of Vict. 1 put it in that of the Ecclesiastical Commission, to save adjoining property from such injury by exchanges or other arrangements. Unfair advantage should not be taken of the patron's bequest to the Church.

Amendment moved,

In page 1, line 21, after the second ("the") insert ("permanent and prospective"); and after ("benefice") insert ("and without unfair prejudice to adjoining property").—(The Lord Norton.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross) said, he would agree to the insertion of the word "permanent," as he had no objection to making it clear that the sale was to be for the benefit of the benefice, and not for the immediate advantage of the incumbent. He could not, however, seeing that it might be looked upon as an Instruction to the Land Commissioners to look to prospective improvements by building or otherwise, assent to the insertion of the word "prospective," which, it seemed to him, would open up too remote contingencies, and, if the noble Lord would exclude it, he would not oppose the Amendment.

LORD NORTON said, he feared he was unable to do otherwise than accept the suggested limitation of this Amendment.

Amendment amended, and, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, line 8, at the end of sub-section (2.) insert ("and if such objection be not removed the matter shall be referred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, whose decision shall be final").—(The Earl of Feversham.)

VISCOUNT CROSS said, that during the progress of the Bill in Committee, it was understood that the Land Commissioners were to be the arbitrators, and if the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were substituted, the title of the Bill might as well be altered, for instead of being one to facilitate the sale of glebe, it would rather be one to impede the sale. He regretted to oppose anything proposed by the noble Earl, but he could not accept the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of The Viscount Cross, Amendment made, in page 2, line 7, by leaving out ("and patron"), and inserting ("or patron, as the case may be").

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Application and investment of purchase money).

On the Motion of The Viscount Cross, the following Amendment made:—At end of clause insert—

"Any land purchased with money arising from a sale under this Act of the glebe land of any benefice shall be conveyed to the incumbent of that benefice, and shall be held by the incumbent for the time being as part of the glebe of the benefice, and the income arising from the land shall be paid or applied as the income of the land sold would have been payable or applicable if the sale had not taken place."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Restriction as to sales).

On the Motion of The Viscount Cross, the following Amendment made:—In page 4, line 16, after ("Act"), insert—

("but until such sum is fully recouped, nothing in this section shall discharge the incumbent from his liability to make good the said dilapidations.")

On the Motion of The Viscount Cross, the following Amendment made:—Leave out Clause 7, and insert the following clause:—

(Provision where land is subject to mortgage or other debt.)

"(1.) Where any glebe land sold under this Act, or the benefice to which it belongs, is subject to any mortgage or other debt, the land shall be sold free from such mortgage or debt, but such mortgage or debt, if not discharged, shall attach to the purchase money of the land and to any securities or land in or in connexion with which such purchase money is invested, and the mortgagee or creditor shall have the like remedies as nearly as may be in relation to such purchase money, securities, and land as he would have had if the land had not been sold.

"(2.) The prescribed notice of the proposal to sell any such glebe land shall be given to the mortgagee or creditor, and the mortgagee or creditor may, within the prescribed time after such notice, object to the sale on the ground that his security will be damaged by the sale, and before the Land Commissioners approve the sale or sell, they shall be satisfied that either such an objection to the sale has not been made by the mortgagee or creditor, or if an objection has been made that the mortgagee or creditor will not be damaged by the sale, and the Land Commissioners may, if it seems to them necessary, make provision either for securing the rights of the mortgagee or creditor, or for the discharge of the mortgage or other debt, so that nothing is done which will prejudice the future interest of the benefice.

"(3.) The Land Commissioners may require the mortgagee or creditor to accept payment of the principal and interest due, together with such additional sum (if any) as seems necessary in order to dispense with any notice which would otherwise be required for such payment."

VISCOUNT CROSS said, it had been represented to him that there were owners of glebes who would wish to sell portions of them for the purpose of discharging debt incurred by assigning part of the income to new benefices in the original parish. The Rector of Wigan was in this position, having endowed new livings with part of his glebe. To meet such cases he would propose the insertion of a new clause.

Moved, after Clause 7, insert the following clause:—

(Provision as to annual charges on benefice.)

"Where any glebe land sold under this Act, or the benefice to which it belongs, or any part of the endowment of such benefice, is subject to a permanent annual charge in favour of the incumbent of any other benefice, the land shall be sold free from such annual charge, but the annual charge shall attach to the purchase money, and to any securities or land in or in connexion with which such purchase money is invested, and the authority holding the securities in which such purchase money is invested, may, if they think fit, set apart an adequate portion of such securities for the purpose of meeting such charge, or any part thereof, and shall thereupon discharge the said benefice and the endowment thereof from the liability to the annual charge or the said part thereof, and the securities so set apart shall be placed to a separate account or otherwise set apart in such manner as the said authority may direct."—(The Viscount Cross.)

Clause agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^d on Tuesday next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 45.)

IRELAND (CITY OF LIMERICK)—
THE ASYLUM RATE.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, in moving for the Correspondence respecting the Limerick County Asylum rate, said, he should like to know what had recently transpired. He should be satisfied if he were informed the rate was levied, or about to be.

Moved for—

"Correspondence between the Irish Government and the Mayor of Limerick with reference to the rate ordered to be levied upon the City of Limerick for the maintenance of lunatics in the city and county asylum."—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE) said, there would be no objection to give the Correspondence; and he might say that, when the noble Earl read it, he would find the attitude of the Government towards the Corporation of Limerick very clearly defined. The Government had required that the money should be paid, and the Corporation had admitted their liability.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he should like to know whether the Mayor of Limerick had announced the intention of the Corporation to levy a rate?

LORD ASHBOURNE said, he did not know the exact form; but the liability had been acknowledged by the Corporation.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I am afraid that is a rather different matter.

Motion agreed to; Correspondence ordered to be laid before the House.

LORD ASHBOURNE AND HOME RULE.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE): My Lords, I should like to take this opportunity of saying one sentence in reference to a personal matter. My attention has been called, within the last hour before the meeting of the House, to a paragraph in The Daily News this morning, which, under the heading of "Lord Ashbourne and Home Rule," states as follows:—

"The story goes that in a copy of Thom's Directory for 1886, which has come in due course out of his Lordship's residence, there has been discovered a memorandum of an Irish Home Parliament at least as extensive as Mr. Gladstone's, in the characteristic handwriting of his Lordship; but whether it is tentative or final, whether it correctly expresses Lord Ashbourne's sentiments, or whether it was written to order, there are no means of testing. After some curious adventures, the document, it is said, was purchased at a considerable price by a gentleman of the same politics and profession as his Lordship, and lithographed copies have passed into extensive, though private, circulation."

My Lords, the first intimation I ever received of this romantic episode in my life was when I read that paragraph. There is not even the vestige of the shadow of a foundation for the story; and I have only to say that I shall be very much obliged to "the gentleman of the same politics and profession as myself" if he will only give me a private view of one of the "lithographed copies."

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 17th March, 1887.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—National Provident Insurance, Mr. Hoyle and Captain Fellowes added.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—NAVY ESTIMATES, NUMBERS, Vols 1; SUPPLEMENTARY (NAVY SERVICES, 1886-7).

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution in Committee—Ordered—First Reading—Sale of Man (Customs)* [199].

Second Reading—Merchandise Marks Law Consolidation and Amendment* [194], referred to the Select Committee on the Merchandise Marks Act (1862) Amendment.

Committee—Merchant Shipping Act (1854) Amendment (No. 2)* [184]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Acts Amendment [168].

Third Reading—County Courts (Expenses)* [177], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

ADMIRALTY—DOCK ACCOMMODATION AT BOMBAY FOR HER MAJESTY'S NAVY.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Lords Commissioners are willing to co-operate with the Indian Government, in providing suitable dock accommodation at Bombay for large ships of Her Majesty's Navy, by payment of a moiety of the cost of enlarging existing docks in the Government Dockyard at that port; whether different Admirals in command of the Indian Station have repeatedly urged the necessity of providing such docking facilities as aforesaid, especially in view of requirements in time of war; whether estimates have been submitted showing that the cost of such dock extension would not exceed £100,000, or thereabouts; and, whether, in January 1882, the Euryalus, late flagship on Indian Station, was compelled to be sent to Malta (distant 4,000 miles) to be docked for repairs, through the want of the necessary accommodation at Bombay? The hon. and gallant Gentleman also asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Government of India are prepared to co-operate with the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty in providing the necessary dock accommodation at Bombay for large ships of Her Majesty's Navy, in accordance with the repeated recommendations of different Admirals in command of the Indian Station, to meet the urgent requirements of the Navy, especially in time of war; and, whether he is aware that the flagship on Indian Station, in January 1882, was obliged to proceed to Malta to be docked for repairs, for want of the necessary accommodation at Bombay, whereby the said Station was deprived of the most efficient ship belonging thereto for a period of several months?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord George Hamilton) (Middlesex, Ealing): The Admirals in command of the East India Station have reported the insufficiency of the existing docking facilities at Bombay. A dock extension, costing £83,000, was formerly suggested; but it was found that this extension would not make sufficient provision for docking first-class ships. It was, therefore, thought preferable to build a new dock altogether; and I understand that the Indian Government are taking steps to provide the accommodation. It is the case that the Euryalus had to proceed to Malta from Bombay to be docked.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir John Gorst) (Chatham): The Government of India are now engaged in providing the necessary dock accommodation at Bombay for the largest type of ships in Her Majesty's Navy.

EGYPT—THE ARMY OF OCCUPATION— DECORATIONS FOR THE TROOPS AT ASSOUAN.

MR. SHIRLEY (Yorkshire, W.R., Doncaster) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant any decoration or batta money to the troops who were quartered at Assouan during the hot season of 1886, on account of the appalling mortality and sickness which was rife there, in accordance with the precedent of 1885, when the Egyptian medal was granted on account of the excessive heat?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. Brodrick) (Surrey, Guildford) (who replied) said: The medal granted in 1885 was for the campaign in Egypt, towards which the troops at Assouan were directly contributory. Excessive heat of the climate does not in itself constitute a claim to a medal or decoration. It would not be convenient that the pay of a soldier should be dependent on the climate in which he may be serving; but all troops in Egypt have advantages in rations which they would not have at home. The value to the individual soldier is about 4½d. a-day.

Admiral Field

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART— THE NATIONAL GALLERY—THE NEW ROOMS.

MR. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead) asked the First Commissioner of Works, How soon the new rooms of the National Gallery will be in readiness for the admission of the public?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. Plunket) (Dublin University): The new rooms and staircase will be completed, so far as this Department is concerned, by the end of May. There will, however, be some further time required to complete the hanging of the pictures, so that I do not think it likely that the rooms will be in readiness for the admission of the public before the end of June or the beginning of July.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA (Monaghan, S.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If he is aware that much dissatisfaction exists when the town in which land cases are to be heard is selected to meet the convenience of the landlord, to the cost and inconvenience of the tenants; and, whether Dundalk has been lately selected as the place of hearing for 43 cases arising in the Castleblayney Union, when Castleblayney itself, and other towns, would be much more convenient and easy of access for the tenants?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Holmes) (Dublin University), in reply, said, in selecting the place of hearing of land cases the convenience of the landlords was not consulted more than that of the tenants. With regard to the latter part of the Question, a number of cases were heard at Dundalk, and no complaint whatever was made as to that place being selected.

FISHERIES (IRELAND)—BOARDS OF FISHERY CONSERVATORS.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether ex officio members of the Board of Fishery Conservators must be magistrates, and, in addition, hold land abutting a river or lake in the district, and pay licence duty for the current year; whether certain magistrates attended meetings of the Board of Conservators of the Limerick

District on the 5th of August, 1886, 6th of January, 20th of January, and 4th of February, 1887, and took part in the proceedings without possessing the requisite qualifications; whether the Lime-rick Board met on the 5th of August, 1886, and proceeded to elect one of their number to the position of Inspector of Water Bailiffs, contrary to Act of Parliament; if the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries have remonstrated with the Lime-rick Board respecting this election, and declared the appointment, in their opinion, illegal; whether the Board still retains this member of their body in the position of Inspector as aforesaid, and have refused to hold a new election; and, whether the Irish Executive will inquire into these allegations; and, if proved to be true, will take the necessary steps to set matters right?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am advised that the law is as stated in the first paragraph. With regard to the alleged matters of fact about the election of Inspector of Water Bailiffs, the circumstances are understood to be as stated, though the hon. Member has not given any sufficient opportunity for inquiry on those points not already within the knowledge of the Inspector of Fisheries. The matter does not appear to be in a satisfactory state; and I understand that some questions connected with it are at present before the Law Officers, with the object of ascertaining whether, in the present state of the law, any action can be taken by the Executive.

ROYAL COURTS OF JUSTICE—DELAY OF CAUSES—INSUFFICIENCY OF COURTS.

Mr. BAGGALLAY (Lambeth, Brixton) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, looking at the facts that during the present and recent sittings of the High Court of Justice, the hearing of actions, particularly jury actions, has been delayed in consequence of the insufficient number of Courts at the Royal Courts of Justice, and that three Judges are sometimes unnecessarily sitting together in banc, because there is no Court for the third Judge to sit in—he will consider the desirability of providing further accommodation for the Judges to hold their Courts?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): The facts referred to have not been brought to my notice. The question of further accommodation at the Royal Courts of Justice seems to be for the consideration, in the first instance, of the Lord Chancellor, rather than of the Office of Works. Of course, any suggestion coming from the Lord Chancellor would be immediately and carefully considered.

RUSSIA—IMPRISONMENT OF J. W. ROBINSON, A BRITISH SUBJECT.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to the statement made by the Odessa Correspondent of The Daily News, regarding the case of John William Robinson, a British subject, stated to be undergoing the eleventh month of an imprisonment at Kieff, in connection with some passport offence; whether Robinson's offence was the non-possession of a passport, or the possession of a false passport; and, whether representations have been made to the Russian Government on the subject?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Consul-General at Odessa reports that Robinson is stated by the Russian authorities at Kieff to have been condemned on the 4th of December last to four months' imprisonment for having resided in Russia under a false name with an Austrian passport. Robinson states that he was in prison about six months before being tried. Her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg is inquiring into the case; but his report has not yet been received.

AUSTRALIAN COLONIES—APPLICATION FOR GOVERNMENT LOANS—GREENWICH HOSPITAL FUNDS.

SIR SAMUEL WILSON (Portsmouth) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he is aware that the Government loans in the leading Australian Colonies have been expended in railways and other reproductive works, which remain Government property, and which make a return of about 4 per cent in some cases, on the whole amount of the debt of those Colonies, and that the railways alone would sell for more than the whole debt, making such loans a perfectly safe investment; whether he has this into consideration?

of Greenwich Hospital Funds; and, whether he will endeavour to continue the payment of age pensions, without the conditions as to the ability to earn a portion of their sustenance, to seamen who have served their full time?

MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT (A LORD of the ADMIRALTY) (Sheffield, Ecclesall) (who replied) said: I do not contest the accuracy of the facts mentioned in the first part of the Question of my hon. Friend; but, as already stated, arrangements have been made, or are in progress, for re-investing at home, on favourable terms, a large portion of the Three per Cent. Stock hitherto held on account of Greenwich Hospital, and it is anticipated that there will be no difficulty in similarly re-investing as much of the remainder of the Stock as may be considered advisable. In the Charter of Foundation it is stated that the benefits of Greenwich Hospital are intended for seamen who, by age, wounds, or other disabilities, shall be incapable of further service at sea, and be unable to maintain themselves. It seems proper, therefore, to take into account, when distributing the funds, the physical condition of the men as well as their age.

MAGISTRACY (ENGLAND AND WALES)
—THE WINCHESTER BENCH—"A JOB LOT."

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to an article in The Daily News of the 14th March, entitled "A Job Lot," and having reference to the Magisterial Bench at Winchester; whether it is true, as stated in the article referred to, that there are at present 17 magistrates in Winchester and only 19 policemen; is it usual in English cities for judicial officials to be nearly equal in numbers to administrative officials; is it true, as stated in the article referred to, that the Lord Chancellor has sent down a list to the Town Council of Winchester of five other gentlemen, whom he intends to raise to the dignity of the Bench—so that in Winchester there will be 23 magistrates and only 19 policemen; and, whether the Town Council of Winchester have struck out four of the five names sent down by the Lord Chancellor, and have substituted others for his consideration?

Sir Samuel Wilson

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I have seen the article in question. The number of magistrates and police is accurately stated. I am informed that the late Lord Chancellor added four names to the list of Justices in 1881, making the total at that time 22. Since that date there have been five vacancies through death; and it is to fill these vacancies, and not to add to the total number of magistrates, that five gentlemen have been recently nominated by the Lord Chancellor. The Town Council have submitted to the Lord Chancellor the names of certain gentlemen from among whom they suggest that he should select four magistrates in lieu of four whom he had nominated, but for whose rejection they assign no reason. The Town Council have thereby gone beyond their proper function.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether all the magistrates recommended by the Lord Chancellor are Tories?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; they are not.

MR. CLANCY: May I ask how many are?

[No reply.]

POST OFFICE—DELIVERY OF THE IRISH MAILS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) (for Mr. FLYNN) (Cork, N.) asked the Postmaster General, If the Post Office Authorities can make such arrangements as will insure an earlier delivery of the Irish Mails in the House of Commons to Members representing Irish constituencies than that which at present obtain; and, if they can arrange such an alteration as will permit of Irish Members posting letters for the Irish night mail by special mail-bag, or otherwise, at a later hour than is at present necessary?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIBES) (Cambridge University): Before the Question of the hon. Member was placed upon the Notice Paper, arrangements had been made for accelerating the delivery in the House of the day mail letters from Ireland, and such letters can now be obtained at 7 p.m., or one hour earlier than before. As regards posting for the Irish night mail, letters can at present be posted up to 7.15 p.m. without late fee, and up to 7.30 p.m. with a fee of a halfpenny. It is proposed to extend the hour for posting letters with a late fee up to 8 p.m.; and this will apply not only to letters for Ireland, but also to letters for places in England, North Wales, and Scotland, served by the night mail train from Euston at 8.30 p.m.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND)—
TRANSFER OF UNCLAIMED DIVI-DENDS.

MR. P. McDONALD (Sligo, N.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Under what Statute, or by what authority, £35,000 of the Unclaimed Dividends of the Irish Court of Bankruptcy were transferred to the Commissioners of the National Debt; whether the transfer of the money of the unpaid creditors is contrary to, and in violation of, the sections 294, 295, 296, and 297 of "The Bankruptcy (Ireland) Act, 1857;" and whether it is a fact that, owing to the conduct of the Bankruptcy Court officials, dividend warrants are frequently returned by the Post Office, in consequence of wrong direction or address, and large sums are thereby allowed to accumulate, creditors not being permitted to examine the list for themselves?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The transfer referred to was made pursuant to the provisions of the 85th section of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Act, 1877. Dividend warrants are often returned by the Post Office, in consequence of persons to whom they are addressed not being found; but I am not aware that this arises from the misconduct of the Bankruptcy Court officials, who are themselves often unable to discover the proper addresses. Creditors can see for themselves what are the unclaimed dividends in any particular estate; but a general examination of all the lists is not allowed.

EGYPT—ARMY OF OCCUPATION—MAJOR MACDONALD.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is true that Major Macdonald is acting as military attaché to Sir Evelyn Baring, in Cairo; whether in consequence of their being an English Army of Occupation in Egypt, the Egyptian Army being offered by English officers, Major Macdonald's extraordinary services to Sir Evelyn Baring will be dispensed with; and, whether the extra pay drawn by Major Macdonald is defrayed by the Egyptian or English Government?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): Major Macdonald is attached to the British Agency in Egypt as a military attaché. His functions are on behalf of the British Government, who pay him, in connection with the presence of British troops in Egypt.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—IRRE-GULAR CONVICTION AT NEW ROSS POLICE STATION.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Wexford, N.) (for Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether John Malone and Richard Magee, inmates of the New Ross Workhouse, arrested and lodged in New Ross Police Station on the night of the 21st ultimo, on a charge of insubordination, were, on the following day, brought before a magistrate in a room of the said police station, and sentenced on conviction to three months' imprisonment; whether this private mode of trial was in accordance with the law; whether Mr. Hurson, the solicitor retained for the defence, was absent from the proceeding in the police station, not having received notice of it; and, what action will be taken upon the case?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University), in reply, said, the men named were arrested in New Ross Workhouse, and brought before the presiding magistrates, charged with insubordination. Bail could not be obtained, and on the arrival of another magistrate the case was heard in the police office, and the case being proved by three witnesses, they were sentenced to three months' imprisonment. The proceedings were taken under Geo. IV., c. 83. The Government did not intend to take any action in the matter.

MR. J. E. REDMOND: I would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman, whether it is a fact that no legal opportunity for legal defence was given to these men? My information is they had got a solicitor, and he never received any notice of the trial.

MR. HOLMES: The men made no application whatever, or any statement whatever, that they had engaged a solicitor.

MR. J. E. REDMOND: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that the statement is made by a solicitor who is a supporter of the right hon. and learned Gentleman?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I should like to ask, whether an opportunity was given to the prisoners to obtain bail before they were convicted?

MR. HOLMES: Sir, I have already answered the Question on the Paper.

RIVER THAMES POLLUTION — BYE-LAWS OF THE THAMES CONSERVATORS.

COLONEL DAWNAY (York, N.R., Thirsk) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention had been called to the proposed new bye-laws of the Thames Conservators, by which

"no direct action will be taken to put a stop to the insanitary nuisances caused by house-boats and steam launches;"

and that,

"although a bye-law provides against casting any sewage, rubbish, or other offensive matter into the River, this will not be taken to apply the shocking condition of things seen at places where the River is shamefully polluted by the sewage from house-boats;"

whether he is aware that any objection or representation against the proposed new bye-laws must be made on or before the 28th instant; and, whether, in the interests of the millions of people who depend upon the Upper Thames for their water supply, he will compel the Thames Conservators to take immediate and efficient steps to free the River from its present and ever-increasing state of pollution?

THE PRESIDENT (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): My attention has been called to the proposed new bye-law of the Thames Conservators. I have been in communication with the Conservators on the subject. I am informed that the hon. Member is incorrect in assuming what is stated in the first part of the Question. The Conservators state that the bye-law is intentionally drawn as wide as possible, to cover every possible mode of pollution of the river; and that it was so prepared with the object of carrying into effect Section 4 of the Thames Preservation Act, 1885, which enacts that it shall be the duty of the Conservators to make special Regulations for preventing the pollution of the river by the sewage of any house-boat or steam launch. The Conservators believe that when the bye-law comes into operation, it will have the effect of preventing the nuisance which now arises from vessels moored in or navigating the river. If the hon. Member would wish to make any specific suggestion as to any additions to the proposed bye-law, and will communicate it to me, I shall be happy to forward his communication to the Conservators.

COLONEL DAWNAY gave Notice that in consequence of the answer of the President of the Local Government Board he would call the attention of the House to the subject, and move to disallow the proposed bye-laws of the Thames Conservancy Board, in consequence of their neglecting to deal with the nuisance caused by house-boats and steam launches.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) asked, Whether the legal advisers of the Local Government Board were satisfied that the bye-laws would prohibit house-boats from discharging sewage into the Thames?

MR. RITCHIE said, that he had not considered it necessary to consult the legal advisers of the Board on the subject; but, so far as he had been able to ascertain the opinion of the officials, he thought that the bye-laws would have that effect.

INDIA—DISCONTENT IN MADRAS.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he has any information to show that discontent has, within the past five years, been exhibited in Madras; and, if he will call for a Return showing the number of tenants evicted or otherwise proceeded against, by the Government of Sir M. E. Grant Duff?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham): There has been no information of any special discontent in Madras. There is no eviction of Government tenants in Madras; but both land and personal property is liable to sale to realize arrears of land revenue. The average annual number of landowners whose property is thus sold is 116,000 out of 4,500,000. No further Return appears to the Secretary of State to be necessary.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF POOR LAW GUARDIANS TO THE MALLOW UNION.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) (for Mr. J. O'Connor) (Tipperary, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there are sufficient police in the Killavullen Police District to distribute the voting papers for the election of Poor Law Guardians to the Mallow Union; whether the Mouaniny Division was the only one so attended to at the last election, when the police did not allow sufficient time for the delivery of the post containing the votes of distant electors, and otherwise displayed negligence in the collection of votes by passing the houses of voters if their doors happened to be closed at the time of their calling; and, whether he will give instructions to the police to extend the time of collection until 10 p.m., as is done in other districts, and to exercise greater diligence in the collection of the voting papers from the residents in the locality?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Local Authorities of the Mallow Union have made their own arrangements for the distribution of the voting papers, and they have not reported to the Local Government Board what agents they are employing. I am not aware that any question as to the sufficiency of police has been raised. I am informed that, at the election last year, they were employed only in the Electoral Division named in the Question, and that they discharged the duty satisfactorily, so far as is known to the Local Government Board. One individual complaint with regard to the collection of a voting paper was made, but, on consideration, was not found to affect the vote. I see no reason arising out of these circumstances to give any special instructions to the police.

DR. TANNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer that part of the Question which says the police did not allow time for posting the papers?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We have no ground for believing that the state of things ever occurred.

CONVENTION OF PARIS, 1815—ENGLISH INDEBTEDNESS TO FRANCE.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that a sum of no less than one milliard of francs, or forty millions sterling, is due to France by the English Government under Clause 9 of the private Convention, dated the 20th of November, 1815; if it is a fact that, by the Conventions signed in May, 1814, November, 1815, and April, 1818, a guaranteed fund of 6,500,000 francs of French Rentes, with a capital of 130,000,000 francs, was transferred to the British Government; whether M. Blandin, a Deputy, lately proposed to the Chamber that a Committee should be appointed for the purpose of asking the British Foreign Office for an account of these funds, and also for a return of the surplus, with the interest accruing thereon, to the French Treasury; whether the surplus, with the interest, is estimated to amount to one milliard of francs; and, whether a Committee has been appointed by the Chamber with M. Blandin as reporter?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): It is not true that the sum mentioned in the hon. Member's Question, or any other sum, is due to France by the British Government under the Convention of November 20, 1815. A statement of the matter was made to the House of Commons by the Secretary to the Treasury on the 8th of June, 1869; and a Return of the disposition of the funds received from the French Government is shown in a Paper (No. 239) presented to Parliament in 1872. There is no new feature to be considered. A report of a proposal made in the French Chamber of Deputies has been made in the French newspapers similar to that mentioned by the hon. Member; but Her Majesty's Government are not aware that a Committee has been appointed by the Chamber to inquire into the subject. The statement in question is, no doubt, connected with the legend of the Baron de Bode, which haunted this House for a long period; but which, after being investigated by a Select Committee, was laid to rest.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE, 1887—"SPECIFIC SUBJECTS."

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he can state what "specific subjects" have been sanctioned by the Education Department other than those mentioned in Article 15 of the Education Code?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The Returns for the last three years show that bookkeeping, theology, German, hygiene, navigation, physiography, social economy, and Welsh have been included in the subjects specially sanctioned by the Education Department.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda) asked, whether instructions in Welsh would be definitely entered in the Code?

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE said, he thought that he had just shown that this was practically included.

MR. W. ABRAHAM: All that we ask is that it should be included in the Code.

ADMIRALTY—WILLIAM ROPER, AN ARTIZAN OF DEVONPORT DOCK-YARD.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) (for Mr. CONYBEARE) (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is the fact that Mr. William Roper, who lately lost his life while working in the Government Dockyard at Devonport, was a skilled artizan whose character stood very high in the estimation of the Dockyard authorities; whether it is the fact that he lost his life under the following circumstances—namely, that after serving under the Government for some 30 years he was disentitled to any pension, because, through the difference of a few days in his age, he had never been put on the establishment; that at the age of 60 he might have retired and received a gratuity of about £60 which was then due to him; that he had the option of remaining on, if he passed the doctor, till he was 65; that he did so stay on, and left his gratuity of £60 to be taken up when he should have completed his extra five years; but that he met with his death a few weeks after while working overtime in December last; whether the authorities have refused to pay over to the widow the gratuity to which her husband was entitled before his death, and why; and, whether he will, taking into account the deceased's long service and high character, and the fact that his widow is left with a family of six children, consider whether the above decision of the authorities should not be reversed?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): It is true that William Roper was injured in the Devonport Yard when at his work; but his death was not attributed to such injury. He was 60 years of age, and was allowed to remain for his own benefit, and was entitled to a gratuity only as a hired man on completion of his service. Such gratuity has hitherto only been paid to the man himself upon his discharge from the Service. Compensation is only given to the widows of civil employes when their husbands' death is directly attributable to the service in which they are engaged. My hon. Friend the Member for Devonport has already spoken to me concerning this man's case; and we are in correspondence with the Treasury on the subject.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)—DECREES FOR RENT, CO. DONEGAL—WRONGFUL ACTION OF A BAILIFF.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Sheriff of the County Donegal issued any warrant, special or otherwise, on foot of decrees for rent at suit of Mr. A. J. R. Stewart, of Ards, against John M'Cue, Manus M'Fadden, Mrs. — M'Cue, and James Magee, or any of them, during 1886, and especially to James Wason, the bailiff of the Stewart Estate, at Dunfanaghy, in said county; whether Wason collected the said decrees, with costs and Sheriff's fees, as if he had returned warrants in the said year of 1886; whether, in the end of 1885, he exacted, from widow Ellen M'Fadden, Ma. Grant mana, £3 11s., pretending that there a decree at suit of Samuel O'ARY of Letterkenny; whether he compelled to refund this latter sum of any no decree at all then in his hands. There whether there is any difference between bailiffs and tenants in the manner of realizing and those not; and the mode of realizing are as alleged, what action the Government propose to take in the matter?

Sir James Ferguson

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: The hon. Gentleman is, of course, aware that the only action that the Executive could take in reference to James Wason would be to prosecute him for a criminal offence, in case there was evidence to show that such an offence has been committed by him. I have caused inquiries to be made on this subject; and as the matter may come before a legal tribunal it is not expedient for me to make any further statement.

WAR OFFICE—COMPULSORY RETIREMENT OF LIEUTENANT COLONELS—THE ROYAL WARRANT, 1887.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) asked the Secretary of State for War, What number of Lieutenant Colonels under 60 years of age will be compulsorily retired in July next, and what will be the annual amount of the half-pay of the officers so retired; and, whether he will lay upon the Table a Statement showing the financial effect of the recent Royal Warrant as to compulsory retirement?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): From the present time to the end of July there will be no compulsory retirement of Lieutenant Colonels, although a certain number will vacate their regimental appointments on completing the term for which their appointments were made. While unemployed, these officers will be on half-pay at 11s. per day. A calculation was made last summer on the probable financial effect of the then intended Royal Warrant; but several important changes were made later in the conditions. The calculation does not, therefore, now hold, and a new one, showing the effect of the Warrant as promulgated, is now being made. When completed, I will consider whether I can lay on the Table a statement of the financial effect of the Royal Warrant.

FOR LAW—DEATH OF ELIZA RYAN IN ST. PANCRAS WORKHOUSE.

DR. T. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he has seen, in morning's Daily News, a report of an inquest held on the body of Eliza Ryan, aged 62, in the St. Pancras Workhouse; whether he will inquire if it is true, as stated in the report, that the woman was placed in solitary confinement for 12 hours on bread and water,

"In a cell at the workhouse some nine or ten feet beneath the basement of the main building," while suffering from inflammation of the lungs following on chronic bronchitis; whether he will inquire into the statement of the master that he ordered the confinement "as a punishment, in the exercise of his lawful authority," for offensive language to the matron; under what statute have masters of workhouses a power of summary jurisdiction in such cases; and, what steps will be taken in the matter if it is found death was hastened by the punishment?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have made inquiry respecting this case. I am informed that it is not the fact that the woman was placed in solitary confinement as stated in the Question. The room in which she was placed was on the basement of the main building. Although the woman had occasionally been under medical treatment for chronic bronchitis during the past five years, she had not, prior to her last illness, been under any treatment during the past three months, and she was not placed in the punishment room until after she had been seen by the assistant medical officer. On the day following she was apparently in her ordinary state of health, and was at work in the needle-room. On the second day she left the workhouse to attend the funeral of her mother, and on her return she told one of the inmates that she had caught a chill while in the cemetery. She died six days afterwards; and both the medical officer and the assistant medical officer concur in the view that the commencement of the illness from which she died was the shivering and chill taken at the cemetery. At the inquest the verdict was that the death was due to natural causes, and 11 of the 12 jurymen desired to add to their verdict that no blame attached to the workhouse officers. The woman, I am informed, was punished for being very drunk, violent in her conduct, and for using abusive and insolent language, and persisting in doing so. The punishment was duly reported by the master in the punishment book, and was approved by the Workhouse Visiting Committee. The Rules as to the punishment of refractory paupers are contained in the Regulations of the Local Government Board as to the management of the workhouse.

NAVY—PROMOTION OF CHIEF GUNNERS AND OTHER NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) (for Mr. LABOUCHÈRE) (Northampton) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether Article 272 of the Queen's Regulations states—

"Of the total number of Chief Gunners and Chief Boatswains, including Officers holding either rank by virtue of their appointments, one-half shall be composed of Chief Gunners;"

whether The Navy List has, for a considerable time past, contained the names of 18 Chief Boatswains, and of 17 Chief Gunners; whether there were 18 Chief Gunners on the Active List before the retirement of Mr. Bechervaise; whether that officer, although retired, is at present doing duty at the Admiralty; and, whether he still draws full pay, and therefore keeps the number of Chief Gunners on the Active List at 17?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): Promotion to the rank of Chief Gunner is not regulated by seniority alone; but is, as in the case of Chief Boatswains and Chief Carpenters, by selection of the most deserving officers. The selection of these officers is a matter of very careful consideration, and the claims of the various officers with regard to age, seniority, and service at sea are carefully compared. The promotions made are the result of these comparisons, and not, as the hon. Member appears to infer, in consequence of favouritism on the part of any individual member of the Board. There is no intention of altering the present practice of promotion in these ranks. There are on the list at the present time 34 Chief Gunners and Chief Boatswains; of these, 17 are Chief Gunners. In the present month's Navy List there appears 18 Chief Boatswains, there happening to be that number for a few days pending the pensioning of one of these officers. There were not 18 gunners on the Active List before Mr. Bechervaise's removal. Sir Anthony Hoskins had personal cognizance of Mr. Lee's good service. Mr. Bechervaise is doing duty at the Admiralty; but his vacancy was duly filled up, and his retention in his present post in no way affects, nor has affected, the number of Chief Gunners.

UNLICENSED HALLS, &c.—"PUBLIC" BUILDINGS.

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, taking into consideration that there is no power or authority to deal with buildings not licensed but used for public performances, he will advise Her Majesty's Government to bring in a Public Bill constituting an authority who shall have the same powers over unlicensed, but public, buildings as is at present exercised under the Act 41 & 42 Vict. s. 32, and to include a definition of the meaning of the word "public" building?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I understand that this question is now engaging the attention of a Committee of the Metropolitan Board of Works, who are the constituted authority to carry the Metropolitan Management Act into effect. Any representation which they may address to me will receive my best attention; but I can hold out no prospect of Her Majesty's Government being able to legislate on the subject this Session.

THE ROYAL GARDENS, KEW.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) (for Mr. LABOUCHÈRE) (Northampton) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether any record has been kept of the plants, seeds, and specimens received at the Royal Gardens, Kew, and of the work done in connection with them, and of the information received from abroad, no Report having been issued since that for the year 1882?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): A minute record is kept of everything received in the several Departments of Kew Gardens. Mainly owing to the protracted illness of the late Curator the work of compiling the Annual Reports has fallen into arrear; but materials for the series of 1883 to 1886 are in hand, and it is hoped to issue them all this year. In response to the demands for the publication more speedily than in the Annual Report of information received from abroad, I have sanctioned the publication of a monthly bulletin, which can be purchased for a small sum.

Mr. Ritchie

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, AND THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND), ACT 1886—THE SHORTHAND WRITERS' NOTES.

MR. T. P. GILL (Louth, S.) (for MR. CHANCE) (Kilkenny, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will make representations to the authority having custody of the shorthand writers' original notes and transcripts of the proceedings of the Cowper Commission, to insure facilities being accorded to Members of this House to inspect such notes and transcripts so far as the same record the evidence of witnesses?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I know of no reason why I should take such an unusual course as is here suggested.

INDIA—DISCONTENT IN MADRAS.

MR. TUITTE (Westmeath, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether last year there was a fresh outbreak of discontent, accompanied with violence, in the Rumpu Country, Madras, and to what extent?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GOSST) (Chatham): There has not been an outbreak of discontent in the Rumpu District. Last June or July 25 hillmen in the Gudem District burnt a police station and two bungalows. They were speedily dispersed and arrested.

ARMY—MAJORS—THE ROYAL WARRANT, 1887.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Royal Warrant issued 1st January, 1887, has made an alteration of great importance to officers holding the rank of Major in Her Majesty's Service, who were promoted before the 1st January, 1887; whether it is the case that the pension of £300 a-year previously granted cannot now be obtained until the age of 48 has been reached; and, whether the previous Warrant will be taken to apply to those who were promoted under it, especially as a considerable proportion of those now holding the rank of Major purchased their first Commissions, and can no longer expect to receive compensation for the money which they have so advanced?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): It was not intended that the Royal Warrant of January 1, 1887, should diminish in any way the privileges as to retirement enjoyed by pre-warrant Majors; but, by a clerical error, in removing the obligation to retire after seven years' service in the rank, the right to retire at that period was taken away also. The mistake was at once discovered, and Her Majesty has signed a Warrant rectifying it. The Article will be corrected in its next issue.

INDIA (MADRAS)—THE COVENANTED CIVIL SERVICE—LAND SPECULATIONS—MR. SULLIVAN.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the late senior member of the Madras Civil Service and senior member of Council in the Government of Madras has been compelled to resign because he was unable to meet the charges brought against him, of having infringed the terms of the Civil Service Covenant forbidding the holding of land by Civil servants; whether other Madras Civil servants are known to be landowners, or shareholders in Land Companies, or otherwise interested in land speculation within the Presidency, or in Native States under the Madras Government, all of which practices are forbidden by the Civil Service Covenant or the Orders of the Government of India; whether Civil servants who have notified these breaches of the covenant to the Madras Government have been subjected to most unfair treatment, that has been acknowledged by, and partially redressed by, the Secretary of State; and, whether the Secretary of State will order a general inquiry into the subject, or take such steps as are necessary for the cessation of these irregularities, the future strict observance of the covenant, and the full protection of those Civil servants who, in the discharge of their duty, are bound to inform the superior authorities of cases of infringement of the covenant?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Oatham): Charges of the kind stated were brought against the gentleman referred to, and before any decision was arrived at he tendered his resignation, which was accepted. To the second and third Question my answer is, No. Such steps as are necessary to insure the future strict observation of the Regulation in question have already been taken by the Secretary of State.

NAVY—LIEUTENANTS AND SUB-LIEUTENANTS.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether there are a sufficient number of Lieutenants and Sub-Lieutenants upon The Navy List, to carry on the duties of the service as watchkeepers, and to take command of torpedo and picket boats in time of war; and, if so, how it comes that in a time of peace their Lordships recently refused to accept the resignation of a Lieutenant who was able to give what have, until recently, been considered sufficient grounds to have such a request granted?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): Exceptional measures would have to be taken in time of war to provide the number of Lieutenants and Sub-Lieutenants required for the duties specified, which could not be resorted to in time of peace. Owing to various causes there was at the latter part of last year an insufficient number of Lieutenants available to meet all the requirements at that time; so the Admiralty were, in consequence, compelled in the public interest to withhold their assent for the time to certain officers of that rank resigning their commissions.

STATE OF IRELAND—DISTURBANCES AT YOUGHAL.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the following statements, which appeared in The Times of last Friday, are true:—That a determined effort was made on the previous night to burn the house of Inspector Kerin at Youghal; that the crowd broke the windows of the Protestant Schools and the Methodist Church at Youghal; that children of 12 to 14 years of age were found drunk in the doorways, early on Thursday morning, in the streets of Youghal; and, whether any official Report, in reference to the above alleged outrages, was made by the local police officer to the authorities at Dublin Castle previous to this Question appearing on the Notice Paper?

Mr. Buchanan

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): This Question was on the Paper for Tuesday without Notice. The hon. Member was then informed that local inquiry was necessary. He has put it down again without leaving time for the receipt of the reply in course of post, even assuming that the local officer could answer by return, and without making any inquiry. All I can say, therefore, is that no official Report had up to yesterday been received in Dublin as to the alleged occurrences.

MR. LANE: I must ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is not aware that a contradiction of the report in The Times appeared in the London papers last Saturday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have got no official Report yet.

MR. J. REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman permit me to ask—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

NAVY—WIDOWS OF SEAMEN AND MARINES.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, What steps have been taken to carry out the recommendations of the Duke of Edinburgh's Committee as to making provision for the widows of seamen in the Royal Navy and the Royal Marines?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The Admiralty have not yet been able to take practical action on this Report; but if my hon. and gallant Friend would confer with me I could point out to him the nature of the difficulties we have to contend with.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—GREENWICH HOSPITAL SCHOOL.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether there is any reason why the usual Government Grant should not be given to the Greenwich Hospital Schools, in the same way as to other schools of a similar nature?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford), in reply, said, no application had ever been made to the Department on behalf of the schools. Should such an application be made, he saw no reason why they should not deal with the case on its merits.

PROSECUTION OF OFFENCES ACTS— THE REGULATIONS—RESULTS.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will instruct the Director of Public Prosecutions to make a Report showing the working of the Regulations made, in 1885, for carrying out the Prosecution of Offences Acts, 1879 and 1884, with statistics showing the number, nature, cost, and result of the proceedings instituted by the Director in accordance with those Regulations; and, whether he will lay such Report upon the Table before the Vote for Public Prosecutions is taken?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have consulted the Director of Public Prosecutions, and he tells me that he will be able to prepare such a Return as the right hon. Member asks for; and, provided the Vote for Public Prosecutions is not taken before Easter, the Return will be ready before then. There will be no objection to lay the Return on the Table of the House.

INDIA (MADRAS)—SALE OF MUNICIPAL BUILDINGS IN OOTACAMUND.

MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, in August, 1881, the Commissioner of the Nilgiri Hills, ex-officio President of the Municipality, ordered the local fund engineer to value certain municipal buildings in Ootacamund; whether the engineer reported their value to be Rs. 3200; whether, in spite of this valuation, these buildings were then sold privately to the senior member of the Madras Board of Revenue for Rs. 100 only; whether these facts were last year formally brought to public notice; and, whether, as the matter has been so severely commented on by the Native and European Press in India, he will say whether these statements are true?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The statements alluded to in the Question have been made by one officer of the Madras Government, and denied by another. As no formal inquiry has been made into the accuracy of the statements, I am unable to say whether they are true or not.

WAR OFFICE—COAST DEFENCES— MARTELLO TOWERS.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) asked the Secretary of State for War, The number of Martello towers that are situate on the coast between Brighton and Dover, and if he can say for what purposes they are used; if the sites of these Martello towers could not be adapted, at a very small cost, to a "disappearing system" of fortifications, by substituting a pit in place of the tower and adopting the Moncrieff gun carriage; what, if any, fortifications exist on the South East Coast, from Pevensey Bay to Pett Level; and, whether the old Military Canal at the last-named place, now unused, could not be adapted to defensive purposes?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing) (who replied) said: There are 43 Martello towers between Brighton and Dover, one of which is armed with a 7-inch rifled breech-loading gun. Nineteen carry smooth-bore ordnance; and the remainder are used as barracks, or let. The sites could be made use of for guns; but the towers themselves could not be adapted to "disappearing," or any other modern mounting for heavy guns. With the exception of 14 towers, all at Pevensey, there are no fortifications between Pevensey Bay and the Pett Level at Winchelsea. The old Military Canal retains its value as an obstacle in the event of a hostile force landing in the neighbourhood.

WAR OFFICE—ROMAN CATHOLIC ARMY CHAPLAINS.

MR. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the services of the acting

Roman Catholic Army Chaplains at Portsmouth, Hilsea, Fareham, Dover, Shorncliffe, Colchester, and Cyprus are to be dispensed with; if it is the intention of the Authorities, on the retirement of the next Roman Catholic Commissioned Chaplain, not to fill up the vacancy; and, if so, whether, in view of the number of Roman Catholics serving in the Army, the War Office will reconsider their determination relative to the dismissal of Roman Catholic Chaplains; and, if a corresponding reduction is proposed to be made in the number of Church of England Army Chaplains?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The acting Roman Catholic Chaplains at Portsmouth, Chatham, and Colchester are to be relieved by commissioned Chaplains returning from Egypt on the reduction of the force there. The acting Chaplain at Cyprus was sent out specially on account of the invalids from Egypt; and as there is no longer an invalid depot there he has been brought home, and sent to relieve the acting Chaplains at Hilsea and Fareham. It has also been decided to dispense with an acting Chaplain at Dover, as the work there is not considered to be more than sufficient for one Chaplain. No change is contemplated at Shorncliffe. There is no intention of reducing the number of Roman Catholic commissioned Chaplains. The Church of England acting Chaplains will also be reduced, as a consequence of troops coming home from Egypt.

WAR OFFICE—WOOLWICH CADETS—THE JUBILEE REVIEW AT ALDERSHOT.

MR. E. R. RUSSELL (Glasgow, Bridgeton) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether arrangements will be made to enable the Cadets of the Royal Military School at Woolwich to take part under their own officers in the Review which is to take place at Aldershot in honour of Her Majesty's Jubilee?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The arrangements for this Review are not yet complete, and I cannot, therefore, answer this Question at present. But I may say that the amount of money at my disposal is very limited.

Mr. W. J. Corbet

THE QUEEN'S JUBILEE CELEBRATION—A SPECIAL HOLIDAY.

COLONEL ANSTRUTHER (Suffolk, Woodbridge) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, considering that Tuesday, the 21st of June, is to be observed as a public holiday, he can see his way to recommend that the Monday previous should, by Royal Proclamation or otherwise, be kept as a special Bank Holiday, so as to grant to Her Majesty's subjects three consecutive days in which to celebrate Her Jubilee?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am sorry to say that I cannot hold out any prospect to my hon. and gallant Friend that Monday, the 20th of June, will be proclaimed as a national holiday, in addition to Tuesday, the 21st.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE—THE HESSIAN FLY.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether his attention has been called to the reported presence of chrysalide of the Hessian fly in the siftings of threshing machines in Hertfordshire and Essex; and, whether, in view of the urgency of the danger, he will take steps at once to publish official instructions on the subject?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) (who replied) said: The attention of the Agricultural Department has been called to this matter, and specimens of both infested substances have been sent to the Department by Mr. Whitehead. A warning has been printed, and is about to be issued to all Local Authorities in Great Britain.

INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT, DUBLIN—APPOINTMENTS.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Wexford, N.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is a fact that the principal posts in the Inland Revenue Department in Dublin are filled by Englishmen, and if the two important posts of Controller of Legacy Duty and Controller of Stamps were filled by transfers of minor Clerks from the London Office to these appointments, over the heads of competent Irishmen, of long experience, in the Irish Office in Dublin; if it is a fact that a scheme of re-organisation is at present being carried out by an official from London; if there is any rule in the Department which excludes Irishmen from promotion; and, if he will lay upon the Table the draft scheme of re-organisation before it has been finally adopted?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I am informed that the answer to all the Questions of the hon. Member is no, Sir.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has seen a copy of the following letter, which was addressed by Dr. Charles Ronayne, J.P. (the only magistrate living in the town of Youghal) to Mr. Kerin, the District Inspector of Youghal:—

"Dear Sir,—I am just after coming from the death of a fine young man, who was stabbed by a policeman. I went to the barracks to see who was in charge of the police, and to inquire what circumstances produced the sad business. I found there a number of strange police, and a young officer, Mr. Somerville, who assumed the responsibility of having ordered the charge that caused this young man's death. Now, as I have taken great pains for the past 24 hours to preserve the peace in this usually quiet town, and as I am of opinion that there was not the least danger to apprehend any public disturbance, and as I am afraid that it was the advent of these new men led to this calamity, I desire to know from you, as the residing District Inspector, under what circumstances they were brought or sent here.—Yours faithfully,

"8th March 1887. CHARLES RONAYNE;"

whether this magistrate had been taking a very active part for some days previously, in co-operation with the Catholic clergymen of Youghal, in allaying the excitement caused by the threatened arrest of the Reverend Father Keller; why the police authorities ignored him by not consulting him as to the necessity of bringing a force of strange police into Youghal; and, whether the preservation of the peace of Youghal has been transferred from the magistrates of Youghal to the police officer?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): This Question has been referred to the District Inspector for the local inquiries necessary. There has not been time for the receipt of his reply.

MR. LANE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the number of days' Notice he will require to be given of a Question for the purpose of receiving an answer by telegraph from an official in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It entirely depends upon the special circumstances of each case.

LEGACY AND SUCCESSION DUTIES—COPIES OF RESIDUARY ACCOUNTS.

MR. FINCH-HATTON (Lincolnshire, Spalding) asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether repeated applications have been made by residuary legatees and others interested in the estates of deceased persons, to the Controller of Legacy and Succession Duties, for office copies of residuary accounts passed by executors; whether such applications are refused, unless upon an order of the executors or an order of one of Her Majesty's Judges of the Court of Chancery; and, whether persons interested are obliged to apply to the Court for an administration suit where executors refuse to render proper accounts to beneficiaries, and are thus put to unnecessary expense; and, if so, whether the present rule cannot be altered?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): It is the fact that applications are at times made by persons for inspection of residuary accounts passed by executors, and that such applications are refused unless the written consent of the executors is obtained. The documents are also produced in Court on subpoena. It is also the fact that when executors refuse to render accounts beneficiaries have to apply to the Court for an order for administration of the estate. The documents at the Inland Revenue Office are filed there merely for the purpose of the Revenue, and not for public inspection, and are treated as quasi-confidential documents. The Inland Revenue officials have no means of ascertaining whether persons making the application are, or are not, persons interested, or beneficiaries. It would, in my opinion, be detrimental to the Public Service if intending litigants were permitted to have access to the books and papers filed at Somerset House; as, in the circumstances, I do not see that the Rule can or ought to be altered.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — OUT- BREAK AT EXETER TRAINING COLLEGE.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether his attention has been called to the recent outbreak among the students at the Exeter Training College; and, whether it is his intention to institute any inquiry into the circumstances attending it, and into the complaints of the second year students in regard to the teaching staff?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): A detailed statement of the circumstances attending the outbreak at the Exeter Training College has been placed in my hands by the Principal of the College, from which it appears that the students have now submitted to discipline, and expressed their regret for what occurred. No further inquiry on this point seems to be necessary; but I have thought it best to communicate with Her Majesty's Inspector of Training Colleges, who, at his next visit, will pay special attention to the qualifications of that member of the teaching staff in respect of whom complaint has been made.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—IMPORTATION OF CATTLE FROM IRELAND INTO SCOTLAND.

Mr. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the action of certain Local Authorities in Scotland with regard to forbidding the importation of cattle from Ireland generally; whether any distinction is made by these Authorities either as to the locality or port from which cattle are sent or as to the sort of cattle, whether store or dairy cattle; whether any disease has been traced to any, and what, Irish port and what class of cattle was affected; whether he will call the attention of the Scottish Authorities to page 22 of the last Report of the Agricultural Department of the English Privy Council, where it is shown that 69 per cent of the cases of pleuro-pneumonia in Scotland are shown to be in the dairy stock of Glasgow and Edinburgh; whether he will make representations in the proper quarter in Scotland, so as to prevent these powers of sanitary regulations from being an injury to the export trade of Ireland; whether it is a fact that two years ago some similar action was taken but afterwards modified, so far as the Ports of Derry and Belfast were concerned, on the protest of the Irish Authorities; and, whether he will take similar energetic action to have the same modifications made immediately?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): This subject is much too extensive and important to be dealt with satisfactorily within the limits of the answer to a Question. The Scottish Local Authorities have no power to prohibit generally the importation of cattle from Ireland. They have power to prohibit the movement of cattle into their districts from other districts in Great Britain; and the attention of the Veterinary Department in Ireland has recently been drawn to the manner in which this power has, in some cases, been exercised, as being calculated to interfere with the export trade in Ireland. This, I presume, is what the hon. Member refers to. With regard to the recent detection of disease at Irish ports, the facts are that pleuro-pneumonia has been detected in three dairy cattle at the Port of Dublin, and that one bullock shipped at Drogheda was also found to be similarly affected. With the exception of the Dublin District Ireland is, I am happy to say, entirely free from pleuro-pneumonia. So far as I have been able to ascertain, the circumstances of the present difficulty with the Scottish Authorities are not precisely similar to those of a former occasion to which the hon. Member refers, and they may possibly not be so easily arranged; but I shall give instructions to the Veterinary Department in Dublin to communicate at once to the Agricultural Department of the English Privy Council the representations already made, and also any further representations that may be received on the subject, and to request that Department to urge upon the Scottish Local Authorities to exercise their powers with as much consideration for the Irish export trade as is possible.

DISTRESS IN THE METROPOLIS—THE CONFERENCE.

CAPTAIN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the attention of the Government has been directed to the proceedings of an important Conference held on the 21st January, to consider the question of the distress existing in London, at which a Resolution was passed calling upon the Government to institute an exhaustive inquiry into the extent, character, and causes of the distress existing in London; and, if so, whether it is contemplated that any steps should be taken to give effect to the views of the Conference?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Yes, Sir; the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the Conference in question, which was of an essentially representative character. The Resolution passed at such Conference was forwarded to the Prime Minister, who has conferred with me on the subject, with the result that the Government have determined to institute an inquiry as to the employment and earnings and other particulars with regard to the working classes in four typical districts in the Metropolis. The districts selected are in St. George's-in-the-East, Battersea, Deptford, and Hackney. Each district has a population of about 50,000 persons, and is chiefly populated by persons of the working classes. The information which it is sought to obtain is of an exhaustive character; and the inquiries will be made from house to house by enumerators acting under the Registrars of Births and Deaths in the several districts. The Registrar General, through the agency of his Department, will render all the assistance he can to secure accuracy in the Returns. The Returns will be tabulated in the General Register Office, and will afterwards be submitted to Parliament. The inquiry will, I hope, commence on Saturday.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—THE "OCTROI" AT CAIRO.

Mr. PIOTON (Leicester) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is true, as stated in a letter from Cairo to The Times of Wednesday, that—

"A poor man cannot bring his cow or buffalo into the town without paying 20 francs each time for the transit;"

whether there is any truth in the assertion made in the same letter, that, in consequence of the heavy octroi—

"Whole loads of cabbages, &c., are actually often thrown away, because the tax on their admission is more than the cultivator could hope to gain on the sale;"

and, whether there is any reason to believe, as alleged, that—

"The land, which ought to be one of the most fertile in the world, is made comparatively barren by these oppressive exactions, which, added to a heavy Land Tax, become actually crushing?"

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The Octroi Duty in Egyptian towns is heavy, and a Bill was lately introduced into the Legislative Council to modify it in favour of the country people; but the Council did not pass it. Her Majesty's Government have no reason to believe, as alleged in the Question of the hon. Member, that the land is going out of cultivation on account of these and other burdens; on the contrary, though the Land Tax is still heavy, cultivation is extending itself, the indebtedness of the peasantry has diminished, and their material condition has improved.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY— CO. TIPPERARY.

Mr. P. J. O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the regular Constabulary Force for the North Riding of the County of Tipperary stands at 309 men; whether out of that number there are at present only 266 men in active service in the district; whether the sum of £1,000 is annually paid out of the Riding for what is termed extra police; whether, including the so-called extra police, the regular force is at present short to the number of 19; and, if so, whether he will fill up the regular Parliamentary quota, and relieve the ratepayers from this tax for extra police who are not in the district; whether, at the recent Spring Assizes at Nenagh, where the presentment for this extra police tax was opposed, the Presiding Judge, Baron Dowse, replying to the Traverser, made use of these words—

"It is imperative on me to pass this presentment, otherwise I would be most happy to concede to the just application;"

whether he will inform the House, or give a Return, as to the number of persions who are at present under police protection, and the number of men employed in discharge of protection duty in North Tipperary; and, for what purpose, with the comparative absence of crime in the county, as stated by Baron Dowse, the ratepayers are burdened with this tax for extra police?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Part of this Question I have already answered. It is renewed with some additions, and without Notice, and it cannot be fully answered without local inquiry on some points. I can at once say, however, that the entire free force is not 309 men, as stated by the hon. Member, but 266.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will obtain exactly the number of extra police employed in police protection?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have just told the other hon. Member that I will cause inquiries to be made.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE KENTISH TOWN MURDER.

MR. SHIRLEY (Yorkshire, W.R., Doncaster) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to offer a reward for the apprehension of the perpetrators of the recent Kentish Town murder, as recommended by various members of the Coroner's Jury?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): The question of offering a reward in the case of this murder is still under consideration; but, as the hon. Member may be aware, rewards are only offered by the Home Office under very exceptional circumstances.

ARMY ESTIMATES—THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can inform the House when the Motion will be made for the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the Army Estimates?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): It is the intention of the Government, so soon as the necessary Votes have been taken in the Navy Estimates, to move to refer the Army and Navy Estimates to a Select Committee, to report their observations on the several Votes to the House.

NAVY—THE DOCKYARD WORKS AT HAULBOWLINE — DISCHARGE OF WORKMEN.

MR. HOOPER (Cork, S.E.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he is aware that a notice to the following effect was posted yesterday at Haulbowline Dockyard Works:—

"On 1st June 80 men monthly to be discharged.—By order of Lords Commissioners of Admiralty;"

whether, in the event of the Motion to be made as to the subject of the disappointing rate of progress which is being made with Haulbowline Works, he will direct all steps in pursuance of this official notice to be held in abeyance pending a full debate on this subject in the House?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing), in reply, said, he quite sympathized with the hon. Gentleman's object; but the fact was that the notice in question was given because the work on which the men were engaged was just approaching completion.

METROPOLIS—MAGNITUDE OF THE DEBT.

MR. WOOTTON ISAAOSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the growing magnitude of the Metropolitan debt secured on the rates, and the great burden thereby imposed on the ratepayers, the Government will consider the desirability of introducing a Bill to limit the total borrowing powers on this security?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The borrowing powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works are granted by an annual Act of Parliament. The Treasury require that the Bill for this purpose should have attached to it tables showing over a series of years the borrowing powers, the progress of the debt and of the sinking fund, and the amount of rate levied, in order that Metropolitan Members and others interested in the question may have the means of forming a judgment upon the general financial policy of the Board, and may be in a position to discuss the whole question, or the particular provisions of the Bill, when it is before the House. It appears to me that it lies with the Metropolitan Members, rather than with Her Majesty's Government, to call the attention of the House to this question of Local Government, if they should consider that the indebtedness of the Metropolis is increasing at too great a rate.

Mr. P. J. O'Brien

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) — THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL — THE ATTACK ON THE POLICE.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland the following Question, of which I have given him private Notice:—Whether he has seen the report in to-day's London papers of the proceedings at the inquest of the fisherman O'Hanlon, killed by the police at Youghal, at which Mr. Somerville, the police officer, swore there was no truth in the Chief Secretary's statement that 21 out of 22 policemen were severely injured, and that he (Mr. Somerville) had not made any such report to the authorities; and, if so, whether the Chief Secretary will state to the House from what source he received the information he conveyed to the House on Tuesday?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): As the hon. Gentleman is aware, I made the statement in answer to a Question put to me without Notice by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), and in making the statement I said I would not guarantee its accuracy. What I stated was that 21 out of 22 policemen were injured. What appears to be the fact is that 21 out of the 22 were hit, that 15 of them were hurt, and three of them were severely hurt.

MR. LANE: Has the right hon. Gentleman since seen the statement, sworn to by Mr. Somerville, that there was no truth in the statement he made to the House on Tuesday night?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, so far as he could make out, the statement of District Inspector Somerville was correct.

MR. OLANOY (Dublin Co., N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman state who first gave him his information?

[No reply.]

MR. LANE: I have given the right hon. Gentleman private Notice of the following Question:—Whether he is aware that at the inquest on O'Hanlon, now being held at Youghal, the Coroner has made frequent complaints about receiving no assistance from the police officer; whether the District Inspector refused to execute a warrant against a policeman who was committed for contempt of Court; and, whether he will telegraph orders to the police officer at Youghal to render the same assistance in this case as he would in a case in which the suspected culprit was not a member of the Constabulary?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have received no information to that effect; and, under the circumstances, I could not think of sending such a telegram.

MR. LANE: The information is in this morning's papers.

STATEMENT

EXPLANATORY OF THE

NAVY ESTIMATES, 1887-88,

AND OF THE

POLICY EMBODIED THEREIN.

ALTERATIONS IN FORM OF ESTIMATES.

IT will be observed that certain changes have been adopted in, and additions made to, the form in which the Appendices to the Estimates have hitherto been drawn up. The primary object of these alterations has been to place before the House in the simplest form the fullest possible information upon past and proposed future expenditure. Statements are also furnished in considerable detail of the capital stock of the nation in its Navy, Dockyards, and contents of the storehouses. These Statements will form the groundwork of a Capital Account which, it is hoped, may be presented in a more complete state next year.

In the detailed programme * of works to be undertaken during the year will be found under a separate heading for each vessel building particulars of her type, tonnage, load-draught, speed at mean-load draught, coal capacity, and armament as designed and approved. In the same column are shown the original estimated cost, as well as the outlay as at present anticipated, also the amount of the expenditure on each vessel during past financial years, with the probable actual outlay during the year ending on 31st March, 1887.

The total estimated cost of each vessel, including the estimated charge falling on Army as well as on Naval Votes, is also set out, thus affording information of the total outlay on the vessel complete for sea, exclusive of sea stores.

Hitherto it has not been customary to tabulate, in much detail, the proposed expenditure on the refit and repairs of vessels, it being impossible to give this information with the same approximation as with vessels building. Frequently the Estimates are provisional. They are made prior to the arrival and full survey of the vessel, and often the necessity for outlay only develops during the progress of the work. At the same time, this class of expenditure forms so important an item in the Naval Budget that the fullest possible details are now given of the amount proposed to be allocated to each vessel. The value of such outlays depends largely upon the character of the ship and her probable efficiency after alteration and refit as a vessel of war. Information is, therefore, now furnished which will enable an opinion to be formed upon these points.

* Appendix to Navy Estimates.

The ordinary repairs and maintenance on the Channel and other squadrons and the estimated cost of miscellaneous Services are summarised separately. The Appendix also exhibits the proposed expenditure in the aggregate compared with the Votes.

The Vote for dockyard labour is taken in the present Estimates as a whole, and is not allocated, as has been the practice in past years, to the several Yards. The object of this change is to afford the Controller of the Navy more latitude in the distribution of work, and of the classes of labour, in a manner which may promote greater efficiency and economy in carrying out the varying requirements of the Navy.

The statement following the Appendices is the first of the series of Tables framed for the purpose of informing Parliament of the value of the property which the nation possesses in the Navy and the Establishments and Services connected therewith.

In the Table showing the cost of the Navy will be found the name of each effective ship in the Navy, with the year of her completion, original cost of construction, and subsequent total expenditure upon alterations, refits, and maintenance. Vessels which have become inefficient, but which remain on the list, or those not worth the cost of immediate repair, or which have become obsolete, are placed in a separate category in the Summary, as also is the cost of troop and harbour ships, as well as of yard and other craft belonging to the Service.

The "Explanations of Differences," which have been previously printed as a separate Parliamentary Paper, are this year included, for the convenience of Members of the House, in the Navy Estimates.

PRESENT CONDITION OF NAVAL FINANCE.

EXPENDITURE OF 1886-87 AS COMPARED WITH ESTIMATES 1887-88.

The expenditure (including both Original and Supplementary Estimates) borne by Naval Votes for the year ending 31st March, 1887, is £13,270,100.

The Estimate of Expenditure for the year ending 31st March, 1888, is £12,476,800, being a decrease of £793,300 compared with the expenditure of the preceding year. A reduction of expenditure generally implies a decrease of the effective strength of the Service with which it is connected. We are fortunate enough to be able to reverse this rule in the present instance. The reduced outlay during the ensuing financial year is accompanied by a material increase in the strength of the Navy, money being found for 62,500 officers and men in 1887-88 as against 61,400 in the preceding year, whilst the number and power of ships in the 1st Reserve, and ready for commission on 1st April, 1888, will be much in excess of any similar provision for many years past.

A diminution in the amount of liabilities for vessels and engines constructed by contract is another noticeable feature in the present Financial Statement.

These liabilities stood at £2,680,000 in April, 1886, and are estimated to be £1,030,000 in April, 1887; yet at the end of the financial year 1887-88, including the cost of new ships and engines contracted for during that year, they will stand at the low figure of £431,000. An almost similar reduction of liability for ships building in the dockyards can be shown.

The large augmentation in the fighting strength of the Navy which will have been effected simultaneously with a reduction of annual expenditure and incurred liabilities may be accepted as a proof that naval finance, so far as outlay and return are concerned, is now in a satisfactory condition, and that it will be possible, under a system of judicious management, to associate for some time to come a reduction of expenditure with an increase of efficiency.

REVIEW OF THE LAST SIX YEARS' EXPENDITURE.

These satisfactory results have been obtained partly by policy, partly by improved methods of administration; but a careful review of the expenditure of the past six years is necessary in order that the significance of our present position, and the causes at work in establishing it, may be understood by Parliament and the country.

In the period between 1861 and 1885 every Naval Power in Europe, save England, largely increased its naval expenditure. The introduction of slow-burning powder, and the alterations in the design of heavy ordnance which it entailed, whilst giving increased velocity and accuracy to guns of all calibres, produced a corresponding development in the defensive power of armour-clad and protected vessels. Speed in the performance of naval tactics became an even more essential factor than before, and was so recognized abroad; and on vessels of comparatively small displacement successful efforts were made to realize, by engineering ingenuity, a speed wholly unknown to the smaller craft of a few years back.

These developments of speed and power necessitated increased expense.

England was the last Naval Power to recognize these new conditions. In 1885, under popular pressure, the Government of that day admitted the insufficiency of its previous arrangements, and, with the assent of all parties in the State, Lord Northbrook, the then First Lord of the Admiralty, proposed to expend, in addition to the ordinary shipbuilding programme, a sum of £3,100,000 in the building of ships by contract in private yards. An additional sum of £1,600,000 for guns was also proposed to be added to the Ordnance Votes of the Navy, which are included in the annual Estimates of expenditure of the War Office.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated that this outlay would be spread over five years, ending March 31, 1890, and form a portion of the expenditure of the country for that period.

The work has been executed with such rapidity, that nearly the whole of this expenditure has fallen upon three, instead of five, years. Moreover, the sum of £3,100,000 was found to be insufficient to complete the work it began.

The following Tables show the difference between the estimate of time and outlay made in 1885 and the actual expenditure of the past two years, and the probable disbursements in the ensuing year.

NEW CONSTRUCTIONS.

Special Programme.

	1885-86.	1886-87.	1887-88.	1888-89.	1889-90.	Total.
	£	£	£	£	£	£
Hulls and Engines (Contract Price) ..	800,000	800,000	600,000	600,000	500,000	3,100,000

Expenditure—Actual and Estimated.

	1885-86. (Actual.)	1886-87. (Actual and Estimated.)	1887-88. (Estimated.)	Balance remaining.	Total Cost.
Hulls—	£	£	£	£	£
Contract price	701,150	861,701	518,023	74,093	2,154,967
Completing	1,572	71,721	154,470	64,032	291,795
Propelling, &c., machinery	341,428	274,437	127,331	52,646	796,742
Gun-mountings	12,282	68,289	118,555	25,028	224,754
Torpedo apparatus	16,551	43,384	78,957	969	139,861
Total	1,072,983	1,319,532	997,336	217,268	3,607,119

Comparison of Expenditure (estimated) with Programme.

	Programme.	Expenditure.	Difference.
	£	£	£
Hulls and engines	3,100,000	2,950,709	—149,291
Completing	291,795	+291,795
Gun-mountings	224,754	+224,754
Torpedo apparatus	139,861	+139,861
Total	3,100,000	3,607,119	+507,119

Memorandum.

Lord Northbrook's special Shipbuilding Programme, as provided for in the Estimates 1885-86, included—

2 Armour-clads
6 Belted Cruisers.

6 Steel Torpedo Cruisers.
10 first-class Torpedo-boats (4 subsequently added).

The financial result of Lord Northbrook's special programme may be summarized thus:—

1. An excess expenditure of £502,000 on the original Shipbuilding Estimate, which provided for hulls and engines only.
2. An expenditure on account of ships building of £3,390,000 in three years, instead of an expenditure of £3,100,000 in five years.
3. An extra expenditure (under Army Votes), roughly estimated at £500,000, for the ammunition and torpedoes necessary for these ships, and for which no special provision was made.

VOTE OF CREDIT OF 1885.

Soon after the proposals for this increase to our naval strength had been assented to in 1885, the prospect of a possible war compelled the Government to apply for a large Vote of Credit, of which £2,000,000* was appropriated to naval purposes. A large additional sum was also granted for the manufacture of naval ordnance, and included in the Vote of Credit allotted the War Department.

* Exclusive of £500,000 for transport (Army Department).

A considerable amount of orders and of work were given under these Votes of Credit, which were not covered by the sums allotted to them, and have since become a charge upon the annual Estimates.

These are the causes of the exceptional expenditure of the past two years, for during that period Navy Votes have had to meet not only the ordinary wants and wastage of a great Service, but the accumulated arrears of an antecedent period of insufficient provision.

AVERAGE EXPENDITURE OF 1881-85 COMPARED WITH 1886-87.

The average annual expenditure upon the Navy (deducting the Transport Vote, which is for services rendered to the Army) of the four years ended 31st March, 1885, when all the Naval Powers in Europe, except England, were so busy, was—

Navy Expenditure	£	10,628,000
Gun ditto † (Army Vote)		738,000
Total average annual expenditure for four years ending 1884-85		11,366,000
In 1886-86 Navy expenditure was		14,724,000
Gun ditto † (Army Vote)		1,600,000
Total, 1886-86		16,324,000
In 1886-87 Navy expenditure (estimated) was		12,941,000
Gun ditto † (Army Vote)		1,685,000
Total, 1886-87		14,626,000

being a total excess during the two years of £8,218,000 over and above the average expenditure of the four preceding years.

If this great sum had been spread over this period of six years more evenly, and if consideration and a continuous policy had attended its disbursement, the Navy at this moment would be far stronger than it is.

On the other hand, the increase of strength which this sum will ultimately give would have been more economically attained if hurry and scare had not attended its outlay.

The conclusion to be drawn will, I trust, not be lost sight of by subsequent Administrations and by Parliament.

† Includes estimated value of services performed by War Office, beyond actual provision for Navy in original Army Estimates.

SHIPBUILDING POLICY OF PRESENT BOARD.

Although three successive Boards of Admiralty have been in office since 1885, the policy pursued, so far as shipbuilding and dockyard administration are concerned, has been uniform and continuous. The enormous liabilities and the great number of ships ordered in 1885 induced the Board of July, 1885, of which I was the Head, to concentrate their attention to bringing to as rapid a completion as was possible the programme of shipbuilding they found prescribed, without enlarging it; certain gaps in it were filled, and the vessels laid down for that purpose were in most instances of small displacement, and absolutely necessary to provide for the reliefs of the next and subsequent year.

The following Statement shows the progress made both in the past and that contemplated in the forthcoming financial year.

PROGRESS OF SHIP-BUILDING AS COMPARED WITH PROGRAMME 1886-87.

Completed Ships.

In the Estimates for 1886-87 (Appendix No. 37) it was anticipated that the following new vessels would be "passed into the 1st Reserve" during the financial year:—

- 3 armoured ships.
- 1 protected ship.
- 13 unprotected ships.

According to the latest Reports, it appears that the actual figures for the ships named in Appendix No. 37, as to be completed in 1886-87, will stand at the end of March, 1887, at 1 armoured ship, 1 protected, 13 unprotected.

Two armoured ships—"Rodney" and "Warspite"—have not been completed as was intended; the "Warspite" because of changes in rig and certain details, resulting from experience with "Impérieuse" at sea; the "Rodney" because of delays in supply of guns and gun-mountings.

Three unprotected ships—"Fearless," "Lizard," and "Bramble"—have been delayed in delivery by contractors, and, consequently, have not been completed by the date they would have been had contract terms been kept.

Besides the ships that have been completed, or will be finished in 1886-87, it is anticipated that thirty-five out of the fifty-five first-class boats of 125 feet to 150 feet in length will be completed in 1886-87; the remaining twenty torpedo-boats are complete in armament, and will be ready for service in June.

Furthermore, it must be noted that out of the sixteen ships shown as to be passed into 1st Reserve in 1885-86 (Appendix 37, Navy Estimates for 1886-87), fully one-half (including 2 armoured, 3 partially-protected, 3 unprotected ships) had money spent upon their actual completion in 1886-87.

The whole addition* to the Fleet in 1886-87, excluding small craft, has therefore been:—

- 3 armoured ships.
- 1 protected ship.
- 3 partially-protected ships.
- 13 unprotected ships.

Under the Orders issued by the present Board, every vessel when passed into the 1st Class Reserve is supposed to be ready for sea in forty-eight hours, and the officers of the respective yards are held responsible that all vessels so passed are maintained in that condition.

Advancement of New Ships.

The general character of the work done on new ships in 1886-87, besides the completion of those above named, may be best described as rapid advancement. For the dockyard work, the facts are set forth in the draft programme for 1887-88, the most notable examples of rapid progress being the "Trafalgar," "Nile,"

* See p. 14.

"Immortalité," and "Aurora." Results have amply justified the decision taken in framing the Estimates for 1886-87 to make liberal provision for the expenditure on labour on each of these vessels.

Causes of Delay on New Ships.

Some difficulties have arisen, as was anticipated, from the circumstance that so many of the armoured ships laid down previous to 1885 are very nearly in the same stage of advancement towards completion, requiring hydraulic machinery and gun-mountings simultaneously. Until the "Collingwood's" barbette-mountings had been actually tested, work on the corresponding mountings for other vessels of the "Admiral" class could not be taken in hand. When these trials were completed the orders given for other ships were of exceptional magnitude and urgency, greatly taxing the resources of the manufacturers.

The great exertions which the contractors have made to improve their means of meeting these special demands render it improbable that there will be in future a recurrence of delay from ships being in advance of their gun-mountings.

Delays in delivery of guns by the War Office have also affected the completion of some ships.

Contract Work, 1886-87.

The work on new ships building by contract has been pushed forward with great rapidity, and the sums earned have exceeded those provided in the Estimates for 1886-87.

During the financial year there have been delivered:—

6 torpedo cruisers ("Archer" class).

1 torpedo cruiser ("Fearless").

4 composite gun-boats ("Rattler" class).

Four out of the five belted cruisers have been launched, and the fifth is to be launched on the 10th March. It is anticipated that the first of these vessels will be delivered early in 1887-88, and that all of them will be in the dockyards next summer, and it is hoped that they will all be completed by April, 1888.

The "Renown" and "Sanspareil" are also advancing rapidly. The former is to be launched in April, and the latter in May, 1887, two years from the date of signing the contract.

The "Benbow" has been delivered by the contractors, has made her steam trials, and is now being completed at Chatham.

The six torpedo cruisers of the "Archer" class recently delivered have given some trouble in their preliminary steam-trials, and their completion has consequently been delayed. It is hoped, however, that two of them will be practically completed this financial year, and the others advanced. It may be anticipated that their speed on the measured mile will be 17 knots.

The "Fearless," sister ship to the "Scout," was delayed by a fire at the contractor's premises, otherwise she would have been completed this financial year.

Torpedo Flotilla.

Passing to the smaller vessels of the torpedo flotilla, the "Rattlesnake" has been delivered and tried, attaining a speed of 19½ knots, the estimated speed being 19 knots. It is probable that by changes in propellers a better performance will be obtained.

This vessel is the first of the "torpedo gun-boat" class. She was practically completed at the works of the contractors, and will speedily be ready for her sea trials, which will furnish very important information.

Now that her machinery trials are over, the other three vessels of the class building in the dockyards will be pushed on.

Experimental Trials of New Ships, 1886-87.

During 1886-87 the sea trials of two important armoured ships, the "Colossus" and "Impérieuse," have been made. In the "Colossus" very few alterations have been suggested as the result of experience at sea. In the "Impérieuse," and following her, in the "Warspite," it has been decided to abolish the sails, and to depend entirely upon steam-power applied to twin screws.

With the important exception of being more deeply immersed than was anticipated, the "Impérieuse" in her trials fully realized the expectations of her design. Notwithstanding her deep draught, she is now, taking the essentials of speed, armament, and armour into consideration, if not actually the most powerful, one of the most powerful iron-clad cruisers afloat of her tonnage.

Sails have also been removed from the "Neptune" during her present refit, in order to increase her efficiency as a fighting machine.

The protected cruiser "Mersey" has been completed and sent on experimental service to test systems of submarine torpedo discharge. Her steam trials, and those of her sister vessels, "Severn" and "Thames," have shown the class to possess a smooth-water maximum speed of 18 knots.

The first of the torpedo cruiser class, the "Scout," has also been completed and commissioned in 1886-87, as well as the torpedo gun-vessels "Curlew" and "Landrail." Both of these represent new classes in the Navy.

TRIALS OF TORPEDO-BOATS.

Some interesting trials have been made during 1886-87 with the various types of first-class torpedo-boats 125 feet in length. These trials led to a modification in the form of the bow and in the torpedo armament of twenty-five of the boats. Great exertions have been made to accelerate the completion of the boats, the work on the torpedo fittings being of a novel and delicate nature, and only twenty will, it is anticipated, be incomplete in small fittings at the end of March, the torpedo armaments of these being finished.

The 150-foot boat purchased of Mr. White is practically completed, and the 130-foot boat, by Messrs. Yarrow, will be delivered in 1886-87. These examples of larger-dimensioned boats will furnish useful information when tried at sea, as to how far they will comply with the conditions of a sea-going torpedo-boat available for use in all weathers.

DECISION OF THE BOARD UPON SEA-GOING TORPEDO-VESSELS AND SECOND-CLASS TORPEDO-BOATS.

The Board have carefully considered the types and dimensions of the torpedo-boats, which experience and experiment have shown to be best adapted for sea-service or harbour-defence. The practical tests during recent evolutions imposed upon first-class torpedo-boats, that is, boats intended for open-sea service, and upwards of 100 feet in length, have shown that they could not, in actual warfare, stand the strain of the daily wear and tear to which they might be exposed. The discomfort and hardships which their crews have to endure in rough weather, the loss of speed to which, after steaming a certain number of hours at full pressure, they are subject, owing to the tendency of their necessarily-contracted boiler tubes to choke, disqualify boats of these dimensions from taking the prominent part in warfare in the open sea which their adherents claimed for them. The Board have therefore decided in future to build for sea-going purposes vessels of larger dimensions, capable of acting both on the offensive and defensive in torpedo warfare in the open sea. These vessels to be of the "Rattlesnake" type, capable of maintaining for many hours the initial speed of the ordinary torpedo-boat, armed with quick-firing guns, and another gun of a larger calibre, and affording adequate accommodation and protection to the complement they carry for sea-going purposes.

The Board have decided upon adopting a new type of second-class torpedo-boat, capable of being lifted on board ships of a certain displacement, and which would be carried by the ship for service in the place of the larger or first-class torpedo-boats which now are supposed to accompany a squadron.

The 125-foot torpedo-boats now building or built have, in most instances, been allotted to the defence of the great military ports and coaling stations, where they will remain.

Two improved boats of the second-class have been ordered from Messrs. Yarrow, and are to be completed in a short time.

Important experiments have also been undertaken with a view to determine the most suitable torpedo-armament for boats.

DEFENCE AGAINST TORPEDOES.

During 1886-87, great attention has been given to the development of defence against torpedo attack. A Committee has been investigating net-defences; several of our battle ships are already fitted with this system of torpedo defence, and further experimental fittings are being tried on the "Hercules" and "Collingwood."

The torpedo experiments on the "Resistance" have also afforded valuable information as to the explosive power of the torpedo.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING.

Electric lighting, for search-lights and internal illumination, has also been greatly extended. A staff of skilled supervisors and fitters for electrical work has been organized in each dockyard.

PROGRESS IN SHIPBUILDING IN 1887-88.

The coming financial year will be very remarkable for the great number of ships which will be completed and added to the effective list. It may be anticipated that the following ships will be finished, and passed into the 1st Reserve, as ready for commission:—

Armoured ships	10
3 of "Admiral" class—"Rodney," "Howe," "Benbow."
"Warspite"
"Hero."
5 belted cruisers (contract-built)
Protected ships	2
"Severn."
"Thames."
Torpedo cruisers	7
6 of "Archer" class.
"Fearless."
Torpedo gun-boats ("Rattlesnake" class)	3
Composite sloops & gun-boats ("Buzzard" & "Rattler" classes)	3
	<hr/>
	25

At the end of 1887-88, another armoured ship, the "Camperdown," will be nearly finished, and so will be the protected cruiser "Forth." The "Anson" will be approaching completion.

The belted cruisers "Immortalité" and "Aurora" will be far advanced; the "Trafalgar" and "Nile" will be the great causes of further liability.

The "Renown" and "Sanspareil" are to be delivered, according to contract, in October, 1888, and if no unforeseen hindrances arise, there is good reason to believe this date will be kept.

Out of thirty-seven ships, building or incomplete, at the commencement of 1887-88, it is hoped twenty-six will be complete by the end of the year, leaving only nine out of the programme of 1885, and two other ships not belonging to this programme, to be finished in subsequent years.

NEW SHIPS TO BE LAID DOWN IN 1887-88.

The new programme of works proposed for 1887-88 includes the following:—

20-knot steel-bottomed protected cruisers, at Chatham ..	2
19½-knot copper-bottomed protected cruisers, 2 by contract and
1 at Portsmouth	3
Composite sloop ("Buzzard")	1
Composite gun-boats (improved "Rattlers")	6
"Grasshopper" class	1
	<hr/>
	13

Of the "Rattlers" it need merely be said that they differ from the "Rattler" herself only in having a poop, being about 1 foot broader, and of about 40 tons greater displacement. The steam trials of "Rattler" and "Wasp" have been very satisfactory, speeds of $13\frac{1}{4}$ to $13\frac{3}{4}$ knots having been attained.

The new "Buzzards" are "repeats" of the "Buzzard" now building at Sheerness—speed on the measured mile, 15 knots.

Both the "Rattlers" and "Buzzards" have a fair amount of sail, and coppered bottoms. Rattlers have single screws; Buzzards twin screws.

To the ships included in the above programme should be added the "Daphne," composite sloop of the "Buzzard" class, which, although not forming part of the programme in the Estimates of 1886-87, has been already commenced at Sheerness. The preparations made in 1886-87, though involving small expense, will enable the work to be pushed on rapidly in 1887-88.

POLICY TO BE PURSUED IN REGARD TO SMALL VESSELS.

These gun-boats and sloops have been laid down to make provision for the relief of small vessels on different stations during the next two years. A careful inquiry into the composition of our squadrons abroad has made clear that too large a proportion of our naval strength is absorbed by small vessels, which, however well adapted for police purposes in time of peace, or for operations in shoal water and rivers in time of war, would be of comparatively little value for the protection of our commerce on the high seas in time of war. I believe that, in course of time, arrangements can be contrived with the Foreign and Colonial Offices by which a limited number of larger and more powerful vessels, moving from place to place on the station, can be made to efficiently perform the work of the more numerous but less movable flotilla now employed. All the vessels now laid down have a speed equal to, if not in excess of, any of their class elsewhere, and will therefore be a match for anything of like displacement which they might encounter, and the new 20-knot protected cruisers about to be commenced will be faster than any ocean war cruisers in the world at present completed, and, consequently, of the highest possible value for the protection of our commerce.

DESCRIPTION OF 20-KNOT PROTECTED CRUISERS.

The most notable vessels proposed to be laid down in 1887-88 are two 20-knot protected cruisers.

Their dimensions are:—

Length	265 feet.
Breadth	41 "
Displacement	2,800 tons.
Sped on measured mile, with 400 tons of coal, and fully equipped	20 knots.
Ocean speed	17 to 18 "
Radius of action at 10-knot speed	8,000 "

The vessels will have a protective steel-deck extending from stem to stern, and sheltering the boilers, magazines, steering-gear, &c.

Vertical (inverted-cylinder) triple-expansion engines are to be fitted in the steel-bottomed ships, special arrangements of armoured-coamings being built for the protection of that portion of the cylinders.

Above the protective steel-deck the space will be minutely sub-divided, coal-bunkers, coffer-dams, &c., being built as is usual in vessels of the "protected" class.

A double-bottom on the cellular principle, adapted for water-ballast, will be fitted.

The armament will include—

6 6-in. B.L.R. guns on centre-pivot mountings.

2 6-pr. rapid-firing guns.

Machine-guns.

6 Torpedo-tubes (all under cover).

The bow will be strengthened for ramming in the usual manner.

In all respects the vessels will be made suitable for independent sea-service, and for being driven at high speed in rough water.

They will have only fore and aft steadying sails, being dependent upon their steam-power and twin-screws for propulsion.

THREE COPPER-SHEATHED 19½-KNOT CRUISERS.

It has been decided to vary the design in three of the vessels in the following particulars:—

1. To wood-sheathe and copper the bottoms, so as to make the vessels capable of remaining afloat for long periods without serious fouling and consequent loss of speed.

2. To adopt horizontal engines, placed entirely below the protective deck.

These changes involve an increase in displacement and a slight decrease in maximum speed which are accepted in view of the special services for which the vessels are intended.

In armament, protection, and all other qualities, the conditions are the same in these as in the steel-bottomed ships.

The trials of these vessels will be made under the new regulations, with all weights aboard.

CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH SPEED TRIALS OF VESSELS ARE CONDUCTED.

The speed and other trials of the ships recently built, together with the working of their engines and hydraulic mountings, have on the whole been satisfactory. In most instances the anticipations of the Constructors have been realized, although difficulties have occurred in some of the earlier trials in obtaining from certain of the engines the speed of the contract. In one important particular there is a discrepancy between the estimate of the original design and its result, which, in the case of the "Impérieuse," and her sister-vessel, the "Warspite," attracted some attention, and which is likely to recur in the case of the belted cruisers, seven in number, the "Warspite," and the armoured vessels of the "Admiral" class.

The following statement, though referring to the belted cruisers alone, is typical of all the vessels whose draught is deeper than was designed; and it will also record the Regulations as to design and trial which the present Board have made. (See Appendix I.)

The designs for the belted cruisers were prepared in 1884, and the sketch design received the final approval of the Board of Admiralty during that year.

It was intended that, with all their legend weights on board, they should have a mean draught of 21 feet, and that 18 inches of the armour belt, which is 5 ft. 6 in. in width, should be above water.

After the designs were approved, tenders for the construction of five vessels were invited. Some of these tenders provided for the substitution of triple expansion engines of 8,500 horse-power in place of the compound engines of 7,500 horse-power originally contemplated, and the advantages of the offer were so manifest that it was decided to adopt this type of engine for all five ships.

To compensate for the increased weight entailed by these engines, and in view of the economy in fuel that would result from their adoption, it was decided to reduce the legend weight of coals to be carried by 60 tons; this placed the legend weight of coals at 440 tons, in place of the 500 tons originally approved.

The extra weight of the engines, of increased complements, and of armament, amounting in all to 186 tons, increased the draught of the ships by 7 inches, placing the top of the belt 11 inches out of the water.

It appears to have been decided, although the bunkers of these ships were constructed to hold 900 tons of coal, that 500 tons (afterwards decreased to 440 tons) should be taken as the amount they were to carry under ordinary conditions—in other words, as their normal supply of fuel.

It was calculated that this amount of coals would carry the ships about 4,500 knots at 10 knots an hour, and with this the Board of Admiralty at that time appear to have been satisfied.

The present Board, however, are of opinion that it is far preferable that ships should carry to sea with them the largest amount of coal they are able to carry.

If the whole of the 900 tons, with the additional weights alluded to, be placed on board, instead of 440 tons, the top of the belt will be, on the ships first going to sea, 6 inches below the water.

Thus, although the position of the belt may have been correctly calculated for the weight of coals it was at the time decided to carry, and which was adopted as their deliberate policy by the then Board of Admiralty, the same is undesirably low if coals to the full stowage (which is the policy of the present Board) are put on board.

Though the policy which placed the position of the belt so low does not commend itself to the present Board, it is right to say that some claim for it certain compensating advantages, their contention being—

(1.) That there would be above the armour belt, running along 140 feet of its length, when the full fuel supply is on board, a coal protection of $6\frac{1}{2}$ feet in height and of 11 to 17 feet in depth.

(2.) That the coal protection would not be disturbed until, by the consumption of coal in the lower bunkers, the ship had lightened, and the armour belt had risen above water.

(3.) That a shot, which during a roll might have struck below the belt, would, in its present lower position, be deflected.

From the only trial under steam which has yet taken place with one of these vessels, there is every reason to believe that the speed for which they were intended will be attained, with the ships fully equipped and the bunkers full.

LEGEND WEIGHTS.

The principle adopted by successive Boards of Admiralty since 1870 of selecting as their legend weight of coal, in new ships that they proposed to build, an amount considerably less than that which the bunkers were constructed to carry, originated when compound engines began to be used in Her Majesty's ships.

The substitution of improved engines for the older types effected such an economy of fuel in relation to the engine-power developed, that a very much less quantity would carry a ship so fitted the same distance as a ship of identical form and size with the simple engines previously in use.

This seems to have influenced the Admiralty to accept, when designing new ships, as the legend weight of fuel, a quantity which gave as great a radius of action which was possessed by earlier ships, though it was at the same time decided to provide for exceptional conditions by the construction of reserve bunkers.

EXPLANATION OF DIFFERENCE IN DRAUGHT AND OF NEW REGULATIONS.

The difference, therefore, between the draught of the vessels enumerated, with their coal-bunkers full, and with all weights on board, and that contemplated in their original design, arises from two causes:—

1. Because it had been the practice that only a portion of the coal the vessel is capable of carrying should be on board at the time of her speed-trials. The present Board disapprove of this practice as misleading. The vessel in question ("Impérieuse") was officially stated to be capable of either steaming 2,000 knots at a rate of 17 knots per hour, or 8,000 knots at a lower speed. If all the coal were on board necessary to give the coal endurance for the longer distance, the higher speed could not be attained; if the coal were reduced to allow of the higher speed, the longer distance could not be covered. Directions have been given by which, in future, speed-trials will be for twenty-four hours with all weights aboard, in addition to the present trials of six hours with reduced weights.

2. The other reason for increase of weight is that, at the time the design was passed, sufficient allowance was not made for the number of complement, weight of guns, machinery, and engines. If fuller consultation had taken place between the designer and the officers responsible for these weights and details before the ship was laid down a more accurate estimate could have been made, and the extra weights afterwards found necessary would have been anticipated. Regulations ensuring this co-operation have now been made, and will be found in Appendix I. attached.

SUMMARY OF INCREASE TO FLEET, 1886-87 TO 1887-88.

The number of vessels added during 1886-87, and the contemplated increase during 1887-88, are given in the following Table:—

Cost of Ship or Vessel.	1886-87.		1887-88.		Total.
	Number.	Tons.*	Number.	Tons.*	Number.	Tons.*
Armoured ships	3	25,690	10	67,990	13	93,680
Protected ships	1	3,650	2	7,100	3	10,650
Partially protected ships..	3	11,250	3	11,250
Unprotected ships.. .. .	16†	16,130	13	14,980	29	31,110
Total	23	56,620	25	90,070	48	146,690

This addition to our Fleet is abnormally great; but the Fleet previous to this increase was abnormally weak. Having therefore brought up our naval strength, so far as iron-clads and cruisers are concerned, to what is generally admitted to be requisite, we have next to consider the annual expenditure (for depreciation or wastage) necessary for the maintenance of the Fleet in that state of efficiency.

VALUE OF FLEET AND ESTIMATE OF ANNUAL EXPENDITURE NECESSARY FOR REPLACEMENT.

The administration of the Navy cannot be satisfactory unless the approximate wastage or depreciation is so ascertained, as to afford reliable data upon which to predicate the extent of shipbuilding requisite in each year to maintain the Fleet at its present authorized strength. The advantages of such a knowledge, and of basing a continuous naval policy thereon, are manifest.

One obstacle to securing economical results from the dockyards has been the spasmodic action in regard to the extent of new work. The Controller of the Navy, as a great employer of labour, has, in consequence, been unable satisfactorily to regulate the employment of men and the distribution of work to the different trades. If the extent of tonnage to be laid down at each yard from year to year were known with any degree of accuracy, the necessary men of the several trades connected with shipbuilding could be employed, and the vessels could be commenced, in such rotation, and at such intervals, as would permit the men of a certain trade to move from ship to ship, as their particular description of work was completed.

The Table in the Appendix to the Navy Estimates which gives the cost and date of completion of each vessel affords a basis upon which to calculate the approximate annual percentage of depreciation on the value of the Fleet arising from decay or supersession, the latter being a most important factor.

* Load displacement.

† Includes "Hearty" (1,300 tons), "Jackal" (750 tons), and "Bann" (250 tons).

It must be kept clearly in mind that this Table is drawn up so as to indicate the year of COMPLETION of each ship, and her cost is placed under that year, and is not distributed under the years in which the expenditure, as it progressed, was provided. This arrangement is necessary for the purpose of arriving at a proper conclusion, because a vessel cannot, as a rule, be regarded as subject to depreciation until she is complete for service. In calculating the depreciation, and the period for which it ought to be charged, regard must also be had to the value remaining in the vessel after the expiry of the given number of years of her probable life. Whenever a vessel is sold, her realized value should, therefore, be credited to Navy Votes in aid of new construction, in order to carry out the principle here advocated.

Subject to the foregoing considerations, the following is a reasonable scale upon which to fix the annual depreciation for the different classes of vessels which form the Fleet, and to provide the minimum sum which should be invested annually in the production of new tonnage, viz. :—

1. On armoured, protected, and partially-protected iron or steel vessels, for twenty-two years from date of completion, 4 per cent.
2. On corvettes, sloops, torpedo-cruisers, gun-vessels, gun-boats, troop-ships, and other vessels, for fifteen years, 6 per cent.
3. On torpedo-boats, steam launches, &c., for eleven years, 9 per cent.
4. On small vessels, tugs, and yard craft, for eighteen years, 5 per cent.
5. On guard, receiving, training, and harbour vessels, for twenty-two years, 4 per cent.

An element in determining the amount upon which depreciation ought to be calculated is the normal standard of strength at which the Navy is to be maintained. The leading feature adopted in the following Table is the special programme decided upon by Lord Northbrook in 1884, as sanctioned by Parliament, and his ordinary programme for the year 1885-86. These were framed on the proposition that the Navy was then much below the requisite strength, having regard to the protection of British interests. Therefore, in ascertaining the capital cost of the Fleet on the 31st March, 1887, all the vessels completing, which were commenced by Lord Northbrook, are regarded, so far as depreciation for replacement is concerned, as if finished on that day. The "Nile" and "Trafalgar" are, however, excluded, as their completion is somewhat remote, and the expenditure upon them may be viewed as a part of the ordinary charges for shipbuilding required in subsequent years. These propositions appear the more reasonable as no new vessels were laid down in 1886-87, thus assisting more clearly to draw a line between expenditure to make up prior deficiencies, and that necessary to maintain the agreed standard of efficiency.

Following the foregoing line of argument, and applying it to the cost of the Fleet, the following approximate results are obtained:—

	£	£
1. Armoured, protected, and partially protected iron or steel ships—
At present on strength of the Navy, at first cost ..	19,417,000
Add cost of new ships not yet completed—
Expenditure to March 31, 1887 (probable actual) ..	6,240,000
Remaining to complete (estimated) ..	2,248,000
Total	27,905,000
Deduct—
Cost of ships completed prior to 1865-66 ..	378,000
*Estimated value of gun-mountings, &c., included in above figures ..	1,300,000
	1,678,000
Net total capital cost of armoured, &c., ships necessary to maintain the Fleet at normal strength	26,227,000
Proposed annual depreciation for replacement, say at 4 per cent. per annum on £26,227,000	1,049,600
2. Corvettes, sloops, torpedo-cruisers, gun-vessels, gun-boats, troop-ships, and other vessels—
At present on strength of the Navy, at first cost ..	7,386,000
Add cost of new ships not yet completed—
Expenditure to March 31, 1887 (probable actual) ..	587,000
Remaining to complete (estimated) ..	443,000
Total	8,416,000
Deduct—
Cost of ships completed prior to 1872-73 ..	1,572,000
*Estimated value of gun-mountings, &c., included in above figures ..	200,000
	1,772,000
Net total capital cost of corvettes, &c., necessary to maintain the Fleet at its authorized strength ..	6,644,000
Proposed annual depreciation for replacement, say at 6 per cent. per annum on £6,644,000	399,000
3. Torpedo boats, steam launches, &c.—
At present on strength of Navy, at estimated first cost ..	1,500,000

* Gun-mountings, &c., are excluded from the above calculations, as provision has only of late years been taken for the greater part of them in the Navy Estimates, and is voted separately. If the cost is in future included in the cost of the ship, depreciation should be calculated thereon at the same rate as on the ship.

	£	£
Proposed annual depreciation for replacement, say at 9 per cent. per annum on £1,500,000	135,000
4. Small vessels, dockyard tugs, tanks, &c.—
At present in the Service, at first cost	448,000
Deduct cost of vessels completed prior to 1869-70	262,000
Net total capital cost of small vessels, tugs, &c., necessary to be maintained	246,000
Proposed annual depreciation for replacement, say at 5 per annum on £246,000	12,000
5. Receiving, training, guard, and harbour ships, &c.—
At present in the Service, at first cost	3,270,000
Deduct cost of vessels built prior to 1865-66	2,963,000
Net total capital cost of vessels built since 1865-66	307,000
Proposed annual depreciation for replacement, say at 4 per cent. per annum on £307,000	12,000
6. First cost of ships completed since the commencement of the periods referred to for the several classes, which are at present laid up as obsolete, or for sale,* also of ships completed within those periods (excluding the older types of armour-clads of wooden construction), which have been sold, lost, or otherwise disposed of	4,359,000
Proposed annual depreciation for replacement as if these ships still formed part of the strength of the Navy, say at an average of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum on £4,359,000	196,000
GRAND TOTAL (ANNUAL DEPRECIATION FOR REPLACEMENT BY NEW CONSTRUCTION)	1,803,000

That this estimate of £1,803,000 as the minimum amount of new construction (exclusive of gun-mounting and special fittings) required to meet the annual depreciation or wastage of the Navy is fair and reasonable is confirmed by an examination of the data given in the Appendix before referred to.

The aggregate expenditure on vessels added to the Navy from 1865-66, and upon those now in course of construction in completion of Lord Northbrook's programme, on which £1,186,000 remains to be expended, is £39,119,100, or an average of £1,778,000 per annum expended on new construction. This is exclusive of the cost of gun-mountings, &c., and of all expenditure upon the "Nile" and "Trafalgar," which, although included in Lord Northbrook's programme, have, for reasons already explained, been omitted from the preceding calculations.

In many of the years preceding the adoption of Lord Northbrook's special programme in 1884, the rate of construction was much below this average; consequently, provision to meet these deficits has mainly fallen upon the Estimates of the three succeeding years.†

The Estimates for 1887-88 include the sum of £997,000 to be expended on account of the special programme undertaken, as already stated, to place the Fleet in a normal condition of strength, leaving a balance to be met in future years of £217,000. These sums will be thrown upon the taxpayer in excess of the amounts they would have been called upon to bear had previous Administra-

* Of the vessels built during the period of this Return, a number have already been sold, lost, or laid aside as obsolete, not being worth the cost of alteration to suit modern requirements in regard to speed, armament, &c. In order, however, that the Depreciation Fund may be adequate to maintain the normal strength of the Navy, the amounts expended on construction of such vessel must also carry a depreciation for the period set out in these Tables, even if, owing to exceptional circumstances, the vessels have been prematurely removed from the list.

† See page 5.

tions provided year by year all that was needed. The contemplated expenditure upon new vessels (including the "Nile" and "Trafalgar," but excluding £396,000 for gun-mountings, &c.); beyond the sum of £997,000, amounts to £1,665,000, or £138,000 less than the annual requirement to meet wastage, as already explained.

Considerations such as these prompted me last year to propose in Parliament that a certain portion of this exceptional expenditure should be converted into a terminable annuity, and spread over a period of years to afford some immediate relief to the taxpayer. The suggestion was not favourably received, the arguments directed against it being that during peace the income of each individual year must bear its own burden of expenditure. If this contention be sound, that no year is to be relieved of any portion of the expenditure properly debited against it, then Parliament, by enactment or otherwise, should insure the reverse of that proposition, that no year is to escape its fair annual share of the depreciation fund necessary to keep our Navy efficient. If this depreciation and wastage fund be fixed at the figure which, on the most careful analysis, is found to be by actuarial calculation necessary, and legally forms part of the annual charge upon the Exchequer, it would not be possible, hereafter, for the national capital invested in war ships to be deliberately reduced by a misappropriation or abandonment of the annual expenditure necessary to replenish it. A continuous and economical and efficient shipbuilding policy would be possible, and the waste and discredit, occasioned by periodical scares, would be avoided.

DOCKYARD ADMINISTRATION.

The alterations commenced in 1885 for the purpose of securing a more efficient management and control over the employment of labour and the appropriation of material in the yards have worked well, and have more than justified the anticipations formed of their ultimate utility. The appointment of a Director of Dockyards has strengthened from an executive, and that of an Inspector of Yard Accounts from a financial point of view, the control of the Admiralty over dockyard business and expenditure. Simultaneously with the creation of these offices, a system of improved local management has been inaugurated, whereby the Admiral Superintendents have been furnished with competent professional assistance in the management of the Dockyards. Arrangements have been made by which the professional officers are enabled to obtain rapidly, and, if necessary, direct from the contractors, the supplies they may require, and they will be made responsible for proper check and account of the outlay incurred under their superintendence. An improved and more accurate form of estimating repairs has been instituted, facilitating a detailed check over this class of expenditure. Substantial savings have been made in this annual outlay. Steps have been taken whereby the incidental expenditure, at one time forming almost a third of the outlay of the yards, will be regulated and classified; numerous obsolete but expensive Returns have been abolished, and an inquiry into the number of the clerical staff and those employed in writing duties has been instituted, which should lead to a considerable reduction of the present establishment. In the meantime, I have given directions that no vacancies in the Admiralty and dockyard clerical staffs should be filled, as there is reason to believe both are redundant.

In the course of these inquiries it has been made clear that the number of workmen in the various yards are in excess of the work to be performed. The Board have therefore commenced to bring down the establishments to the necessary level; it is, however, satisfactory to know that though the number of employes has diminished, the output of work per man has increased, and the demand for, and consumption of, material used in proportion to the men employed, is on the increase.

COST OF REPAIRS OF SHIPS.

A considerable proportion of dockyard expenditure is absorbed in the periodical repairs of vessels in commission. A close scrutiny of the list of defects sent in by officers commanding ships, and forwarded for sanction to the Admiralty, showed that a certain amount of the work proposed to be done in the dockyards might have been performed by the carpenters and artificers forming part of the complement of the ship. In other cases, sufficient care had not been exercised in criticizing the list of defects before being sent to the Admiral Superintendent. The attention of officers has been directed to this practice by a Circular dealing specially with this subject, and which will be found in Appendix II.

YARD ESTABLISHMENTS.

At the close of the financial year 1887-88 the liabilities outstanding on new construction will be small compared to those of recent years. Careful prevision will, therefore, be necessary as regards the programme of work for 1888-89 and subsequent years, and arrangements will be made to utilize, as far as is possible, the existing dockyard establishment, though the cessation of the building of armoured and protected vessels of large displacement will necessitate some ultimate reductions. Provision in the present Estimates is made for fifty-three instead of fifty-two weekly payments to all employes in receipt of weekly wages, as within the 366 days of the financial year such a number of weekly payments become due.

NEW WORKS, &c.

Upon the average annual sums hitherto expended for the maintenance and extension of the buildings, basins, and graving docks of the home and foreign dockyards, a considerable reduction has been effected this year, the object of the Board being to secure the thorough utilization of all existing buildings before giving their sanction to an enlargement of the present accommodation.

GRAVING DOCKS ABROAD.

The policy of subsidizing Companies to build docks abroad capable of taking in and repairing men-of-war of large dimensions has been favoured of late years by successive Boards of Admiralty, and considerable sums have in this manner been spent in past years. The dock at Esquimalt, thus assisted, will this year be open and ready for use; at Hong Kong the final instalment for a similar purpose will this year be paid; and at Halifax arrangements have been made by which it is hoped like advantages will hereafter accrue, on the completion of the dock.

The multiplication of graving docks in colonial territory in different parts of the world will greatly advantage the ships of the Navy, as it facilitates the execution of repairs and cleaning, which, if undone, might incapacitate a man-of-war from active service.

The conditions under which Government assistance towards the construction of docks is given is that, when constructed, payment shall only be made for services of work rendered.

NAVAL ORDNANCE.

There is a large increase in that portion of the Estimates taken by the Army for the supply of Naval Ordnance for 1887-88. This is attributable to a necessary provision of ammunition for quick-firing guns, being £313,429 as against £42,150* in the approved Estimate of 1886-87. This increase is mainly due to the provision of ammunition for quick-firing guns being reduced in last year's Estimates. By the postponement of this liability from last year the Navy has been compelled to make inconvenient demands this year upon Army Estimates, it being impossible to allow a large number of guns provided to be useless for want of ammunition; a large increase in the expenditure upon Naval Ordnance, and a consequent advance in the requirements of the Navy have, in the last two years, taken place, and the naval armaments of this country now compare very favourably with those of foreign countries. Until 1880 the muzzle-loaders of the British Navy were about equal in accuracy and penetration to breech-loading guns of foreign nations. Since then the development of slow-burning powder has necessitated the production of a breech-loader different in shape from, and far superior in the high velocity it imparts to the old breech-loader. The only breech-loaders in the British Service, with the exception of a few 40 and 20-prs., are of the most modern type; the great bulk of the breech-loaders in foreign Service are of the older type, and fairly comparable to the old muzzle-loader of similar calibre.

The Table attached shows the yearly increase since 1886 in modern breech-loaders and quick-firing guns, and torpedoes available for service:—

Date.			B.L. Guns.	6-pr. Q.F.G.	3-pr. Q.F.G.	Torpedoes.
April, 1886	711	1,224
„ 1887	1,019	315	298	1,514
„ 1888	1,281	342	448	1,818

The question of transferring the cost of providing naval armaments from Army to Navy Votes has occupied the serious attention of both Departments during the past year. A Committee of the officers of both Departments carefully considered the bases of a transfer. Every information and assistance was given to the Admiralty by the War Office with the object of facilitating such a change. So extensive a transfer involving the annual expenditure of upwards of a million and a-half of money ought not, in our opinion, to be made until the machinery for the administration and control of this outlay are so perfected at the Admiralty as to enable the assumption of this responsibility to be discharged without effect and without increased charge. To place one Government Department towards another in the relation of purchaser and manufacturer is no easy matter. The proportion of establishment charges to be added to the cost of labour and material on different articles of manufacture varied from 10 to 40 per cent., according to the class of work performed. Any mistake in fixing prices between Woolwich and the Admiralty would affect all contract work done elsewhere, as Woolwich prices regulate the price of gun manufacture in this country. Further difficulties also arose in reference to the storage, issue, and testing of the stores proposed to be transferred. For these reasons we pressed upon the War Office the desirability of postponing the proposed change, until sufficient time had been afforded for the full consideration of the many complex details involved in this question.

PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY.

The reports of the efficiency of officers and men are satisfactory. The number of Courts-martial has diminished, whilst the amounts deposited and number of depositors in savings-banks have increased. The health and physique

* A further sum of £100,000 for this service has been taken in the Supplementary Army Estimates, 1886-87.

of the men have improved. By the Return of the wastage of men (blue-jackets, 19,000 in number), we find during the last four years a continuous decrease in the annual waste:—

1882-83	2,446
1883-84	2,368
1884-85	2,062
1885-86	1,942

This diminished waste has upset the previously-accepted calculations, by which provision, through the entry of a certain number of boys, in the training-ships, is made to keep the number of seamen up to the authorized strength. There is a certain excess over that number, but steps have been taken to reduce the number of boys entered for training.

The Navy now seems to be a very popular Service. A high standard and restrictions on number of entries have been imposed to prevent an undue influx of boys, but the competition is, notwithstanding, considerable. It is worthy of note that, simultaneously with the growing popularity of the Navy with parents as a career for their sons, there is a dread of dismissal from the Service which previously did not exist. Mutilations and misconduct not unfrequently in the past were deliberately adopted for the purpose of insuring dismissal, whereas the present tendency is in the opposite direction.

During the last ten years, owing to the multiplication of engines and machinery in ships, a large increase has taken place in the artificer, engine-room, and stoker complements. Comparing the year 1876 with 1886, it will be found that the combatant class has decreased, so that the proportion of non-combatants to combatants is much larger than before:—

	1876.	1886.	Difference.
Officers, executive ..	2,300	2,120	— 180
„ non-executive ..	1,965	1,718	— 237
Warrant officers ..	903	952	+ 49
Blue-jackets ..	19,586	18,667	— 919
Artificers* ..	2,420	2,669	+ 249
Engine-room staff ..	4,279	6,983	+ 2,704
Others † ..	4,474	5,269	+ 795

Steps have, therefore, been taken to have all stokers trained to the use of arms, the same reward being held out to them to become trained men as had been given to seamen and marines; arrangements have also been made to substitute marines for the civilian butchers, barbers, and lamp-trimmers now afloat; this will entail an increase of marines corresponding to the number of men they replace.

EDUCATION OF EXECUTIVE OFFICERS.

The Report of the Committee on Education has been considered, but not accepted in its entirety. The age for entry in the “Britannia” has been advanced six months, and in a year's time will be advanced six months more.

A Council of Education has been instituted to consider certain questions connected with this subject, and to recommend necessary alterations from time to time. It is intended to revise the seamanship examination, to bring it in accordance with the requirements of the present day, and to lay more stress on the acquirement of a knowledge of steam machinery, and of French and other modern languages. The education and training of a young officer lasts from his entrance into the “Britannia” to his passing out of the College at Greenwich, an interval on the average of about seven and a-half years. During a large proportion of that time he is afloat, discharging responsible duties. The desire of the Board has been to insure, as far as is possible, continuity of instruction and training during the whole of this period, so that at no time it may be necessary for an officer to relearn that which he had acquired and forgotten.

* In 1876 blue-jacket class included 500 masters-at-arms and ships' corporals, now included among “Others.”

† Masters-at-arms, ships' corporals, stewards and cooks, writers, sick-bellmen, &c.

An improved curriculum of study and practical work has been passed for the Engineer Students at Portsmouth and Devonport.

NAVAL RESERVES.

The Regulations both for officers and men of the Royal Naval Reserve have been revised and consolidated. Provision has been made for bringing the Royal Naval Reserve into closer association with the Service by allowing officers and men to volunteer for service in the Navy, either in sea-going ships or for a course of instruction in the Gunnery and Torpedo Schools. The officers who undergo a year's training in a sea-going ship are to receive, while they remain on the Active List, an annual retaining fee of £20 to £25 a-year. Both officers and men are showing readiness to avail themselves of these opportunities, and in order to facilitate their doing so, it has been arranged that the Sub-Lieutenants, Royal Naval Reserve, who are of a certain age, shall, in order to enable them to mess with officers of similar age, be granted the temporary rank of Acting Lieutenant.

An important alteration in the Regulations has been introduced, by which men can, in time of emergency, be allowed to volunteer for service without being called out by Royal Proclamation.

The enrolment of stokers for the Royal Naval Reserve has not hitherto proved so successful as was anticipated, but this was owing, probably, to insufficient advertisement of the new scheme.

Some alteration in the Regulations, combined with a fuller knowledge of the advantages held out, will, it is believed, lead to a great increase in the number of firemen coming forward to enter the Reserve, especially under the stimulating influence of the arrangements recently made with the White Star and Cunard Companies.

DEVELOPMENT OF INTELLIGENCE DEPARTMENT.

Although many of the component and complementary parts of the Navy are in themselves satisfactory, it has long been felt by naval men of experience and foresight that in the event of war, unless an improved system of co-operation and preparation were devised, the nation would not obtain, in the earlier stages of such a contest, the full advantage of its great naval resources. This opinion was confirmed by the experience of 1885. Confidential reports of what then occurred proved that our power of naval mobilization was most defective. A rapid concentration of strength, and an immediate and effective use of the force thus brought together, have in recent years decided within a few weeks of the outbreak of war the ultimate issue of that war.

Important as it may be for a great military nation to be thoroughly prepared for possible contingencies, the necessity for thorough preparation is even more incumbent upon a Power that is supreme at sea.

A mobilization of land forces is local and territorial in its operation; the mobilization of naval resources must be concentrated at a few naval arsenals capable of fitting out and commissioning the ships of which they are the complement. A great Naval Power has no frontier; the limits of its operations are confined by the ocean alone, and the plan of campaign or of operations which it may have to carry out would differ in every quarter of the globe, according to the strength and geographical position of the enemy against which it was contending. On land, the plan of campaign or strategy to be adopted is regulated by the physical conditions of the country, which do not change, and by the fighting strength of a population, which does not shift. All well-organized Military Powers have derived infinite advantages from a properly-constituted Intelligence Department; but the need, as I have shown, for such an organization, is greater for naval than military purposes. This country has the largest fleet afloat, yet hitherto it had no central organization by which that fleet could be thoroughly utilized in emergency.

The Board therefore determined to enlarge and extend the functions of the late Foreign Intelligence Committee, and place it upon a basis equal to the work which in future it will be required to perform.

During the short period it has been in existence it has done good work. The Reserve and other subsidiary forces have been territorially mapped out, and each district has been assigned to one of the three great naval arsenals in the country. Much work, necessarily of a confidential character, has also been done, and although the continuance of such a Department will entail a certain increase of expenditure, there is no outlay connected with the Naval Votes which the nation or the Navy could less afford to dispense with than that which will enable the full strength of our naval resources to be put forth in as short a time as possible, and will give prompt and efficient co-operation to all the component parts of a Navy stationed in the necessary performance of its duty in all quarters of the globe.

The Intelligence Department will be under the personal superintendence and control of the First Naval Lord, but all questions will be referred to the other Naval Lords, which relate to, or affect the Departments for which they are respectively responsible.

The Naval Lords will meet periodically to discuss and review what has been done, thus making themselves acquainted with the nature and extent of the enlarged duties, which, in an emergency, they and the Departments they administer would have at once to undertake.

UTILIZATION OF AUXILIARY RESOURCES.

The inquiries, which an Intelligence Department must needs make, brought before the Board in forcible contrast the great disproportion between the volume of floating commerce of the Empire to be protected and the force at present available to protect it, compared with the mercantile and war marine of foreign nations. To bring the British Navy and commerce into the same relative proportion as that which exists elsewhere in Europe is neither needed nor practicable. To carry out a plan which, at the approach of war, would immediately convert our fastest and most powerful merchant vessels into effective war-cruisers, and thus turn the assailed into assailants, seemed a natural solution of the difficulty; but there were various obstacles to its realization. The cost of retainers, the difficulty of providing crews and stokers, the delay in the alterations necessary, the contingency that when wanted the vessel might be at the other end of the world—these difficulties in combination deterred previous Boards from making the experiment.

The enormous sums spent in taking up vessels in 1885, many of which never left harbour, and the long delay in getting the guns and fittings into the "Oregon," the only vessel thoroughly equipped of all those hired, impressed upon my Colleagues and myself the duty of taking some action in the matter. Exceptional speed and strength are the only desiderata of a mercantile cruiser. It occurred to us that the Post Office expenditure might be utilized, and that if we worked in combination, postal contracts could be associated with conditions by which the use of the vessels carrying the mails might under certain contingencies be economically secured to the State. The revision of the North American contract was a most favourable opportunity for a trial of the idea. The White Star Company, one of the tenderers, had, in August last, expressed their willingness to build two vessels to be approved by the Admiralty, of a speed and strength superior to any merchant-ship afloat, with engines and boilers below water, with fittings for guns built in during construction, and, when manned, with half crews of Naval Reserve men.

In return for their use, the Company requested an annual subsidy which would recoup the owners a portion of the larger outlay the exceptional construction of the vessels required.

The Cunard Company, another of the tenderers, has the fastest English ships afloat. A large portion of the officers and men in the employ of the Cunard Company are Naval Reserve men. Their ships are never more than eight days distant from Liverpool, and, therefore, always obtainable at short notice.

The Admiralty, after full consultation with the Treasury and Post Office, commenced negotiations with these two Companies.

They were influenced greatly by this consideration, that merchant-vessels, when armed, to be really serviceable, should have exceptional speed and coal capacity, enabling them to overhaul the weak and to escape from the strong.

Such exceptional speed entails a primary cost in engines and boilers, and a consumption in coal that renders the remunerative employment of the vessel very difficult. Only a few of the richest and best-conducted passenger Lines can afford to build such vessels, and the profits derived from their employment in recent years has been small.

Unless some inducement is given by the English Government to continue the building of such vessels, they must diminish in number, whereas abroad, by subsidies, their construction is directly encouraged. It is neither to the credit of the country, nor for the advantage of our Marine, that vessels of this class should mostly be under foreign flags.

The arrangement made with the two Companies differs in detail, but is the same in principle.

By the payment of an annual subsidy, reduced one-fourth so long as the mail contract lasts, the Government obtain from the Cunard Company the use of the "Aurania," "Etruria," and "Umbria," in time of emergency at a price fixed both as regards hire or sale. The necessary platforms and fittings for carrying guns are to be put in at once; the crews of the ships to be half Naval Reserve men; the owner to take charge of the gun-mountings required. Under this arrangement, it is believed that within a week all three vessels could be fitted, armed, stored, and manned as armed cruisers. The use, at fixed prices, of the remainder of the Fleet, if required, was a secondary condition of the contract.

With the White Star the arrangement was practically the same, except that no payment was to be made till the two new ships to be built were ready for sea.

By this arrangement the Admiralty have obtained, at a moderate annual cost, the use for five years of the three fastest steamers afloat, and two even faster, when constructed.

Negotiations with the Australian Colonies have for some time past been carried on, which, though not concluded, will, we hope, result in those countries contributing towards an extension of the Imperial Navy, and maintaining, as an integral part of the Fleet, an Australian Squadron, in addition to the force which has hitherto been stationed in those waters.

CONCLUSION.

The past year has been one of unusual activity. Many of the changes and reforms I have enumerated have been prompted and carried through by the personal interest taken in them by individual members of the Board. The Heads of the Departments have heartily co-operated with the Board in their endeavours to place naval administration on a more business-like and efficient footing.

What has been done makes apparent how much still remains to be effected before the condition and organization of our Navy can be said to be thoroughly satisfactory. The completion of the large iron-clads and cruisers mentioned before renders that portion of our Fleet more efficient, but by contrast makes still more apparent the obsolete and unserviceable condition of the great majority of our gun-boats and sloops.

The very improvements that recent changes have made show how large a field for reform there still remains in parts of our naval system which have not yet been touched.

GEORGE HAMILTON.

February 28, 1887.

APPENDIX I.

PROCEDURE TO BE OBSERVED WITH REGARD TO THE PREPARATION OF DESIGNS OF HER MAJESTY'S SHIPS.

1. CASES having recently been brought to the notice of my Lords in which the immersion of a ship when complete for sea will be seriously and prejudicially affected by reason of introduction during construction of additions and alterations to the hull, machinery, complement, armament, &c., the procedure hereafter defined is to be strictly observed.

2. When a design for a ship is required, the Controller will furnish the Board with a general idea of the class of vessel required.

3. The Controller will, after conferring with the First Naval Lord, and obtaining his written approval as to the speed, armament, complement, and sail power, if any, instruct the Director of Naval Construction to prepare a sketch design for consideration embodying such features as may have been decided upon by the First Naval Lord and the Controller.

4. The Director of Naval Construction, after conferring with and obtaining the opinion in writing of the Director of Naval Ordnance and the Engineer-in-Chief as to the armament and machinery respectively, is to prepare a sketch which shall be submitted to the Controller, who will bring the same before the Board.

5. If the sketch design is generally approved by the Board, orders will be given by the Controller that the design is to be worked out in detail, or modified with a view to its ultimate adoption. (The sketch design will be prepared in accordance with the following Board Minute of the 21st September, 1886, relating to load draught).

6. The Director of Naval Construction will, in consultation with the Director of Naval Ordnance, and the Engineer-in-Chief, complete the design, and submit it, with a full and careful description of the expected qualities and capabilities of the ship, for the concurrence of the Controller, by whom it will be sent to the Secretary for circulation to the several members of the Board, before being considered at a Board meeting.

After a design has been approved by the Board, and has received the Board stamp, not any alteration or addition either in hull, machinery, armament, complement of men, boats, or stores, or other details, shall be permitted without the concurrence of the Board.

7. The Controller shall be responsible that not any deviation from the designs approved by the Board shall take place which would in any way affect the immersion of the ship when completed for service.—(Board Minute, 15th February, 1887.)

REVISED METHOD OF CALCULATING LOAD DRAUGHT OF SHIPS.

The load draught of a ship is to be regarded as the draught at which she will float when laden with her full complement of sea stores, water, provisions, ammunition, coals, &c.

The whole quantity of coals that may be decided to be necessary for all sea-going and fighting requirements, whether carried in the bunkers or in the form of coal protection, is to be included in the full complement at the load draught, and the particulars of a design as described in the ordinary legend form, or in any other manner, are always to be given for the load draught as thus defined.

The full speed of a ship is to be estimated or obtained at measured mile, at the same draught, and the full speed at sea is to be determined by the average speed that can be maintained over a continuous run of four days at sea when the vessel is laden at her load draught at starting.

The legend forms that are used for stating these particulars should be corrected so as to distinctly indicate that they apply to the fully-laden condition of a ship.—(Board Minute, 21st September, 1886.)

APPENDIX II.

DEFECTS OF SHIPS IN COMMISS ON.

Admiralty, S.W., February 5, 1887.

Sir,

NUMEROUS instances having been recently brought to the notice of my Lords in which officers in command of Her Majesty's ships have sent to the Dockyards lists of defects to be made good which contained items of work that could and should have been undertaken by artificers of the ships; as well as proposals for alterations of a nature which, while not adding to efficiency, would fritter away money which might be more profitably applied, my Lords direct the attention of Commanding Officers to Article 1220, p. 392, of the Queen's Regulations, and impress upon them the necessity of a cessation of these practices, tending as they do to the performance of unnecessary work in the Dockyards which ought to be devoted to maintaining and strengthening the fighting efficiency of the Fleet.

2. Having thus pointedly called attention to the matter, my Lords expect that Commanding Officers will realize the paramount importance of the ships under their command being kept as free from defects and ready for service as the means on board will permit, requisitioning from the Dockyard only for such repairs as are undoubtedly beyond their own resources.

3. Attention is also called to the fact of ships' books having been supplied to Captains to inform them of the previous history of their ships, thus enabling them to watch and influence, as far as possible, expenditure on repairs.

4. Any failure or neglect to comply with these directions will not be viewed with indifference by their Lordships, and will influence their decision as to the merits of officers and their fitness for the command of Her Majesty's ships.

I am,

Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

EVAN MACGREGOR.

To the Commander-in-Chief on the Station.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SHIPS OF WAR (DESIGNS).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland), in rising to move the following Resolution which stood in his name on the Paper:—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the designs upon which ships of war are now being built, and how far they are in harmony with the transition in Naval construction and tactics, and also the necessity for an organized system of harbour and coast defence," said, that on several occasions requests had been made for the appointment of a Committee upon the ship-building policy of the Admiralty. Lord Brassey, when in that House, had asked first for a Royal Commission, and subsequently for a Committee. Other Members had done the same thing, but the Government of the day had always refused. Three grounds had been put forward for their refusal—in the first place, that it would be impossible to find enough Members who would be able to deal with a subject so difficult; secondly, that such a Committee would delay Admiralty work; and, in the third place, that it would remove the responsibility from the proper shoulders. Now, he denied that the first of these objections applied at the present time, when there was a larger number of Naval officers, Artillery officers, and Engineer officers in the House than ever before; and also Members engaged in every kind of iron manufacture and shipbuilding—men who had built ironclads themselves. As to the second objection, would such a Committee, he asked, have delayed the progress of vessels like the Inflexible, which took eight years to build, and cost some hundreds of thousands of pounds more than the estimate; the Polyphemus, which took seven years to build; or the Colossus, which all last year lay in the waters of the Solent, a monument of Admiralty folly in regard to her guns? If there were a Royal Commission or a Committee of this House to inquire into the policy of the Admiralty, it would not, he was confident, delay progress with regard to those large types of vessels or any other type; but, on the contrary, promote efficiency and progress. In answer to the third objection, about removing responsibility from the officers connected with the Admiralty, he was bound to say that at the present moment, though there was every kind of official at the Admiralty, it was extremely difficult to fix responsibility when anything went wrong; in his opinion, all responsibility should attach to the First Lord. The objections hitherto raised by the Admiralty against his proposal, therefore, held no longer, as the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Government could easily find a sufficient number of hon. and gallant Members quite fit to deal with all the technical problems involved in designing and completing ships of war. The report of Lord Dufferin's Committee, appointed 12 or 13 years ago, after the capsizing of the Captain, was the only detailed Report the House possessed with regard to our designs of ships, with the exception of the Memorandum issued the other day by the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton). That Committee—which, by the way, was a Departmental Committee appointed to inquire into the line of policy pursued by the Admiralty itself—in other words, appointed by the Admiralty to sit in judgment on the Admiralty—considered that the Despatch was the strongest type of iron-clad then afloat; and is even yet—subject to slight additions to her bow armour—considered by experts to be the strongest type of iron-clad yet designed. But the question he would now like to ask was this—how far the policy recommended by Lord Dufferin's Committee with regard to iron-clad armour had been carried out by the Admiralty? Now, it appeared from the Report of the noble Lord that in the case of the Warspite and the belted cruisers, instead of the armour being, as recommended by Lord Dufferin's Committee—and endorsed by Parliament two years ago—18 inches the water, it was actually (although designed to be 18 inches above the water) found, on completion of the ships with their complement of coal on board, six inches below the water. If there was nothing more than that against the designers of the Admiralty, he contended that he had made out a case for a Committee. What must be the consequence if these vessels went into action? The consequence must be that they would be in a worse plight than if they had been built without armour at all. What applied to the Warpite and to the belted cruisers applied also to the Admiral class. These vessels were built on the citadel principle, a large part of the vessel fore and aft being entirely without armour. He could not help thinking that the millions of money expended on those ships had been spent on the wrong type of vessel altogether. If he was correct in his information, Herr Krupp had already invented a gun which could throw a shell five miles, and designed for the very purpose of destroying, if possible, these unarmoured iron-clads. The shell which would be thrown from the gun carried a very heavy charge of powder, and, being fitted with a sensitive fuse, was certain to be very destructive. He thought that, in regard to the differences of opinion regarding the Devastation and the Admiral class of ships, a case had been made out for inquiry; and he did not think that any hon. Member would hold the opinion that vessels of this class could now be considered fit for ocean fighting. They must be kept within the range of their coal supply. Only fancy a squadron of these vessels having to proceed to New York; how could they reach that side of the Atlantic on an emergency, seeing that they only carry four or five days' fuel? Why, they would have to be conveyed with huge colliers or become targets for swift belted cruisers, provided with speed, coal endurance, and long-range Krupp shell guns. Another type of ship to which Lord Dufferin's Committee referred was the Vanguard class, which was too weak in the lower structure. The Committee recommended that the lower structure of vessels of this class should be strengthened. What happened subsequently proved the correctness of the statement of the Committee, because the Vanguard was shortly afterwards sunk. Another type of vessels regarding which Lord Dufferin's Committee made inquiry was the Inconstant class, built for the purpose of cruising. But these vessels were built for ocean cruising; yet, strange to say, without any coal endurance, and the Committee recommended that in future that type of ship should be smaller, and constructed with more power, with large heavy guns, and efficient coal endurance. How did the Admiralty rectify the defects which were pointed out in regard to the Inconstant class? They built two ships, the Iris and the Mercury, to steam 18 knots; but what was the result when they were completed? During the progress of the Egyptian war, the Peninsular and Oriental Company's fleet beat the Iris, which was engaged as a despatch vessel, by between 12 and 24 hours, and this at a time when the Iris was conveying Lord Wolseley on an emergency for the purpose of taking the command of the Army of the Nile; the truth being that these vessels cannot steam more than 14 knots in place of 18 as originally intended. The Board of Admiralty intended to build a number of quick vessels to steam 19 and 20 knots. Judging from past experience, he feared that when these vessels were completed they would find that the Admiralty had made mistakes with regard to these new vessels similar to those which they had made in the past in regard to other types of ships. Seeing that the Admiralty made such grievous mistakes between the inception of their designs and the completion of them, how could they expect the House to have confidence in the present system; he had no confidence in the present system; and, therefore, he asked for the appointment of a Committee, not for the purpose of thwarting the work of the Admiralty, but for the purpose of assisting and enabling it to come to right and proper conclusions with regard to the designs which they were preparing for the defence of the Empire. He also wished to know who was responsible for the defects which were said to exist with regard to the Agamemnon and the Ajax? Who was responsible for the present condition of our Channel Squadron? He believed that on the last occasion on which the Channel Squadron was manœuvred at sea, it was not possible to manœuvre it at more than six miles an hour. In the face of an efficient enemy, the squadron would have but a poor chance of escaping without injury at such a miserable speed as that. Without in any way depreciating our Navy, he believed that, owing to the numerous defects in our naval administration with respect to ships and designs, in the event of war, our chance of success would have to rest mainly, if not entirely, on the bravery, ingenuity, and pluck of our seamen. The noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty and his practical coadjutor (Lord Charles Beresford), believed in grouping and in organization. He maintained that if they grouped the ships of all classes and all types, and exercised them in the game of war, there would be a much better chance of discovering the defects than by sending them on such cruises as was at present the practice. The Admiralty had a splendid opportunity of doing this at the present moment. They had the Channel Squadron at Gibraltar, and the Mediterranean Squadron in the Mediterranean. In his judgment, it would be a wise policy if the Admiralty enabled both squadrons to come together, in order to test both men and ships by exercising them in the game of war—a policy about to be illustrated by the French in a sham attack upon Gibraltar. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Motion which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the designs upon which ships of war are now being built, and how far they are in harmony with the transition in Naval construction and tactics, and also the necessity for an organized system of harbour and coast defence,"—(Mr. Gourley.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central) said, his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) had made a most interesting speech with regard to the vessels of the Fleet. He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) did not intend to follow him at any great length; but he would shortly state to the House why he did not think it wise at the present moment to follow the advice of his hon. Friend and appoint a Committee to investigate the matters to which he had referred. If the hon. Member had moved for a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject there would have been a great deal more to be said for it at the proper time. A Committee of that House would not at all be a good tribunal to enter into a subject of that kind. It would be altogether wanting in that technical knowledge which was so important, and he did not think its conclusions would carry weight with the country on a subject of such importance. But the question was whether the present was a good time for appointing such a Royal Commission. Nearly all the large vessels now building in the Royal Dockyards had reached a point of their construction when it was almost impossible to make alterations in them, and therefore such an inquiry could not have an effect on their construction. As to the vessels now proposed to be laid down in the programme contained in the Memorandum of the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton), there was no iron-clads and no vessels of a very large type. It was proposed to lay down five protected cruisers to steam at a rate of 20 knots. With regard to those cruiser vessels there would be no dispute generally that they would be very useful vessels, and, therefore, they might leave it to the constructors of the Admiralty to construct them. But if it had been intended to lay down any large vessels or iron-clads and protected vessels he should have suggested that there should be a Committee of Inquiry appointed—not a Committee of that House, but one similar to Lord Dufferin's Committee. Such a Committee of Designs—always on the supposition that it was intended to lay down any new iron-clads—would be very useful and would be very advisable before laying down any such vessels of a large type. Last year he had recommended the appointment of a Committee on two vessels, the Nile and the Trafalgar, which had not then reached a point at which it was impossible to make an alteration in their design; and he had thought it was desirable that a Committee having technical knowledge and the highest skill should examine and report on the designs of the vessels which ought to be built of that type. He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) desired to point out that they were to cost no less than £1,000,000 each—if not more—and he said that he had every reason to disbelieve that their designs were disapproved both by the then Constructor and the late Constructor of the Admiralty, and that all the Constructor's staff had expressed doubts, if not disapproval, of the design of those two vessels. The late and the present Chief Constructor had joined in a Report to the Admiralty, stating that those vessels should not be built of that design, and that a Committee such as he suggested should be appointed to consider what the designs should be. Mr. Hibbert—late Secretary of the Admiralty—told him that there was no such Report as he had adverted to existing at the Admiralty, and the noble Lord who followed would not admit that any such Report existed. But since the debate on that occasion there had been a good deal of correspondence in the newspapers on the matter; and there appeared in one of them a Report purporting to be signed by Sir Nathaniel Barnaby and Mr. White on the subject, and as it was not contradicted he must suppose it was the Report he had referred to. How that Report got into the newspapers he knew not. Sir Nathaniel Barnaby, whom he had lately seen, assured him that he had sent no such Report to the newspapers, and for himself he could only suppose that Reports of that kind got into the newspapers in the same way as the noble Lord stated the other day was the case of another Report—namely, through the waste-paper basket, because that seems to be the channel through which communications were made from the Admiralty to the newspapers. Whether that was the origin of this Report reaching the newspapers he knew not. But the Report was an extremely interesting one, and having been made public and not being denied by the Admiralty, he thought he was justified in referring to it. Sir Nathaniel Barnaby and Mr. White began by saying—

“Before any new first-class armour-clads are ordered it is desirable to appoint a new Committee on designs, of which the construction should resemble the Committee of 1871;”

and they ended with a very remarkable paragraph to the effect that—“Should their Lordships decide to order the two vessels to be built we would suggest that the plans be signed by the Chief Constructors who have prepared them and marked by order of the Board.”

They declined altogether the responsibility for those two vessels. He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) asked whether there had ever been such a thing before in the history of the Admiralty as that two such vessels of such costly construction should have been decided upon by the Admiralty against the advice of their Naval Constructor. That Constructor altogether repudiated the responsibility. It would seem that that last paragraph had been acted upon, because in this year's Estimates a list of ships building was given, and it was stated that these vessels were not designed by the Chief Constructors, whether late or present, but by Mr. Barnes and Mr. Morgan; but he understood that both these gentlemen repudiated having given any approval of the designs, and that they merely obeyed orders in designing vessels. Shortly after the appearance of that Report, there also appeared a letter by Sir Nathaniel Barnaby in The Times stating at great length his reasons for objecting to those vessels, and in the course of that letter he said—

“I should wish it to be understood that I think these two vessels to be badly conceived as designs, and therefore wasteful of money. I believe, moreover, that if there had been an inquiry by a good Committee these ships would not have been undertaken.”

It was a most serious matter that the money of the country should be spent on two vessels of such costly construction against the advice of men like Sir Nathaniel Barnaby and Mr. White. The question, however, which he wished to raise now was not whether those gentlemen were right or wrong. It was quite clear that there was a difference of opinion on the subject in the Admiralty. If he might judge from the dates of the various letters and documents to which he had referred as having appeared in the newspapers, it would appear that those two vessels were ordered by the noble Lord the present First Lord of the Admiralty and his Board within a very few days of coming into Office in 1885. He had always thought the present First Lord of the Admiralty was remarkable for quickness and intelligence on questions of an official kind; but, quick and intelligent as he might be, he could not within a very few days master the highly technical subject of ship-building to an extent that would justify him in giving his own approval to vessels of that size and type against the advice of his own Naval Constructor, and therefore he must presume that the noble Lord had acted on the advice of his First Naval Lord, who it was known was the officer who gave his sanction to those two vessels. For all that he knew the First Naval Lord might be right and the Chief Constructor wrong. But he said that where a great controversy of that kind had arisen in the Department between the naval authorities on the one hand and one of the highest scientific authorities on the other, it ought not to be decided off-hand and at short notice without giving the House an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it; but it should be referred to a Committee comprising the highest intellect of the country, which should consider and determine what was to be done in the case. He brought this question last year under the notice of the House; but, unfortunately, he was not then able to make use of the Report which he had now read to the House. On the former occasion he could only give a very vague statement in reference to it. He must say he thought the noble Lord assumed a very grave responsibility in withdrawing that document from the Admiralty and not treating it as an official document. It would appear that the noble Lord had treated it not as an official document but as a private one, and had withdrawn it from the cognizance of the Admiralty and his Successors. When he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) brought this subject forward last year, the discussion took place on the night when it was announced that there was to be a Dissolution of Parliament. He was not then able to carry the House with him; but it was his conviction that if he had been able to read the Report to the House it would have been impossible for the House to refuse a Committee of Inquiry such as he suggested. In the meantime great progress had been made with these two vessels. He was informed that more than one-fourth, and nearly one-third, of the whole cost had been already undertaken in material and labour, and that it would be impossible now to alter the designs without losing all the expenditure already incurred. Consequently he was not prepared to re-open the question to the extent of asking for a Committee of Inquiry into these vessels; but he did hope that if the noble Lord contemplated, between now and next year, recommending the construction of other large vessels, he would permit the question of design to be referred to a Committee of Design similar to that which was presided over by Lord Dufferin. He desired now to advert to the remarks made by his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland with reference to the Warpite and the Impérieux. The designer of those vessels said it was never intended that they should have a coal-carrying power of more than 500 tons. It was true that bunkers were constructed for 900 tons, as in some circumstances it was desirable that they should carry a larger quantity of coal. The reason for this was, he believed, stated by his right hon. Friend (Mr. now Sir George, Trevelyan), who described those vessels in moving the Estimates five or six years ago. His right hon. Friend stated that they were only to have a coal-carrying capacity of 500 tons; and he believed the real reason for that was that French iron-clads of the same size had no greater coal-carrying capacity.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

Mr. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham) said, the most novel and interesting feature in the statement laid before them by the First Lord of the Admiralty was that which had reference to the depreciation fund—

Mr. SPEAKER said, he must remind the hon. Member that the specific Amendment before the House related to the designs of ships. The hon. Member was not at liberty to go beyond that.

Mr. J. M. MACLEAN said, in that case he would defer his remarks.

Sir EDWARD REED (Cardiff) said, he had no expectation, nor had he any desire, to see the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) carried, although he believed that one of the most beneficial things which could happen to this country in respect of its Navy would be the appointment of a Select Committee of the House; and he believed that such a Committee would do more good on behalf of the country and of the Navy than half-a-dozen Royal Commissions. And more than that, he believed that the condition of the Navy would never be thoroughly understood, and the interests of the Navy never be thoroughly protected, until a Committee of the House had sat and inquired, in the closest and most searching manner, into some of the facts which the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) had so frankly placed before the House. He thought, also, he might perhaps be allowed to say that they ought not to altogether lose sight of the public service rendered by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) in taking the step which had brought about the publication of the Paper which the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty had placed in their hands. The noble Lord the Member for South Paddington had done good, not only in causing such a Paper to be produced, but also because, apparently, some of the spirit animating him in making the suggestion had been infused into the document itself. He (Sir Edward Reed) remembered that on the last occasion he had an opportunity of speaking on the Estimates the right hon. Gentleman the present Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) fancied that he discerned something of a Party character in his observations. He, however, claimed never to have spoken in a Party sense on the Navy of the country. He thought the subject was vastly too important to be dealt with in that way. And the House would find that his observations on the present occasion would not be of a Party character, as he intended to speak very plainly as to some of the transactions of the Liberal Government in regard to the Navy. It was only due to the present Board of Admiralty to say that in the short time it had been in existence the Members had taken general steps which, he believed, in the end would have the result of converting the Navy from an amateur force, played with by politicians, into a Public Service, existing and operating on behalf of the country. He was not satisfied, sitting on that Bench, with the part the Liberals had taken as a Party with regard to the Navy of the country; and he could hardly imagine what his right hon. Friend (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had in view when he on an occasion like the present—which he (Sir Edward Reed) considered to be of the most serious character—made the kind of speech the right hon. Gentleman had just delivered. The right hon. Gentleman brought as an accusation against the Government that they did not allow a Committee to sit upon the designs of the Nile and the Trafalgar because Sir Nathaniel Barnaby and Mr. White had opposed those designs. His right hon. Friend passed very lightly over the fact that gentlemen at the Admiralty—every whit as competent as those two gentlemen—had designed those two vessels, and he also passed very lightly over the fact that when those two gentlemen objected to the designs they gave the very strongest possible inducement to the Admiralty to go on with the vessels, because their own designs had been for years past a series of disgraceful failures, to the serious injury of the country. What sort of a state of things had they presented to them in that statement of the noble Lord? He felt rather strongly on the question of the belted cruisers, which had been referred to by the hon. Member for Sunderland. It was due, he believed, to his own action that those cruisers were built—seven of them had been built—and now they were told that they had been so designed and so built that when the coal supply was on board and they were equipped for sea they would either have no armour at all above the water line, or, when they had it, in an infinitesimal degree. Indeed, the noble Lord told them that when they had a proper cargo on board the armour would be six inches below the water. It was very meritorious on the part of the noble Lord to have said that; but he could not accept the explanation of the fact which was given. He would illustrate what had happened by relating what had occurred with regard to two other vessels—the Warspite and the Impérieuse. When those vessels were first projected Lord Northbrook desired Mr. Trevelyan—then Secretary to the Admiralty—to ask him (Sir Edward Reed) to go and look at the designs. He went and looked at them, and found, to his amazement, that they were intended to be fast armour-belted cruisers for service in the most distant seas, and that, instead of having a coal supply adapted to the objects for which they were to be called into existence, they had a coal supply of about half that which any and every other iron-clad vessel in the Navy possessed. One was inclined to distrust his eyes and his senses when he read that those armour-belted vessels were destined for distant seas and were of 8,000 horse-power, yet only were supplied with 500 tons of coal. He found, however, that the designers of those vessels had adopted an ingenious, though, at the same time, a disingenuous, device for assigning to each of these vessels an additional supply of coals. They provided some more holds in which a further supply of coals could be placed. The position was this—That a ship with a capacity for carrying only 500 tons of coal was given a nominal supply of 900 tons. Mr. Trevelyan—when he was Secretary to the Navy—came down to that House and stated that the coal supply of each of these vessels was 900 tons. That was to say, he gave the merely nominal or fictitious coal supply, and he stated that in a manner so as to lead to the belief that the speed of the ship and other peculiarities of her build would not be interfered with in consequence of this nominal coal supply. The House of Commons was quite deceived by the statement, and afterwards he (Sir Edward Reed) remembered an hon. Member speaking to him in the Dinner Room with regard to the matter. He said—“Did you ever hear of a vessel working up to 8,000 horse-power having only 900 tons of coal on board?” But he (Sir Edward Reed) replied—“But what will you think when you find that the 900 tons of coal are a fictitious estimate of what each vessel is to carry, and that she will not carry more than 500 tons of coal at her designed draught?” Afterwards he had something to say to Mr. Trevelyan on the subject, and what passed between them was not very pleasant. He informed Mr. Trevelyan that the Controller of the Navy should not have allowed the building of two such useless ships as the Impérieuse and the Warspite. Those who designed them were competent to design a good as well as a bad ship, and both the vessels ought to have been made efficient, which they were not. Those two ships were built at a cost of £1,250,000 of public money, and Mr. Trevelyan should have known, Lord Northbrook ought to have known, and the Controller of the Navy must have known, that those ships would fail, as they had failed. The noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) who now presided over the Admiralty had explained the serious failure of both vessels in the frankest and most honourable manner. There could be no doubt whatever that £1,250,000 of the public money had been deliberately and knowingly wasted. The right hon.

Sir Edward Reed

Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) said that they could not make much saving on the Navy—that naval economy was a difficult thing to bring about. He said there were no means of saving money. First, he said there was the personnel which had to be kept up; there were the pay and the half-pay and the pension list, and, sure enough, they had enough of those who depended upon the Admiralty. It was a list long enough to almost justify the remark of a great and eloquent Member of that House—the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright)—that one of the Services, at least, afforded a system of out-door relief for the aristocracy. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer went on to say that they could not save upon the material of the Navy, because one Government began the building of ships and another completed them. Men who spoke like that were ignorant of the economies possible in the Navy, and ignorant of that economy which the country wanted to see adopted. What he (Sir Edward Reed) should have liked to have seen was the £1,250,000 which was wasted upon the Impérieuse and the Warspite, and upon other cruisers, saved to the nation, and five useful vessels built instead of seven that were of no use to the country. For these seven new belted cruisers were simply traps in which to take officers and men to destruction, and traps in which to destroy the reputation and power of this country. Indeed, it would have been vastly better for the Navy if those cruisers, the Impérieuse and the Warspite, and the other useless belted cruisers, had never been constructed, when they could not perform efficient service. The noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty had, no doubt, made out the best case that he could for the Department over which he presided, and even went so far as to indulge in apologetic remarks in regard to the Impérieuse and the Warspite. He also stated, after describing frankly enough the condition of the vessels, that while some authorities disapproved of the belted cruisers, yet others claimed a certain compensation for them, because they had a coal protection of 6½ feet. But this was an argument which would not stand examination. He might just as well say that a floating water-tank of thin iron would keep afloat longer if filled with coal. The fact was, it would sink all the sooner. But this was, unfortunately, the sort of logic to which the Naval Service of the country was committed. The Government had been warned that some of these vessels would, if constructed, prove failures; but they had gone on with their construction after reasonable warning. Both vessels had proved signal failures, and the country had lost the money invested in them. But he could not understand the line taken by his right hon. Friend the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), when he attacked the only two ships being built that the Navy, and some people not in the Navy, were said to approve of, and this was the first time that difference of opinion had not existed on such a subject for several years. Well, it was the duty of hon. Members, no matter on what side of the House they sat, to consider, in dealing with the construction of vessels for the Navy, only the honour and well-being of the State. Led on by high officials, the Government had built vessels of the Admiral type against his (Sir Edward Reed's) protest, and the protest of others, from the first, and they were in the same condition as to the cruisers of which he had been speaking. The hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Courtney) had been making a great speech in another part of the country, in which he denied that there had been any decay of public spirit in this country. For his (Sir Edward Reed's) part, he thought that if there had not been an alarming decay of public spirit, those responsible for these failures, including the then First Lord of the Admiralty, would be brought to the bar of the House as, under the guidance of these gentlemen, the country had been brought into an exposed and dangerous condition, and had been paying for a Navy which it had not got. The First Lord of the Admiralty held out no hope that the defects of the ships would be remedied. He would like to ask the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty, did he intend to put British seamen into such ships as he had been describing? If he did so, it was certain that they must meet with disaster. The least that the Admiralty ought to do was to take the armour off these vessels, so that they might become, at any rate, as efficient as unarmoured ships. Better still, perhaps, they might cut them in two, and lengthen them 50 feet or more. The noble Lord had said that a particular course was now pursued in designing vessels; and he (Sir Edward Reed) had always said that one of the great secrets of the failure of ships built for the Navy was that a great deal too much was placed upon the shoulders of the designer. That was the impression he formed when he was at the Admiralty himself. The Controller should receive from the Board instructions as to the qualities and construction of the vessels he was to design. But they had had Constructors who initiated things out of their own heads, and with the bad and unfortunate results which they had all seen. The Constructor, having designed his ship in his own fashion, generally found that it had to be altered, and this increased the expense and caused inefficiency; and in this matter he (Sir Edward Reed) thought that Parliament should assert its authority over the Admiralty. He should like to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether he was not going to do something to remedy the disastrous and dangerous condition of the belted cruisers? There was one question which, when he put it to the noble Lord, always caused him to get angry and excited in a peculiar degree. He generally got up and explained that what he (Sir Edward Reed) stated was true, but did not seem to see that there was anything bad in it. There had lately been a great scandal, and they had heard a great deal about Mr. Young Terry, who had sold some designs and tracings to some other State. But the Director of Naval Construction was connected with a private ship-building firm, and would remain so for a year or so to come, and that firm could point to Foreign Governments and say that the Chief Constructor of the British Navy belonged to their firm, and that he was in possession of the latest information as to the construction of vessels in the British Navy. The noble Lord said that he appointed Mr. White under these circumstances, because he was a most useful and valuable man. But he would tell the House why Mr. White was appointed. When the Conservative Government came into Office, in 1885, Sir Nathaniel Barnaby was told plainly that many of his recent vessels were most objectionable, and Sir Nathaniel Barnaby being then in very indifferent health, and very much harassed—and not unnaturally—with many things which had occurred, retired, from ill-health, upon his pension. Then the noble Lord asked Sir Nathaniel Barnaby who was the best person to succeed him?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The statement is utterly devoid of a word of truth.

SIR EDWARD REED said, he thought he must challenge the noble Lord on this point. Would he say that he did not confer with Sir Nathaniel Barnaby about the appointment of his successor?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Not until after he was appointed.

SIR EDWARD REED said, that almost made the matter worse. At any rate, there had been great discussion as to the ships designed by Sir Nathaniel Barnaby. There was an uprising in the Navy against these ships, and a resolve that they would have no more of them. There had been only one man in the country to apologize for these ships in The Times, and that was Mr. White; so, while the Naval Lords were declaring in one room that they would not have such ships as Sir Nathaniel Barnaby designed; the noble Lord in another room was appointing the only apologist for these ships the Director of Naval Construction. He (Sir Edward Reed) had not a word to say against the professional competence of either Sir Nathaniel Barnaby or Mr. White, but both of them were off the rails in this matter. They persisted in designs which raised distrust in the Naval Service, and signally failed to command the confidence of the Navy; and so long as the principal constructing officer in the Navy was the private adviser of a private firm, he would not have the confidence of any member of the Naval Service, either in the House or elsewhere. He had said just now that a great scandal had been created by someone at Chatham Dockyard having sold some drawings; but he believed that anyone could have bought the designs of Her Majesty's latest ships for a few pounds for years past. Certainly this could have been done with respect to all the ships built by contract, because, when the Admiralty wanted ships, they invited tenders from private firms, who sent their draughtsmen to study the designs and specifications. Any impecunious draughtsman might obtain a knowledge of them, and in this way the designs of Her Majesty's ships had come into the hands of men who had no interest in the Naval Service, but were merely draughtsmen in the City of London. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) had on one or two occasions claimed credit for having put a stop, in a large degree, to the extravagant expenditure in many of Her Majesty's Dockyards upon the completion of ships. But he (Sir Edward Reed) thought he was right in saying that there did not exist at the present moment a complete specification of all the work to be done upon any ship in Her Majesty's Navy. What happened was this—that ships were built very often by contract, and then sent to a Dockyard to be finished, or sometimes even built in one Dockyard and then sent to another to be completed. They were sometimes sent to Yards where they lay for days and weeks without anyone in the Dockyard knowing what they were to be done with or what work was to be done upon them. When the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) was at the Admiralty he saw that this state of things was not satisfactory, and thereupon he came down to the House and proposed that there should be a Director of Dockyards appointed to the Navy, with civil assistants under him at the Dockyards for purely Dockyard purposes. That was to say, they were to be employed in seeing that the work was done and that no waste was incurred in the money voted. Well, a few weeks ago he (Sir Edward Reed) went to Devonport Dockyard, where he saw three ships of the Archer class—the Archer herself and two built by a private firm on the Clyde. He looked at the Archer, and inquired what ship she was, and he was told that they were all the same class of ships. But when he looked at the Archer she seemed to be altogether different from the other two, and then he discovered that very much of the upper part of the Archer, built on the Clyde, had been pulled down and then built up again at the Dockyard. To what extent had this been done? He did not know that it was not a ship like of pounds were being expended in this way upon her. And then he discovered that the other two ships were to undergo the same transformation. That was to say:—Here we are in 1887 paying one set of workmen on the Clyde to build ships up, and then we are paying a set of workmen at Devonport to pull them down. Then he asked where the civil assistant to the superintendent was—the superintendent's elbow adviser, to whom we were to look to see that these things were not done and to save waste? Well, he was told that this gentleman had not been at the Dockyard for weeks, and that he was not likely to be there for weeks to come, for he was away on the Clyde, seeing the ships building there, and finding out what was to be done to them when they came to the Dockyard. The Government certainly ought not to ask for that gentleman's salary in the present year, for it was obtained previously on false pretences, for the performance of necessary duties which he had left undone in consequence of his services being otherwise employed. There was gross inefficiency at the Admiralty Office. Surely before the Government asked that House for money they ought to know what ships they were going to produce. There ought to be a complete description of what was to be produced given to the contractor who was to build the ship and to the Dockyard which was to furnish it. When the proper Vote in Committee came on for discussion, he should ask for some assistance on this head. He should want to know what the Admiralty were now doing to prevent money being spent and wasted in the constant and expensive alteration of ships, and whether they were yet able to describe the ships they wanted? The present Board of Admiralty undertook on entering Office to make a great reform. They said—"We will separate the designing from the building department;" and he (Sir Edward Reed) approved the idea as one likely to make Dockyard building more economical. When he was at the Admiralty he could design a ship, and then could go to the Dockyard and alter it about as much as he pleased. Other Constructors would do the same, and in that way large sums of money were spent which might be saved if the ship were in the first instance designed as she was to be built, and that design were adhered to. The Conservatives promised to put an end to that state of things; but they had not carried the work out, for it was quite inconsistent with any good plan that a Dockyard official should be going about to do work on the Clyde, or that while the work of the Admiralty Constructors was neglected they themselves should be attending launches and making speeches there, and doing other things of the same kind. He (Sir Edward Reed) was losing all heart in this matter. He never felt so disheartened as he did to know that, although he had a seat in that House and had some knowledge of this question, his remonstrances and arguments were all in vain, and, in spite of the promises that were made by successive Governments, he was still obliged to witness the wholesale waste of public money that was going on. It was not satisfactory to know that the first change was due to the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington. Why was it left to that noble Lord to initiate economy? The noble Lord did not, as he understood his speeches, mean to attack necessary expenditure. But the fact was that the noble Lord knew the things which were going on, and which he (Sir Edward Reed) had then indicated. He (Sir Edward Reed) believed that when the noble Lord made the speech to which he had referred he knew that this extravagance was going on, and that the time had come when a stop must and should be put to it. He hoped that in the course of the evening they would have some opinion from the Government on this point. At present it seemed as if, after spending £1,250,000 on the Impérieuse and the Warspite, and a larger sum on the belted cruisers, we were almost as badly off as we were before.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. Forwood) (Lancashire, Ormskirk) said, he thought that many of the reflections of the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed) upon the mode in which the business had been done at the Admiralty were just. These reflections, he believed, arose from circumstances similar to those pointed out by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) in reference to defective designs. No one would gainsay the importance of the question raised by the hon. Member for Sunderland, nor would anyone deny the propriety of bringing before the House the system under which our ships of war were designed. He did not intend, even if he were prepared, to defend the design of each and every vessel that had been adopted by the Admiralty. Mistakes had, no doubt, been made, and would continue to be made, in those designs; but when constructing fighting machines that had to be worked under so many and such varying conditions of service, he thought they were yet a long way off making a perfect fighting ship. When he used the term "mistakes," he did not impute blame to anyone, or mean that the errors were errors that should have been apparent to the designers. They were not errors by the light of the information that the designers had at the time that they designed the ships. Experience and use daily developed alterations and changes in the type of vessel required. He could not do better than quote from the Report of the Committee of 1871—Lord Dufferin's Committee, viz. :—

"A perfect ship of war is a desideratum which has never yet been attained, and is now further than ever removed from our reach. Any near approach to perfection in one direction inevitably brings with it disadvantages in another."

As he understood the object of the hon. Member, it was not so much to raise questions as to the suitability of this or that vessel, but rather to consider whether the principles on which designs were prepared and adopted by the Admiralty were such as to enable the country to obtain the best form of battle ship. Naturally those who supported the formation of a Committee on Designs illustrated their arguments by reference to failures in vessels that had been constructed. But, to his mind, the real question to be determined was, not whether certain failures had occurred under the existing system, but whether, under any other arrangement, we should obtain, on the whole, a more serviceable Navy than the one we at present possessed. He believed that the general system adopted in regard to approving and designing of vessels by the Admiralty was good if worked out on plain, proper, sensible business lines. No doubt, in theory, a "Committee on Designs" sounded most attractive; but in practice he was inclined to believe that it would be found, not only unworkable, but prejudicial. What was required in a vessel, especially in a fighting vessel, was a homogeneous design. The scantlings, dimensions, displacement, power, armament, should all proceed upon one common basis. This uniformity could best be secured by intrusting the work to one competent and responsible designer. In no science was there greater room for differences of opinion than that of the naval architect, and two experts were but seldom found to agree on any one point. Therefore, if a Committee of experts was called together, and that Committee was composed of men of strong minds, the probability was that each would have some special point in construction to which he attached importance; that he would force his particular hobby upon his colleagues, with the result that a patchwork ship would be designed, one that could not possibly fulfil in a satisfactory manner any one requirement. A design prepared under such a Committee would be no one man's production. There would be no individual responsible, and if it did not succeed there would be no one to whom blame could be personally attached. In his judgment the Admiralty system of preparing and approving designs was, as he had said, if conducted on business lines, a more satisfactory form of Committee with individual responsibility than could be devised by any plan of a Committee. No Navy in the world required such a variety of type of vessels as did England. In addition to the necessity of maintaining a powerful fighting fleet, provision had to be made for the naval police of the globe, and for a fleet to protect our extending and ever growing commerce. We required ships for deep sea service, for river service, and vessels that would keep the sea for a lengthened period without loss of speed, or the necessity of being frequently placed in dry dock. The depository of all this knowledge was the Admiralty. The information daily gained from the officers in command of our numerous stations was alone in the possession of the officials of the Admiralty. They alone were able to watch the performances of each and every type of cruiser, and by the vast experience thus gained they were in the best position to know their faults and defects, and to guard against similar errors in new vessels. The Admiralty possessed, in addition, a full knowledge of the progress of naval construction of all other nations. This, combined with their own experience, placed the Department in a position that could not be attained by any Committee of experts composed of gentlemen not daily in touch with the naval operations. The Admiralty had a highly trained Constructive Department, presided over by a gentleman who had attained European note as a designer of war ships. It was at the earnest request of the noble Lord now at the head of the Admiralty that Mr. White was induced to leave the Elswick Works and place his services at the disposal of the Government. When objection was raised last year to Mr. White continuing to act as consulting engineer for a certain period to the Elswick Works he determined to cease his connection with them, and in September such connection terminated. During the period after Mr. White had left Elswick and come to the Admiralty, he believed that gentleman had never once been consulted by the Elswick firm as to work which they had had in hand; but it would not have been possible for the Admiralty to obtain his valuable services had not the First Lord allowed him to be consulting adviser to that firm for a short period. With regard to the general question, he had already stated that in his opinion the machinery and system of the Admiralty for providing efficient war vessels was good. He had qualified that statement by the stipulation that it must be carried out in a businesslike way, and he was bound to admit that this had not always been the case in times gone by. The Construction Department had brought forward designs and vessels had been ordered without the designs being properly referred to the officers responsible for the manning, arming, and machinery of the vessels. The Chief Constructor had stated on his designs his views on these matters, and had estimated the displacement of his vessel for a certain weight of armament and engines, and an estimated complement of crew. These conditions had not always been examined by the officers best acquainted with these details. Proposals had thus been accepted without being properly examined. Subsequently, from time to time after the vessel's construction had commenced, serious alterations had been made in these important details, adding largely to the weight to be carried by the vessel beyond her original design. Vessels had also been kept an undue length of time under construction, and, as improvements developed in naval appliances, alterations and additions had been made to such ships incompatible with the ideas of those who designed them. In illustration of this absence of procedure on business lines, to which the mistakes were almost entirely due, he might cite one or two examples from vessels included in the Estimates now before the House. The Mersey, for instance, was designed and partly constructed to be a flush-decked ship to carry 14 6-inch guns, four on her spar deck, and 10 on her between-decks. When, however, the vessel was completely framed, a change of idea had come over the Admiralty, and they had altered her from a flush-deck ship to a vessel with a poop and forecastle, and a deep open waist. Her armament was altered by placing one heavy 8-inch gun on board in lieu of two of the 6-inch guns. Her sea-going trim was quite altered, and the increased cost for completing this vessel had been £50,000. It had not infrequently happened that the Admiralty had allowed a ship to be commenced before they had finally determined the armament. The Bendow was an example of this. Her designer had proposed that she should carry two 63-ton guns in each of two barbettes; the Admiralty, instead of determining whether this armament was proper or not, contracted for the vessel at separate prices for the hull and barbettes, so that if they changed their mind as to the armament, they could more readily arrange with the builders the cost of such change; but the most important factor in the whole matter was overlooked—namely, that the lines of the hull were drawn to carry at a given displacement, and the question whether the vessel could carry at that displacement depended largely upon the weight of the armament to be put on board. What was the result? After the work on the ship had gone on for some time, there was no 63-ton gun ready, but there was a 110-ton gun completed which the Admiralty thought might be very well suited for the Bendow. Consequently, instead of the two barbettes being armed each with two 63-ton guns, it was determined to place 110-ton guns in each of the barbettes, rendering necessary serious alterations in the size of the barbettes. They also increased her armament by four 6-inch guns and 12 six-pounders; so that by the time the Admiralty had made up their mind as to the armament of this vessel, she was called upon to carry something like 500 tons of extra dead weight, or equal to one foot extra displacement beyond that at which she was originally designed to float. In a similar way, 250 tons had been added to the weight of the belted cruisers now building beyond their designed capacity. Allusion had been made to the ridiculously small coal capacity of the Impérieuse and the Warships; but since these ships were designed, 430 tons of extra armament, machinery, and other things had been added to the weight after the lines of the hull had been determined upon. He gave these facts in order to bear out his contention that whatever fault there might be in connection with the designs of ships under construction, the blame did not lie with the system under which ships were designed, but was due to a want of business aptitude in giving effect to that system. When every effort was made to minimize weights in the ship, and the designer worked to the nearest ton, the importance of what he had stated would be realized. These matters had engaged the attention of the present Board of Admiralty from the day they came into Office, as the Report laid before the House by the First Lord would show. The policy laid down by his noble Friend at the head of the Admiralty and his Board, was to require that before a vessel was commenced there should be obtained in writing from the Director of Naval Ordnance and Engineer-in-Chief their opinion on the armament and machinery proposed. Then, after the design had been considered by the Controller, and before going to the Board collectively, a paper should be sent to members individually, so as to give them an opportunity of criticising and considering the design before the order was given for the vessel. As the Board included a number of most distinguished and experienced naval officers, he was satisfied that those designs would be closely and sharply criticized from the Naval point of view, as they ought to be; and the faults and defects which he had endeavoured to point out would be remedied by those gentlemen in the course of the careful examination they would give to the designs. Once passed by the Board, the order was most precise that no alteration or addition was to be allowed. When thus approved in every detail the designer could prepare the lines of the vessel, knowing exactly what she had to carry in weight, and what duties she was expected to perform. It would also be the policy of the Board not to be tempted to make alterations in vessels when once their construction was commenced, but to push on the work to completion, adhering to the original design. Such a policy would, he was satisfied, obviate the recurrence of many of the costly mistakes of the past, to which allusion had been made, and would be the best means of attaining the end which the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) had so much at heart, and with whose object the Board of Admiralty fully sympathized. The hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed) would be fully aware of the attempt made in 1871 to obtain the opinion of a Committee of Inquiry on the designs of vessels then being constructed. He would remember the variety of opinions expressed by Members of that Committee, and the difficulty of forming any reliable conclusion from their Report as to the best form of vessel to be built. In looking through the evidence given before that inquiry he was much struck by one answer given by the hon. Member for Cardiff, who, on being pressed to express an opinion favourable to the introduction of compound engines into the Navy, said—

“My feeling is that I prefer to get actual experience rather than evidence—which, even when given from the best authorities, is not always to be trusted—before I would tamper with vessels of that kind.”

Now, if a Committee were formed, it would have to deal with evidence. For his own part, he preferred the common-sense process recommended by the hon. Member for Cardiff—to be guided by actual experience rather than by evidence. Another point he should notice was that there had been more Committees upon these matters than the hon. Member for Sunderland was aware of. There was a Committee in 1865, the outcome of which was the construction of the Captain. In 1869 another Committee sat, and the Devastation & Thunderer were produced; there third in 1871, after the Captain was lost; and he thought that, broadly stated, the result of these various Committees was that there were about as many opinions as there were Members on the Committee. It was true the Motion did not suggest the appointment of a permanent Committee on Designs, but was limited to an inquiry into the designs adopted within recent years. Such a proposal would have even a more prejudicial effect on the Service than the appointment of a permanent Committee. The inquiry would occupy months; it would distract the attention of officers; rival schools of ship-building would be heard before the Committee, each with its own theory. If upon so contentious and thorny a subject the Committee should by chance come to a unanimous conclusion, the effect might be to cramp the inventive and suggestive faculties of our naval officers, and to stereotype in our Navy some one system or type of ship. Men in official positions were not over partial to accept responsibility, and he thought the temptation would be great to the designers to shelter their future work behind the recommendations of such a Committee. The result would be that for some time there would be a stereotyped type of vessel, and the country would not keep up with that ever-growing progress which so marked the construction of our vessels in the last few years. It must not, however, be for one moment supposed that the present Board of Admiralty considered themselves or their advisers to be infallible, or that they lived in regions above and beyond the reach of outside advice. They were always pleased to receive suggestions, and in the event of difficulty or doubt there would be no hesitation in seeking the counsel of those from the outside who might be qualified to give a reliable opinion. For the reasons, however, that he had endeavoured to lay before the House, the Government could not accept the Motion of the hon. Member—a Motion which, if carried, would make it compulsory upon the Board to appoint a Committee. They hoped by using the machinery they at present possessed, and giving effect to the existing system on business lines, to arrive at the result the hon. Member desired—namely, to provide from time to time the most efficient ships of war that could be produced. The hon. Member for Cardiff had made allusion to his visit to Devonport the other day. What the hon. Member said he saw there was the outcome of the want of business aptitude in the past. The Admiralty at the time were in a great hurry to get the vessels referred to constructed, and he believed the Admiralty had not made up their minds as to the best form of the vessels when they ordered them. At the present time, however, the Admiralty had made up their minds, and they knew what they wanted in respect of the vessels they ordered from truck to keel, and he believed that was the only way to avoid the mistakes which had occurred in the past. There was no doubt that much of the trouble that had arisen in ships now under consideration, had arisen from the overpace at which the work was pushed on. A very large number of ships were put in hand at once, and he was afraid that that care and attention were not given to them which would have been given if the demand had not been so great and oppressive. He was afraid public opinion was somewhat to blame for that state of things. There had been some sweeping remarks by the hon. Member for Cardiff as regarded certain ships which he had named, and, although he had pointed out the differences between their designs and what they would be when they were completed; still he did not wish the House for one moment to suppose that those vessels would be anything but first-class men of war. They might have been better, but there was no hesitation on the part of naval officers of the Board in saying that they would prove good and efficient fighting ships; and if ever the time unfortunately came for their going into action they would be found as good and efficient fighting ships as a British seaman could desire.

SIR JOHN COMMERE (Southampton) said, what Naval men complained of was that the designers of ships were always in a hurry, but after being in such a hurry to lay vessels down they were not in the same haste to launch them. The speech they had just heard from the Secretary to the Admiralty amounted to this:—"We acknowledge there have been tremendous mistakes in the past, but we mean to do better for the future." What they complained of in the Navy was that they did not get value for their money.

Mr. Forwood

They went down to the Yard, and they saw the money wasted right and left, and he would tell them why. The Admiralty would not make up their minds, and would not send out proper specifications and proper information to the contractors and to the Dockyards before they commenced their work. They were aware that the Admiralty knew how to construct vessels, but what they complained of was that the Board would not make up their minds. He did not agree with the hon. Member for Sunderland, and thought the appointment of a Committee would be a great mistake. It would remove the responsibility from where it should rest—on the Board of Admiralty. What was wanted was that the outside world should be taken into confidence. Tenders should be invited for the construction of vessels from outside contractors, and then they would have designs from all parts of the country, which would result in England being put in a very much better position in respect of her Navy than she was at present. He had been rather averse to the Nile and Trafalgar being built, because he had come to the conclusion that it was like putting too many eggs into one basket, and that smaller vessels would have served the purpose, but still he believed they would be the two most powerful vessels in the world. The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) was mistaken in what he had said, for Mr. Barnes and Mr. Morgan had both told him that they approved of these two vessels very highly.

SIR CHARLES PALMER (Durham, Jarrow): I would not have risen to take part in the debate, but for the sweeping accusations which have been made respecting very estimable men by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed). I consider that the remarks of my hon. Friend have reference to the period when he was at the Admiralty, rather than to the present time. Personally I have some knowledge of these matters, the firm with which I am concerned having lately completed vessels of an important character. I am bound to say that the designs and specifications which were sent in before the tenders were made were of a most complete and perfect character; indeed, they proceeded from the lines laid down and recommended by the Committee of which I had the honour to be a Member, and over which Lord Ravensworth presided. That Committee recommended, amongst other things, that vessels should not be laid down before the designs and specifications were complete, and the result has been that vessels since built have been so with perfect satisfaction. Complete designs have been placed in the hands of the contractors, the work makes steady progress, and, instead of ships being behind time in delivery, I believe that, in almost every case, the time of delivery has been anticipated. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed) has asked me if the contractors have delivered the vessels complete? My answer is that the contractors have delivered them complete in all but armaments. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) has referred to the building of the Nile and the Trafalgar. The right hon. Gentleman is right, in my opinion, in bringing the question before the House, because as the action of the Government was of a somewhat extraordinary character, when you have men of such high intelligence and position as the Chief Constructors of the Navy sending out a protest against the building of certain ships, great attention should be paid to their representations, and a proper investigation should be made. I am myself opposed to Committees in such questions as a rule. I am opposed to the Resolution of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley), because I feel that if we are to have a Board of Admiralty that Board should take upon itself the responsibility of conducting the affairs of the Navy, and experts should not be brought in from time to time, and Committees should not be appointed to supersede the Board and take the responsibility out of their hands. I am also of opinion that the Constructors Department ought to have more responsibility thrown upon it independent of what I may call the Naval Department. The Constructors Department ought to take the responsibility of designing and building the ships which the Admiralty require, and the Naval Department ought not to interfere until the vessels are put into their hands for navigation. I am aware that naval officers fancy they can instruct the Naval Constructors; but such is not my opinion. But I regret to express my regret that demnations should have been made against certain gentlemen, because I am satisfied the country owe a great deal to those gentlemen for having so efficiently carried out the construction of ships of war. The progress made year by year in ship-building and marine architecture is such that it is very difficult to keep pace with it; and I believe that these men have endeavoured to the best of their ability to do their duty.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ADMIRALTY EXPENDITURE—COST OF CONSTRUCTION.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham): I think that the statement which the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) has laid before the House is especially interesting and valuable, because it deals, not only with the Estimates for the coming financial year, but because it lays down the principle on which our future naval policy ought to be based for a number of years to come. The First Lord of the Admiralty and his Colleagues have made an effort which I think the country will highly commend, to ascertain what should be the amount set apart year by year, before he holds out to us, not only the possibility, but the probability that the policy he advocates will be carried into effect—namely, that we shall have a reduction of expenditure with an increase of efficiency. No doubt that is a very pleasant prospect to hold out, but I am anxious to consider how far the promise of the noble Lord is likely to be redeemed. When we turn to that part of the noble Lord's Statement in which the proposal is made to set apart a regular depreciation fund to meet wastage and the cost of construction of new ships from year to year, we find that a very novel but excellent idea has been brought forward by the Board of Admiralty. It is proposed that the capitalized value should be taken of the Fleet as it at present exists. The Board assumes that when the present programme is carried out—as it soon will be—when all money Voted by Parliament during the last few years to construct new ships has been spent—we shall have a Navy efficient for all purposes of offence and defence; and the present proposal of the Admiralty is that a certain sum should be set apart every year to maintain the Navy as a Navy worthy of the Country, and the great interests it has to protect. What is the amount thus set apart? We find that a certain percentage is taken on the different ships constituting the Navy and the original outlay upon them, together with the annual waste, and the conclusion arrived at was that the annual amount to be set apart for depreciation was £1,803,000. It is said that such an amount is fair and reasonable to be set apart from year to year. Then, supposing that such a sum is set apart, we have to consider whether it is likely that we shall have that reasonable reduction in the Navy Estimates which has been held out to us as a fair and reasonable prospect by the Board of Admiralty. Turning to the Navy Estimates for the year, I find at page 77 that the total amount set apart in 1887-8 for the machinery and hulls of ships is £1,911,000; that exceeds by just £100,000 the amount which the Admiralty proposes to set aside for these purposes in all coming years. Now, that seems to leave a very narrow margin indeed in which to effect a saving in the Navy Estimates. But it does not represent the whole state of the case, because of the whole of this sum of £1,911,000, which is to be devoted to this purpose in the coming year, we find that there is a sum of £530,000 set apart for gun fittings and special purposes of that kind. That is an amount expressly excluded from the depreciation fund of the Board of Admiralty; and if we are to deduct that sum from the total sum set apart for the construction of new ships and for wastage in the ensuing year, there is only £1,400,000 left; so that the amount the Admiralty say is to be set apart in future years exceeds by £500,000 the amount really to be devoted to such purposes. We know that this year is to be the last of a series of years which has to be devoted to the special construction of new ships. The Estimates have been swollen in the last few years by the expenditure of £8,000,000 for special improvements in the Navy; and the taxpayers may naturally expect that when that work has been accomplished some reduction might be made in the annual demands upon the country. But if this policy is to be carried out, as far as I can understand the Estimates, we shall have to spend in the construction of new ships and machinery an amount larger by £500,000 than what we propose to spend in the coming financial year. That is a point on which I should like to elicit some information from the Representative of the Admiralty in this House. But then there is another point in connection with this depreciation fund which I think deserves the consideration of the House. There is no doubt that the Admiralty, in proposing to set apart this fund, are acting upon the analogy of what is done by men carrying on a large private business, who set apart a certain sum every year for depreciation. We know that private firms do set aside certain sums every year for depreciation—for special emergencies that may occur from time to time. But what would occur if the House of Commons were to vote, say, £2,000,000 every year for the construction of new ships, with the understanding that that sum was not to be allocated to other purposes? Do hon. Members believe that that sum would not be spent every year, whether it was wanted or not? The Department would feel itself bound to spend it, and would take advantage of every occasion for doing so. I should like to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether it is proposed that this fund should be a permanent fund or not? Whether in some way it would be funded or reserved for great occasions, and that it would not necessarily be spent every year? There could be no security against the panics which arise periodically, or that the Board of Admiralty would not be required to ask for millions more because some other Board, which had been in existence for a few years, had obtained great credit for economy at the cost of the efficiency of the Navy. We could have no security that in one year all the money collected in this way from year to year would not be devoted to the purposes of the Navy in one single year. I do not intend to cast any reflection on the present Board of Admiralty; but this is how the matter stands. A new idea is set before the House, which is no doubt excellent in itself, but it is one on which we ought to have some clear and definite information as to the way in which this depreciation fund is to be employed, and we should also receive some clear assurance that the mode in which the Estimate is taken is the correct one, and that we shall not be asked in future years to vote a much larger sum as a regular Navy expenditure on new ships, than we may be actually voting for the coming financial year.

Sir Charles Pa'mer

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR (Kincardine) said, he recognized the value of the information given by the First Lord of the Admiralty in his able Memorandum, but desired that they should be afforded further explanations as to the armament of guns that were still required for the Navy. The noble Lord knew that for many years he (Sir George Balfour) had strenuously urged the Admiralty to undertake the supply of its own guns, instead of depending on the War Office. He had known the most ridiculous proposals to be made by the Navy with regard to guns. He had known ships to be built without the slightest information as to the calibre or the weight required for the armament of these ships. The noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton), in his Statement, had given the House some information as to the breech-loading guns already supplied by the War Office; but he had failed to give any information as to what the total guns for the Navy were to be. The noble Lord said 1,281 breech-loading guns was the number now available; but he failed to show how many more were required. In his (Sir George Balfour's) opinion, 3,300 was the lowest number which would be required. At all events, the calculation of the noble Lord was as entirely misleading as when he gave the cost of the ships at £39,000,000, without inserting in the Estimate the full cost of the guns required to equip the vessels. The amount of money provided in the Army Estimates for the supply of ordnance for the Navy was totally inadequate. He regretted extremely that the War Office was to continue to supply the Navy with guns and stores. No arrangement could be more unfortunate, and he hoped some understanding might be arrived at by which the War Office would be relieved of the task. If he were Secretary of State for War, he would not retain the post for a day without insisting on being relieved of such a responsibility. Another change he would like to see effected of the War Office having the disposal of it of providing it port. He saw no difficulty in carrying out that change under the superintendence of a capable officer. If such a change were brought about, it would have most beneficial economical results, as economy was by no means studied by the War Office in the matter of transport when they knew the Admiralty had to pay the bills.

Mr. PULESTON (Devonport) said, he joined in the congratulations offered to the noble Lord on the very lucid and able Statement with regard to the Naval Estimates which he had placed in the hands of Members. No such Statement had ever been issued before; but, although it was clear and conclusive, it was not beyond criticism and explanation. At no time had the responsibility of the First Lord of the Admiralty been greater than it was at the present moment. Although some of the Representatives of Dockyard constituencies might, perhaps, feel for the time being the effect of the reforms that were made, they would all unite in giving the noble Lord full credit for doing that which in his judgment and in that of the present Board was best for the country; and it was gratifying to learn that the saving of so much money was compatible with efficiency. The fact that we had 62,500 officers and men, against last year's 61,400, with a saving of nearly £800,000, was, of itself, a very important consideration. The Admiralty being one of the great spending Departments, it was right, and also of great advantage, that the head of that Department should be a Member of that House; and he trusted there would be no departure from that rule in future. Both the Statement of the noble Lord and the Navy Estimates bore clear testimony that there had been no extraordinary extravagance in the Dockyards, as was often assumed. Reference had been made to the ill effects of the changes made in ships while they were in course of construction, and in the Statement of the First Lord some importance was attached to the proposal that in future, when the building of a ship was ordered, the design should not be interfered with. He gladly admitted that that was a salutary decision for the Admiralty to come to; but, while in the past those changes might account for a largely increased expenditure in the case of various ships, on the other hand he ventured to suggest that there might be some disadvantage if they drew too hard-and-fast a line against any alteration of a ship until it was finished. It was quite possible to carry this new idea to an extreme. He considered that it was one of the great advantages of building our ships in the Royal Dockyards that we were able, when really necessary, to alter the designs of ships when in process of building; for it must be admitted, considering the frequent changes which were being made in the science of shipbuilding, that it might be highly desirable to make some alteration in the design of a ship whilst she was being built. It was the stitch in time which saved nine, and a judicious alteration might prevent a much very larger outlay after the ship had been completed. They had seen some ships which had been finished with great rapidity in private yards, and which it had been necessary afterwards to send to the Dockyards to be refitted or changed in several important particulars, involving much higher cost and outlay before she was perfected than would have been incurred had the change been made in her while the vessel was being built. It was well known that war ships became obsolete by reason of changes which were very rapid in the mode of construction, in speed, and in armament. There might, therefore, be times and occasions when it would be cheaper and better for the Admiralty to make alterations during construction. He thought there was reason to hope, from this Memorandum of his noble Friend, that they had come to the end of the policy of fits and starts, which was so very expensive, and so detrimental to the real and permanent interests of the country. The policy of fits and starts was to do nothing in times of peace, and then, when there was a war scare on, to rush and buy every vessel we could lay our hands on, from every country and belonging to everybody, at an enormous outlay, and thereby getting possession of a large number of vessels which were practically useless to us, and spending millions of money which would be saved if we adopted the sound and sensible plan of maintaining our Royal Dockyards always in an efficient state, so as to be ready to turn out any quantity of work on an emergency. He hoped this Memorandum was the first practical recognition of what was wanted to put our Navy in a state of thorough efficiency. He looked upon it rather as an earnest of what was to come, although in itself it was very good. Some hon. Members were always addressing themselves to the question of the disestablishment of the Royal Dockyards. The reforms and re-arrangements proposed by the Admiralty would, at all events, have this effect—that they would give no reason to those hon. Members to urge that plea in future. They would see that the alterations would facilitate the understanding of how and where the money went. It gave him great satisfaction to learn that it was intended to keep the plant and capital invested in the Dockyards employed, while giving them the greater part of the work instead of to the private yards. He knew it had become a confirmed opinion in some quarters that work could be done cheaper by giving it out to private yards; but he had made it his business to inquire into this matter, and he had succeeded in getting an illustration of the way in which the cheaper work sometimes done in private yards was brought about. It was said that the Acorn was built in a private yard for £10,000 less than it could have been built for in a Royal Dockyard. Well, he was assured, on the authority of the Secretary of the Company who built her, that the £10,000 saved to the Admiralty, comparing it with other ships of the same type, represented £10,000 lost to the Company. He contended that even if it cost more in the first instance, which he did not admit, to build ships in the Royal Dockyards, it would cost less in the long run, because they would be certain of the character of the work; they would be in a position to make any necessary alterations during the process of the work, if absolutely essential; and they would keep their Dockyards in a state of thorough efficiency, ready to execute work on any emergency, which might be of the very greatest importance to the safety of the nation at an important crisis. Nothing could be more opportune than the proposal as to the new Intelligence Department. It was a very good idea, and the cost, perhaps, was not too extravagant; though he understood a considerable sum would have to be added for retirement pay. No one, he believed, grudged officers and seamen any plums which might fall to their share; but, nevertheless, he thought it well that economy in practice should not be confined to the bottom, but should also find its way to the top. He was assured that nothing in the recent discharges in the Dockyards, which had, to some extent, been recognized as necessary, had made them so unpopular as the fact that at the same time that these discharges were taking place new offices were created with very large salaries—salaries of £1,000 a-year or so. He thought it would be admitted that Members who had for years represented Dockyard constituencies would have some knowledge of matters connected with Dockyards, and that, in advocating the claims of persons employed there, they were actuated by higher motives than a desire to get votes. There was one point in the Statement which, perhaps, the noble Lord would be able to explain. It was not quite clear whether more discharges were contemplated. He did not ask for specific information on a subject of that kind, as he knew the Admiralty must be guided by the particular circumstances of the time. There was no more honest, straightforward, loyal body of men in existence, taking them as a whole, than those employed in our Dockyards. Coming to particular branches, he pleaded, in the first place, the claims of the shipwrights, and submitted that their case was one deserving of very serious consideration on the part of the Admiralty. It was not fair, he maintained, to apply the strict principles of supply and demand to their public servants. The law of supply and demand ought not to influence their treatment of them; but, even as a question of supply and demand, he would not admit for a moment that they could get plenty of men to take the place of these most loyal and skilled workers in the Dockyards. He desired to see them have something like fixity of tenure. Then there were the engine-room artificers, whose cause he had advocated for years, in the face of considerable opposition. Their claims had been strongly presented, though the suggestions had not been adopted, because it would involve spending more money. These engine-room artificers were, practically, in the same position now as they were in the days of wooden ships. Their position was much more important than in days gone by, requiring more education and outlay, and he wished the Lords of the Admiralty would take that into consideration in dealing with their modest requests. The claims of the warrant officers were such as the Treasury could hardly refuse, because they involved almost no outlay, while to concede them would be to increase the efficiency of the Service. In the next place he urged the importance of improving the position of naval schoolmasters, which was below that of any other schoolmasters in the country, including even their brethren in the Army. And, lastly, in a special way he called the attention of the Representatives of the Admiralty to the petition of the Dockyard men, not to a reduction of the working hours, but to such a re-adjustment of the hours as would enable them to take advantage of the long summer evenings for recreation and education—an object which could be attained by fixing the hour from 7 to 5 all the year round. He urged these things not merely as representing a Dockyard constituency, and, therefore, knowing something of their management, but because he sincerely believed that if these suggestions were carried out they would promote the great interests of the country.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I agree with the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston) that thanks are due from every professional man to the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) for the Statement which has been laid upon the Table, although there are some omissions in it. I only hope that the First Lord is right in saying that there will be a permanent change in the way of keeping the accounts. We have had so many changes, and there are so many difficulties in ascertaining what is going on with respect to work, whether under contract or in the Dockyards, that I am bound to say I have very little faith in any element of finality. We are told, practically, that the present Board of Admiralty have at last found out the one way in which all things are to be done aright. I trust that that may be so. Although I never had the honour of speaking on this subject in this House before, I think that anyone who has followed the manner in which the Estimates and the Accounts in regard to work done by contract and in the Dockyards has been carried out must have seen that there is room for very great improvement, and that no commercial firm, with the business-like capacity of which the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) has spoken, would keep their accounts in the way our Navy Accounts have been kept. The hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Devonport has spoken most truly, and most properly, in regard to the Dockyard establishments. It is quite impossible for the Navy to be maintained by private contracts. In a time of war wages go up rapidly, and we were taught by bitter experience in the Crimean War that private contracts were not fulfilled as they ought to have been—that the work itself was scamped; that prices were high; and that an enormous amount of money was spent in a way that was wholly unjustifiable, and can only be accounted for on the supposition that everybody was too much frightened at the notion of war to consider what was being done. I entirely endorse, also, the remarks of the hon. Member for Devonport as to the Petitions presented to the Admiralty from the shipwrights, the warrant officers, schoolmasters, artificers, and other classes; and I regret with the hon. Member that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty has not seen his way to give a more hopeful answer than he has been pleased to give. These are times of great depression in Dockyard labour, and, as a Dockyard Member, I can bear testimony to the great distress and misery which have been caused by the discharges to which reference has been made. In the Dockyard I represent the distress has been especially great, because there is no other opening for work there; and I deeply regret that the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty has been unable to see his way to allow these men to die a natural death, so to speak, which would have been the case if they had been left alone. In Pembroke Dockyard more than 100 men leave the Dockyard every year from age, sickness, &c., in the natural course of events. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty has been asked and has answered several Questions during the debate; but he has not told the House who is responsible for the designs and construction of such vessels as the Impérieux, and other vessels which have failed to meet the conditions as to speed, draught, and armour which were laid down for them? Why should ships be laid down and constructed in such an improper way without anyone having responsibility for them? Who is responsible for not adopting triple expansion engines in the Impérieuse and Warspite of 8,500, instead of compound engines of 7,500, and for reducing the armour-belt protection from 18 inches above water to 6 inches below the water line? Although the bunkers of these ships were constructed to hold 900 tons of coal, they are only able to carry 500 tons. It has been shown by the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed) that they will never be able properly to carry the amount of coal originally intended. One vessel—the Mercury—is only able to carry a supply of coal for three days and a-half, and for some mysterious reason that ship has never been commissioned except for a short trip across Bantry Bay as an experiment. In the first page of this Statement, credit seems to be taken for the fact that Dockyard labour is not allocated in the present year, as has been the practice in past years. But I think that that is a great mistake, because if the money is allocated as an Estimate it enables the Constructors of the Yards to forecast, to some extent, what they would have to do in the course of the year, and thus to regulate their staff. I do not see why money should not be allocated in the Estimates, the Board of Admiralty having the power to change the allocation as the year goes on. That would enable them to do with Admiralty knowledge what commercial yards are able to do at this moment, and would show them what work they would have to turn out in the Dockyard in the course of the year. I am sorry to observe, in the shipbuilding policy of the Admiralty, that they propose to build ships calculated to steam only $13\frac{1}{4}$ knots an hour. Under ordinary circumstances those vessels would not be able to keep up with the squadron, and they would only be competent, as was pointed out by Lord Ravensworth's Committee, to do the ordinary police work in a time of peace. Lord Ravensworth's Committee spoke of the construction of this kind of ship as a waste of the public money. I entirely concur in that opinion, believing that such vessels would be utterly useless for war purposes. The hon. Baronet the Member for Durham (Sir Charles Palmer) spoke at some length on the advantages of ships built by contract, and the hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Devonport mentioned the case of two small vessels, to show the advantage of Dockyard building as contrasted with contract building. In regard to the question as between Dockyard work and contract work there is no ground whatever for saying, if the accounts are kept in the same way in both cases, that ships can be built cheaper by contract than in the Royal Dockyards. Instead of two small vessels spoken of by the hon. Member for Devonport, let me take three large ships to illustrate this point—the Audacious, the Invincible, and the Iron Duke. The Iron Duke was built at Pembroke, and cost £208,000; the Audacious and Invincible were built by contract, and cost £256,000 and £249,000 respectively. In the one case there was an advantage of £48,000, and in the other of £41,000 in favour of the ship built at the Royal Dockyard at Pembroke. I may mention two later instances; those of the Benbow and the Anson. The cost of building and completing the Anson, of 6,640 tons, was £500,908. The contract price of the hull and extras for the Benbow—a sister ship—at the Thames Armour Works was £525,765. A further sum of £40,000 was provided to be spent on the Benbow at Chatham, making a total cost—according to official documents—of £565,765, or £64,857 more than the Anson, or at least, taking the contract price alone, £24,827 in favour of the Dockyard built ship. I am unable to account for these facts, clearly shown in the Estimates, on any other hypothesis than that the Dockyard ship is more cheaply built. I believe that I might adduce many other instances to show that it is a great mistake to suppose that a ship can be built cheaper in a private yard than in a Dockyard. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty has pointed out a case of failure of contract—I think it was a case of extra repairs—but it was due to the failure of the contractor under the conditions now imposed in a time of peace; and if such shortcomings occur now, what must we expect in time of war? In regard to Dockyard administration defect in the existing practice which I hope the Board of Admiralty will be able to remedy. I refer to the appointment of the Superintendents of the Dockyards for varying periods. They may serve for one or two years, or for six months only. But, as a matter of fact, in most cases they are not allowed to serve sufficiently long to master the details of the work before they are superseded. I believe I am right in saying that this custom is disapproved of by those who have the immediate control of the Dockyards, and that its continuance is due to the Treasury's refusal to grant the requisite money. One would have thought that the Lords of the Admiralty would have had sufficient power to obtain what money the country requires for the Navy, and not allow any Lord of the Treasury or Chancellor of the Exchequer, who knows nothing of the details of the Service, to interpose a veto on its complete efficiency. I am afraid that is one of the methods by which the money of the country is wasted. It is altogether impossible to have the Dockyards properly regulated when the officers are liable to be changed every six, 12, or 18 months, instead of being appointed for at least three, or, better still, five years. Those hon. Members of the House who have read the Report of Lord Ravensworth's Committee will be aware that it has been laid down by that Committee that only under special conditions can ships of war be repaired by contract advantageously, and yet I see in these Estimates a large item for repairing ships by contract. I regret to understand that something like £30,000, in addition, I suppose, to the £18,000 put down now, is to be expended on the Garnet, a ship which never exceeded 8 knots an hour, and which certainly ought not to be repaired at anything like such a cost. I think there are many other points which are worth looking into, and I trust that if a Committee is appointed to go through the Navy Estimates altogether, it will not be too late, when that Committee is nominated, to stop some of the expenditure, which seems manifestly a waste of money. There are only two other points on which I will touch to-night. One is the position of the Commanders-in-Chief at the Home Ports. In relation to that matter, those hon. Gentlemen who take the trouble to look into the Navy Estimates will probably perceive with surprise that while the Estimates are presumably signed by the Lords of the Admiralty and the Secretary to the Admiralty, there is one signature which is conspicuous by its absence, and that is the signature of the only Naval Lord—the noble and gallant Member for East Marylebone—who sits in this House (Lord Charles Beresford). The noble Lord, who seems to be the itinerant exponent of the Admiralty views, has spoken on the question of shipbuilding at the Mansion House, and at public meetings elsewhere, and it is to be presumed that his views are more or less endorsed by the Board of Admiralty. I have been told that each Lord who signs the Estimates does not thereby take upon himself the responsibility of the whole of the Vote; but each is responsible for that particular Vote which it is the business of his own Department to look after. Now I think that such a practice is most misleading. The reason given is that it is impossible for each of the Lords to spare time to go through the whole of the Estimates; but that, in my humble opinion, is their own fault. Why have they not time; and why are my Lords so overworked? It is on account of the far too great centralization of work of all sorts and in great detail at the Admiralty, and that they will not allow anybody outside to do any work at all. There is a Commander-in-Chief at Portsmouth, another at Devonport, and another at Sheerness, who are senior usually to the officers in the Admiralty, and often have been Lords of the Admiralty themselves; but such is the present system of conducting the Service that these Commanders-in-Chief have no power whatever, and have to refer everything to the Admiralty. It seems strange that when a man gets into an office he ceases to be the same naval officer he was before; but, somehow or other, when a naval officer gets into the Admiralty, he loses all his former views, and, believing himself omniscient, he tries to be omnipresent, and signally fails. I well remember a Commander-in-Chief at Portsmouth answering my expression of surprise that he could not give some small order without reference to the Admiralty by saying—"The Commander-in-Chief here was once a great man, but now he is only a big midshipman." Lord Ravensworth's Committee came to the conclusion that it is detrimental to the interests of the Service that so much technical detail should be gone into at the Admiralty. They say—

Mr. Puleston

“There is too much centralization of detail at the Admiralty causing delay and unnecessary correspondence, much of which might be avoided if a larger discretion in technical and minor matters were allowed to the Dockyard officers.”

If more discretion were allowed to the Commanders-in-Chief I believe that much labour might be saved to the Lords of the Admiralty. I will add the hope that the Committee now inquiring into the Civil Departments will also inquire into the Civil Departments of the Admiralty—an inquiry which was desired by Admiral Hornby. I think it would be well to employ some naval officers in those Civil Departments, in order to prevent the answers to Questions which are put in this House from being drawn up by civilians who do not know the meaning of the terms they write down. There is not a sufficient amount of technical information in the lower grades of the Admiralty, and a great saving both of money and time would be effected by employing officers on half-pay whose pay and pensions have at present to be provided by the country. I am certain there are half-pay officers whose employment at the Admiralty would supply that technical knowledge the lack of which is so often displayed by civilians receiving higher pay than need be given to the naval officers, already having half-pay of their rank and prospective pensions, and who would be glad of the employment. I have only one other point which I desire to bring before the House, and that is the question of naval education. I am afraid that I have already trespassed on the time of the House; but my excuse must be that this is the first time which I have trespassed upon its indulgence. I had hoped that hon. Members who have been in the House longer than I have would have spoken upon that subject, because it is one of considerable difficulty. The last Committee on Naval Education summed up all that has been done on the subject by two or three former Committees, and the result at which one arrives from reading carefully through the evidence is that naval officers are what they ought to be in spite of the system of education, and not on account of it. I know that great and useful changes have been made in the present system as it exists; and I hardly like, because I know I am going against the opinion of many officers who are better judges than I am—I hardly like to say I am absolutely in favour of those changes; but I should certainly like the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty to consider, among the improvements he desires to introduce, whether it would not be better to do away with the Britannia altogether. I feel very strongly that it would be better; and that, if we wish to get the very best material for the Navy, we should take that material from the great public schools of England—say, at the age of 15—and that we should then require the youths so selected to be restricted to an examination in what is taught at the schools, while special subjects should be studied afterwards. Admiral Ryder says cadets should be mainly drawn from the public schools, and that the subjects of examination should be those taught at the schools and no other, and he rightly lays great strength on physical qualities. I am sure that if the country wants, as it does want, officers with nerve sufficient to fight the enormous iron-clads of to-day as the ships of old were fought, it would be better to select youths of 14 or 15 from the public schools. Admiral Hornby says—

“I object to competitive examination of boys as adverse to true expansion and invigoration of intellectual faculties, because, to succeed in them, a boy ‘hath need of much cunning to seem to know that he doth not. If the entry is bad the next step confirms the evil. They are set to work far above their true capacity, and the natural result is made manifest as soon as they go to sea. Nineteen out of twenty who go to sea are reported as ungrounded, and the Naval Instructor has to begin to relay that proper foundation, which was broken when the boy was taken from his first school, and have to be taught from the point which was broken when the boy was taken from his first school.”

I am afraid that this is the case with most of the young gentlemen who are now sent to sea from the Britannia. I am sure that if we take a boy from a public school, and then send him straight to sea, we should get a much better officer after he had been a few years at sea. We should then bring him home and send him to the Naval College, when at an age to understand the value of and necessity for serious study, and that his future prospects would depend upon the use he then made of his time and opportunities. Admiral Hornby—admittedly the best practical tactician in the Service—says further—

“At present the country is burdened with a heavy expense, and the parent is relieved not only from that, but his natural responsibility of training his son. When once accepted, the training of these youths should commence as in the Scandinavian Navies—before the mast.”

I believe that a system of this sort would be far preferable to the present one, and in this opinion I am strongly supported by many distinguished naval officers.

Mr. R. W. DUFF (Banffshire) said, he must congratulate the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty on being in a position to ask for decreased Estimates with increased efficiency, but he thought the noble Lord would admit that the present satisfactory position was due very much to the fact that the programme of Lord Northbrook had been faithfully adhered to. He was glad the noble Lord had not to come down to them for those large Estimates which had pressed upon them last year, and he also rejoiced that he had not found it necessary to ask them to raise money by resorting to Terminable Annuities. The Naval Lord (Lord Charles Beresford) last year told the House that £5,500,000 were necessary to put the Navy in a satisfactory position; but he was glad to find that the noble Lord, in a position of responsibility, did not feel called upon to make that large demand upon the taxpayers of the country. The reduction was mainly due to the Shipbuilding Vote; but the whole reduction was very considerable and very satisfactory. He could not, however, help expressing his regret that the noble Lord had allowed something of a Party character to enter into the very able Statement which had been issued. The noble Lord had said that—

“In the period between 1881 and 1885 every Naval Power in Europe, except England, had largely increased its naval expenditure.”

Yes; but this led to one of two conclusions—that they never had a Navy at all before 1881, or else that it was kept up until 1881 and then suddenly allowed to run down. That was not correct, as the noble Lord would find if he carried his researches beyond 1881. The fact was that both sides had their scares; and after the Conservative scare in 1877, when several additional ships were added to the Navy, the supply of new vessels had been allowed to run down. From the years 1878-9 to 1880-1 inclusive, the expenditure on Votes 6 and 10 averaged £3,718,708. The then succeeding years of the Liberal Government 1881-2 to 1883-4 showed an average on these Votes of £4,166,850—being an increase of £448,149. He thought those figures sufficiently disproved the allegation in the noble Lord's (Lord George Hamilton's) Statement. He could not quite accept the noble Lord's statement as to the Ordnance Department. It was a difficult question. The old system was universally condemned, but it was difficult to decide on the plan to take its place. He was quite certain they must get their own guns, but there must be responsibility. The Admiralty ought to be in a position to say “We want a gun,” and then, if it bursts, lay their hands on the right man and tell him—“You are responsible for this gun, and you must go.” He should be very glad, therefore, to know from the First Lord of the Admiralty how he intended to carry out the change he contemplated, and also what was proposed to increase the facilities for the coaling of war ships at the home ports, these facilities not being at all satisfactory at the present time. With regard to the shipbuilding policy, he hoped that the vessels which the Admiralty were going to lay down would come up to the expected speed, and if they did, they would be very satisfactory vessels. He trusted, also, that the personnel of the Navy would not be neglected. The Report to which he proposed to direct attention was the result of the deliberations of a Committee appointed in 1885 by Lord Northbrook's Board of Admiralty. Dealing with the Report, he did not think it necessary to dwell upon the competency of the Committee to investigate the subject referred to them, because that would be universally admitted; but he might briefly remind the House that the Chairman, Admiral Luard, added to his other professional qualifications that of having occupied for a considerable time the responsible office of President of the Royal Naval College at Greenwich, and that he consequently enjoyed special facilities for forming an opinion on the working of our present educational system by being brought in constant contact with young officers at a time when they had almost completed their professional studies. The same might be said of Mr. Niven, who, for a considerable period, had occupied, with great advantage to the Service, the important office of Director of Studies at the College at Greenwich. Lord Dalhousie, as those who were in the House in 1880 would remember by the able speech he then made on the subject, had long given his attention to this question; and, having served for two years as Commander of the Britannia, might also be said to have had special opportunities of acquiring a clear insight into the working of our existing educational system. If Members would look to the other names on the Committee, it would be admitted that they were all Gentlemen well qualified to deal with the subject both from a naval and a civilian point of view. The subject dealt with in the Report was by no means a novel one. It had been frequently discussed in this House, and by competent naval authorities elsewhere. He would best consult the convenience of the House if he addressed his remarks principally to the recommendations contained in the concluding chapter, under head (f)—

“To consider and offer opinions on any suggestions for the improvement of the education of executive naval officers.”

The evidence before the Committee all tended to prove that the Navy of to-day had entirely outgrown our system of training young officers; that the changes we had already made in our system were not commensurate with the rapid changes which had taken place in the Navy, and which necessitated a higher and more scientific education—he would not say than we had aimed at, but than our officers generally had hitherto attained. The two main defects in our system were—first, that we entered our cadets too young; and, secondly, that we endeavoured to combine school work with the teaching of the duties of our officers—two branches of education which, in the opinion of the Committee, ought to be kept separate. But before referring to the objection to the early age of entry mentioned by the Committee, he wished to revert to their objection to the present system of nomination to cadetships. At present the system was one of close nomination subject to a limited competition. If the present system was to be continued, much might be said in favour of the existing distribution of patronage; but if the age of entry was raised it would lead to a much better system, as the Admiralty would then be able to open the Service to public school competition. On this the Committee remarked—

“That the system of nomination, however admirably worked, limits the choice of candidates, and places artificial difficulties in the way of getting into the Navy.”

He did not think that, while the officers of our Army and the Civil Service were selected by a system of open competition, the country would be satisfied while an equally popular branch of the Public Service was recruited by a system of nomination. So long as they continued their present system of entering boys between 12 and 13½, he was perfectly aware that open competition was impossible. Competitive examination at such an age, as had already been proved, was no test of fitness. But let them adopt the recommendations of the Committee—enter their cadets at the age of 15, and throw the competition open to the public schools of the country—and they would then get rid of the difficulty—some First Lords had even called it the “nuisance”—of nominations, and they would have a far wider field from which to draw the material for their future naval officers. Let him briefly say what the course of a young officer's training was from the time of his obtaining his cadetship till he became a sub-lieutenant. He entered the Britannia between 12 and 13½, the average time of entry was 13. After two years, in passing out, he became a midshipman, in which capacity he had to serve five years in a sea-going ship, unless by special merit he had gained time in passing out of the Britannia. He was then examined in seamanship, and, passing, became an acting sub-lieutenant, went to Greenwich for six months, and was examined in navigation, if successful joined the Excellent for a three months' course of gunnery and torpedo instruction, followed by an examination, and then a two months' course of pilotage, also followed by an examination, completed the officer's education for a lieutenant's commission. It would thus be seen that the compulsory course of study was from seven to eight years. Under favourable conditions this should be a long enough period to give us efficiently educated officers. But, in the opinion of the Committee, this object was not attained. One of the chief causes of failure was the early entry. On this point there seemed to be a general consensus of opinion, even among those who did not agree with all the recommendations of the Committee. Mr. Aldous, Chief Instructor of the Britannia, said—

“After the rush through various subjects, by which a certain standard is attained, I do not think it possible that any but the most extraordinary young minds could have so learnt the subjects as to retain them for future use. Two conditions are required to produce a thorough knowledge of this course of study—advanced age in the pupil when entered and a longer time under instruction.”

If hon. Members would look at the examination required both for entering and passing out of the Britannia, given by Mr. Aldous, they would see that the standard, especially in mathematics, was a very high one indeed for boys at the ages of 13 and 15 respectively. But the opinion expressed by Mr. Aldous was entirely confirmed by the evidence of the young officers themselves. Lieutenant Wilson told the Committee—

“That it is the general opinion of the Service that a cadet, on leaving the Britannia, passes a better examination than a sub-lieutenant entering Greenwich.”

A statement confirmed by the evidence of Lieutenants Burney and Evan Thomas. He would ask the House for a moment to consider the real significance of the opinion he had quoted—that a young officer, on going to Greenwich, knew less than one passing out of the Britannia. It was the severest possible condemnation of the present system, because it showed that the most important years for educational purposes—the years from 15 to 19 or 20—had been completely wasted for all purposes of scientific education; while, at the same time, owing to the altered conditions of the Service, there had been no advance in purely professional education which would in any degree compensate for the loss in scientific knowledge, and this at a time when it was universally admitted that science in almost every branch was revolutionizing our Navy. Ten sub-lieutenants out of 24 recently failed at Greenwich. Now, the early entry had an important bearing on this point, as it was maintained by the Committee that if boys entered the Navy at a later age, when they had been well grounded in general education, they would be far better able, in after years, to retain the learning they received on board the Britannia than they were now. He wished now to refer briefly to the second main objection he had mentioned—namely, the attempt to combine school work with the teaching of our officers. The Committee said—

Mr. R. W. Puff

“Each part of a naval officer's training ought to be given him under the most favourable circumstances possible, in order that when there is so much to learn there may be no want of force in learning it. Hence school work should be got over on shore, and seamanship and the detailed duties of our officers learnt afloat. It would be as great a waste of power to attempt to teach practical seamanship to school boys on shore as it is to teach elementary mathematics to officers afloat, and for the same reason.”

However desirable it might have been in past times to combine the two branches of education, in the present day it was impossible—first, because the scholastic education required was far more scientific; and, secondly, because there was not the same means of acquiring seamanship and general professional knowledge while serving afloat as there was 30 or even 20 years ago. Sailing vessels, especially small craft, where midshipmen frequently performed the duties intrusted to lieutenants in larger vessels, were very much reduced in number; consequently the same opportunities were not now afforded to midshipmen as formerly, when they often had charge of a watch, and were sent away for weeks together in charge of boats while suppressing the Slave Trade. All these duties, as, he might say, he knew from personal experience, 30 years ago gave a young officer a sense of responsibility. It gave him self-reliance and that readiness of decision so essential to a naval officer at a much earlier age than those qualities were to be acquired by a midshipman, the greater portion of whose time was now spent on board an iron-clad, often in harbour. But, concurrently with losing many opportunities of acquiring seamanship and general professional knowledge from actual service afloat, there came greater demands on the officer's scientific knowledge. The Committee reminded us that we were not living in an age when we could say, as Nelson could, that the only branches of knowledge indispensable to an officer were that "he should dance and speak French; all the rest would come by instinct." Steam, iron-clads, improved artillery, torpedoes, electricity, and complicated machinery of every description had sprung up since those times. Mr. Tims, Naval Instructor, gave us some of his experiences. Speaking of the time the midshipmen had for work, he said—

"I consider 12 hours a-week a good average; owing to many interruptions it was often much less."

Then, as to the conditions under which the instruction had to be given, Mr. Tims went on to say—

"The great difficulty the Naval Instructor has to contend with is the want of a suitable place for study. Sometimes the captain will allow the use of his cabin; then matters go comparatively well. The only obstacles to study are sea-sickness, heat, cold, and the thumping of the screw. But when relegated to the half-deck the school is held at a very insecure table, in a place about as private as an underground railway station. All noises and smells to which the ship is liable seem to be concentrated round that table. . . . I have a very lively recollection of the torpedoes being charged with compressed air just ahead of our school, so that the copper tube from the air pump was led under our table among our feet. Under such circumstances privacy is impossible."

In no Navy but our own was there an attempt to combine the school teaching with the professional duties of an officer. Let him now turn to the recommendations of the Committee, suggested to remove some of the defects. First, with regard to admission to the Service, they recommended that our future naval officers be drawn from the public schools of the country; that a first selection of candidates at about the age of 15 be made by means of the examination for lower certificates conducted by the Oxford and Cambridge School Examination Board; that the selected candidates be then specially educated; that at the age of 16 they be again examined by Civil Service Commissioners; that the final selection be determined by adding the marks gained at the first examination to those obtained at the second; that the successful candidates be appointed as cadets to the Britannia for one year; that the Britannia be moored in the Solent in the vicinity of Portsmouth, and that training brigs and one steamer be attached to her; that at the age of 17 the cadets join a sea-going ship as midshipmen for three years; that theoretical instruction now cease to be compulsory and be distinctly of a professional and practical character; that at the age of 20 or 21 the midshipman, on passing in seamanship, become an acting sub-lieutenant, and go to Greenwich and to the Excellent much as at present. Our officers, in point of scientific education, were far behind the best educated officers in Foreign Navies. That might seem a strong statement to make, but it was one which was fully supported by the evidence of Captains Kane and Nicholson before the Committee. These officers had held appointments as naval attachés, and had, therefore, had the best possible opportunities of forming an opinion of the relative merits of our own and foreign officers. Captain Kane said—

"In certain of the Foreign Navies the officers from 20 to 30—that is, the sub-lieutenants and the lieutenants—are better educated, and, I think, are better officers, taking them all round, than ours are. Do you think they are more efficient as officers?—Yes; I think they are more efficient as officers—that is to say, in certain Navies."

While Captain Nicholson characterizes the state of education in the Navy as "deplorable," Professor Soley, in his Report to the Secretary of the United States Navy, said—

"The high scientific and professional attainments of many English naval officers are not in consequence but in spite of their early education."

A perusal of the evidence given by the lieutenants before the Committee certainly justified Professor Soley's opinion, for the system of education was, perhaps, more strongly condemned by them than by any other witnesses. He could not, however, refrain from reminding the House of the gallant manner in which those officers performed their duties while employed with the Naval Brigade during the Egyptian Campaign. He was sure the noble Lord opposite, his gallant Friend the Member for Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford), who himself took such an active and honourable part in those engagements, would bear him out when he said that the rate of mortality among the officers of the Naval Brigade was enormously high, and that this was due to the lieutenants sticking to their guns against overwhelming odds, and that the manner in which they died at their posts was the best evidence that in their fighting qualities the rising generation of officers were well qualified to maintain the reputation of the Service. There was another point bearing on the general recommendations of the Committee which the Admiralty would not be able to overlook—namely, that many of the vessels they were now building, such as the fast cruisers, as noticed in Captain Nicholson's evidence, had no accommodation for midshipmen; and they must, therefore, of necessity be educated elsewhere. The Service would gain by this change, for the duties midshipmen had frequently to perform were little use to them as an education. Those duties were chiefly confined to keeping watch, often walking the deck in harbour, to seeing the decks swept, to speaking down tubes, and to seeing the ashes thrown overboard. It seemed absurd to sacrifice an acquirement in scientific knowledge for the performance of trivial duties which could be equally well performed by petty officers. Exception had been taken by some high naval authorities to the recommendations of the Report on the ground that too much of the young officers' time would be taken up by study, and that their practical education in seamanship was going to be sacrificed to mathematics; but with training ships attached to the Britannia, and with three years afloat after the age of 17, he thought there would be ample time to learn seamanship. Lieutenant Cecil Burney, in his Paper given in Appendix 3, pointed out that the age for entry of boys in our training ships was between 15 and 16½. Surely, if this were considered young enough to commence the training of our future seamen, who would not be drafted into regular sea-going ships till they were 19 or 20, and then have practical seamanship to learn, 17 was not too late to send our future officers regularly to sea. Another objection had been taken on the ground that the age was too advanced to obtain candidates, and that when obtained they would not take to a sea life. But on these grounds the Committee entertained no apprehensions. They pointed out that boys now entered the Navy at an age when they were quite incompetent to select a profession for themselves—that many, when so entered, found out when it was too late that Nature never intended them for naval officers. On the other hand, there were many boys well qualified for a sea life who at the age of 14 were prevented from joining the Navy because they were too old. The Committee were satisfied that whatever might be lost by postponing the age of entry would be more than compensated for by securing increased intelligence, and they were confident that the popularity of the Navy as a profession would secure an ample number of candidates from our public schools. They reminded them that when sea life was far rougher than it was now many officers went to sea at a more advanced age than they now did, and became excellent officers. Perhaps the most conspicuous illustration of the success of a late entry into the Navy was to be found in that of the first Flag officer he served under—the late Lord Dundonald—the brilliancy of whose naval career he believed stood second alone to that of Nelson. Yet we were told by Lord Dundonald in the Autobiography of a Seaman that he originally entered the Army, and did not go to sea till he was 17½ years old. Yet so impressed was Lord Dundonald of the importance of education for the due performance of the duties of a naval officer, that we found him, eight years after he had entered the Navy, employing his time while on half-pay by studying at the Edinburgh University, where, along with the late Lord Palmerston and a brilliant group of men who subsequently became famous as statesmen and men of letters, he was a student of Dugald Stewart's. He thought the critics of the Committee's Report would do well to bear this illustration in mind before condemning the recommendations as pedantic. Before bringing his remarks to a close he desired to say a word on a subject constantly referred to by the witnesses examined before the Committee—namely, the desirability of continuing the Britannia at all. For his own part, he thought a College on shore at some naval port, with training vessels attached, would be far preferable to this old hulk. It would, undoubtedly, be healthier in every way. It would give greater facilities both for study and for obtaining exercise. That was the opinion of Captain Bowden-Smith, the captain of the Britannia, and Mr. Aldous, the Chief Instructor, and of most of the other witnesses. The idea when the Britannia was established was that it was desirable to accustom cadets as early as possible to a sea life. But he had always failed to understand how sea life was to be acquired on board an old hulk moored head and stern, and with no rigging but an old jury mast. He considered the system pursued at Greenwich School, where many of our future seamen were educated—although, of course, the standard of education was much lower—to be healthier and better in many respects than that on board the Britannia. But he might remind the House that this question was decided by the Admiralty more than 12 years ago, when the late Mr. Ward Hunt announced, in introducing the Estimates, his intention of abolishing the Britannia and substituting for her a College on shore. That step was approved by his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), who held the Office of Secretary to the Admiralty in the Government which preceded Mr. Ward Hunt's, and who told the House that it was the intention of the First Lord of the Admiralty (the present Chancellor of the Exchequer) to abolish the Britannia had he remained at the Admiralty. He hoped that in his present Office his right hon. Friend would assist in carrying out this necessary reform. It only remained for him to assure hon. Members that he had only been induced to trespass on their patience because he was deeply impressed with the importance of the subject alike to the Naval Service and to the country. It was also a subject of deep interest to aspirants for naval cadetships, as well as to their parents and relatives. On these grounds he thought he was entitled to claim for it some share of public attention. There was abundant evidence that at no previous period of our history had the country been more deeply impressed than it now was with the necessity of maintaining unimpaired the efficiency of our Navy. It was because he believed that on the early solution of this question in the manner indicated by the Committee's Report much of that efficiency ultimately depended that he had ventured to trouble the House with these observations.

Mr. R. W. Duff

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) said, he was desirous to add his humble meed of praise to the thanks already accorded to the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) for his labours in the re-organization of the Department and for the changes he had brought about. Still, he was constrained by a sense of public duty to criticize in some degree the acts of the noble Lord and of some of his Predecessors. He thanked the noble Lord for the answer given to his Question about the want of dock accommodation at Bombay, and he hoped that that serious want would soon be supplied. It was a public scandal that the Indian Government and the Home Government should have a petty squabble as to which of them should pay for this work, which was so greatly needed. He would remind the House that there was no dock in which ships could be repaired nearer than Malta, a distance of 4,000 miles from that part of India. While at Bombay a few years ago he had closely examined this question, and all he could say was that it was a shame the work should have remained so long unexecuted. He also hoped that certain rumours which he had heard respecting the non-completion of Haulbowline Dock at Queenstown were not correct, for he was sure that naval men earnestly desired that that dock should be completed. Indeed, the work should have been carried out long ago. He could not pass by one or two observations which had fallen from the last speaker (Mr. Duff). He thought the contests between the two Front Benches about expenditure for naval and military requirements were very trivial indeed. The country did not complain about the amount of the money, but only wanted to get the money's worth for the money which was spent. He noticed that one or two hon. Members had argued in favour of the abolition of the Britannia training ship. For his own part, he was strongly opposed to its abolition, and the substitution of a Naval College in its place; and he was also opposed to open competition for the Navy, as the present system of competition of three candidates for each vacancy was very good and useful; therefore, when it was found that naval men in that House were divided on those burning questions, he hoped the Admiralty would take its own line and come to a compromise. In his opinion, the Memorandum of the First Lord of the Admiralty on the state of the Navy ought to be supplemented by a Report from each Naval Lord who was placed in charge of a particular Department. At present the Naval Lords were unable to make known to the public what their opinions were. If the present First Naval Lord, who was responsible for the personnel of the Navy and partly for the matériel, were to make a Report and tell all he knew, the eyes of the country would be opened, and salutary changes would soon be effected. Under the existing system the Naval Lords were muzzled, and compelled to confine their opinions within the four walls of the Admiralty. In 1884, at the time of the Russian scare, the condition of the Navy was such that naval men were really alarmed. He appealed to the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, the Junior Naval Lord of the Admiralty (Lord Charles Beresford)—as a young naval officer—to say whether he was satisfied that England could have entered into that contest and come out of it satisfactorily; and if he did not share the doubts so freely expressed by older ones? The great evil in this country was the want of continuity in naval administration and policy. First Lords went in and out with one side or the other, and there was no continuity or system in our naval policy. Why, on a change of Ministry, should Naval Lords be sent about their business, perhaps just when they were becoming accustomed to their work? The Board of Admiralty was undermanned in respect of Naval Lords. It was still short by one Naval Lord of the number which Sir James Graham, the Duke of Somerset, and other distinguished men thought the right one, although the requirements of the Service were now much greater than they were in the Duke of Somerset's time. Every Naval Lord was now greatly overworked. This accounted in a measure for the blunders that had been committed. A First Naval Lord, he had heard, used to take a file of papers home from the Office and study them until 1 o'clock in the morning. It was true that an improvement had now been introduced by the institution of a strong Intelligence Department. The Board would henceforth be compelled to think out a naval policy and to form plans of campaign—[Hon. Rule Cheers] —good plans of the right sort—he hoped, not bad ones—with the Plan of Campaign of hon. Gentlemen opposite he had no sympathy. The First and Second Sea Lords ought each to have the assistance of a Post Captain as secretary. In France, Germany, and Russia a rule of that kind prevailed. Fifty to 60 naval officers were employed at the French Admiralty, whilst our Service was starved for want of technical skill and intelligence. He regretted the re-constitution of the Board of Admiralty in 1869 by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers). He had nothing but respect for the ability and strong will of the right hon. Gentleman, though, at the same time, he deplored the results of that strong will. But the right hon. Gentleman did not always follow up his own opinions. Before he left Office he told Sir Sydney Dacres that the first thing which ought to be done in certain events was to appoint another Naval Lord; but he did not do it. However, his Successor did, and, so far, there was something gained, though still the executive authority should be strengthened; whereas, by the unhappy Order in Council of 1869, it had been greatly weakened; before that date it was exercised by six Lords and a Controller, but since then by only four Lords and a Controller, until 1872, when it was augmented to five Lords and a Controller. There was, moreover, this further drawback—that the Naval Lords were not responsible as formerly. The Board, whose history dated back to the time of Henry VI., was re-constituted under an Act passed in the Reign of William and Mary, 1690, and being thus constituted by an Act of Parliament it ought not to have been made to undergo change by the operation of an Order in Council. What the right hon. Gentleman could not do directly he ought not to have done indirectly. The then existing Board of Admiralty was practically abolished by the right hon. Gentleman in 1869, and the First Sea Lord was reduced to the position of little better than a chief clerk's. This change was in opposition to the views expressed by more than one Parliamentary Committee, and notably to the views of Sir James Graham—the creator of the Board of Admiralty as it was known before 1869—who said, before a Committee of the House of Lords in 1872—

Admiral Field

“It is my opinion that the Board of Admiralty never could work, unless the First Lord were supreme, and does exercise controlling authority I have made it my study to make myself master of the origin of the power exercised by the First Lord at the Board, the constitution of the Board, its powers, and its legal origin; the more I have investigated the matter the more I am satisfied that, like the Common Law in aid of the Statute Law, the power exercised by the Board of Admiralty and the different Members of it rests more upon usage than upon the Patents—uninterrupted usage from a very early period; and, my conviction being such as I have stated, I am led to view with increased apprehension any great change that will supersede that usage and prescription. . . . I am of opinion that there will be great danger in attempting to touch the Patents. . . . I infinitely prefer, therefore, upon the whole, the maintenance of the existing Patents in concurrence with the established usage of centuries.”

His complaint was that at the present moment there was no Naval Board really acting as a Board of Admiralty. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh abolished it when he introduced his Order in Council. There was no reason for abolishing it except the right hon. Gentleman's will. They admired men of strong will in the Navy. He admired a man with a strong back—in the Navy they did not care much for weak or limp men—but whereas in the Navy a man before he could be in a position to do any harm had to pass through 20 years' training, a politician could go to the Admiralty perfectly raw, and if he were a strong man of resolute will he was like a certain animal in a china shop. He challenged the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone to deny that he was speaking the sentiments of the Navy. The Naval Lords should be administrators de facto as well as de jure, or else they should abolish them altogether and rule the Navy entirely by civilians. All they asked in the Navy was that there should be a little modesty on the part of those distinguished men who came to rule over them, and who were ignorant of the feelings, the traditions, and he feared sometimes even of the history of the Service. He (Admiral Field) would refer to the evidence of Sir Spencer Robinson to show that under the existing system the naval element was not sufficiently represented on the Board of Admiralty, and that under former systems matters were better conducted. If each Sea Lord or Head of a Division of the Admiralty were obliged to make a Report, to be laid on the Table of the House of Commons, the public would see what the Naval Lords thought ought to be done, and he thought that the House would then insist on the requirements of the Navy being met. They had irresponsibility now, because that odious Order in Council had made the Sea Lords responsible only to the First Lord. That Order ought to be withdrawn, and the naval business of the country conducted upon the system under which our great naval battles were fought and won. What gave force and validity to the orders emanating from the Admiralty was the fact that they were supposed to embody the views of distinguished naval men, and not the views of a civilian First Lord. Naval men believed that in time of war the present system would break down and end in disaster. The Naval Lords ought to be made responsible for their own work, not to the First Lord, as to their master, but to the House and the country. The First Lord was supreme, and they did not deny that; but, in the name of all that was fair and just, they ought not to be treated in this way by ambitious politicians. The Chairman of Committees some time ago said—“When men enter this House they ought to try and imbibe something of its Parliamentary spirit.” He would say when Civil First Lords, knowing nothing of the Service, were made the nominal head of it, they, too, might try and drink in something of the naval spirit. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer, when First Lord of the Admiralty, said that whoever was at the head of that Department ought to try and carry the naval opinion with him, and he did so, and the Service honoured him for it. The right hon. Member for South Edinburgh had abolished the office of Storekeeper of the Dockyards; but the present Chancellor of the Exchequer had felt bound to restore that office. The right hon. Member for South Edinburgh had abolished the office of Captain of Steam Reserve at Sheerness Dockyard, and shortly afterwards the Megara was lost. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer restored that office, and had also felt bound to replace the Naval Lords of the Admiralty whom the right hon. Member for South Edinburgh had swept away. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had reversed many other steps that the right hon. Member for South Edinburgh had taken. But he supposed that he did not like to hit his Predecessor too hard, and therefore he did not withdraw the Order in Council of 1869, but modified it by that of 1872. He wished it to be understood that he did not desire in any way to supersede or to interfere with the authority of the First Lord. All he asked was that there should be sufficient naval men at the Board to give the assistance and advice which was absolutely necessary if the Navy was to be maintained in a continuous state of efficiency. The First Lord of the Treasury and the First Lord of the Admiralty knew the feeling of the Navy upon this question as well as any men; and he said if his brother officers were worthy to be Naval Lords let them be Naval Lords de facto, and if they were not worthy let them be turned out altogether. There were no men in the country more capable or more loyal to authority than naval men. Sir James Graham said naval officers were the very best instruments of Governments; and Lord Palmerston once stated that if he had a difficult job to get done, and was in doubt as to who should carry it out, he always sent for a naval officer. Hon. Members might ask how it was that the Naval Lords sat tamely under that Order in Council? It was because the Naval Lords were loyal to the authorities which existed. They did not like the way in which they were treated; but, like the eels that were skinned, they made no complaint—because they could not help it. They were asked why they did not agitate outside the Admiralty. The fact was that discipline was the pivot upon which the whole Service turned, and naval men did not approve of discussing these naval questions out-of-doors; and it was unseenly, improper, and contrary to the Regulations for them to write to the newspapers. The only place in which naval opinion could legitimately make itself felt was in that House. He did not pretend to set himself up as the exponent of naval opinion in that House; but if he had made no impression upon any hon. Members in the speech he had just delivered he had been wasting the time of the House. He could assure hon. Members that nothing but the strongest sense of duty would have induced him to speak upon that occasion. The point he desired to make clear to the House was that if the Admiralty, which was the central Departmental power of the Navy, was faulty, everything connected with the Navy would be faulty. The fact was that the Naval Lords had been unfairly treated. He was on the Retired List, and so was not speaking for himself, but was doing what he could for the good of the Profession. He was on the Retired List because of the Rules of the right hon. Member for Edinburgh. He (Admiral Field) did not bear the right hon. Gentleman any ill-will for that—the right hon. Gentleman did it with the best intentions for the good of the Service. Captains in the Navy had to retire at the age of 55, but politicians thought that they could be first-class politicians and statesmen right up to and over 70; but he ventured to say that a naval man of 55 had more nerve about him than a politician at 75, and would make a better public servant in any capacity. He could not be of any service in the Navy, because the turnpike bar had been thrown across his path; but he thought that he might be of some service to the Navy in that House. He knew that he could not be an Admiral on the Active List in the Navy by the time he was 55, so he took up politics—worse luck. [Laughter.] He said worse luck, because he would tell them frankly the Navy had no great respect for politicians. He, however, had a good deal of respect for a certain class of politicians, but not for all. But, humble individual as he was, having taken up this kind of life—he had been 13 years at it now—he had stood four contests and had been successful in two of them—having once got into that House he intended to remain there for years, and do what little good he could for the Naval Service in which it was the greatest honour of his life to have served. He intended to do the best he could for his brother officers, who could not speak for themselves, and he would never rest until this burning injustice to his Profession was removed. The history of the Navy covered the most glorious epoch in our national life, and its opinions and susceptibilities ought not lightly to be set aside or disregarded by politicians. He hoped, therefore, the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty would attentively consider the evidence given by Sir James Graham, the Duke of Somerset, and the others which he had quoted, and would endeavour to bring the administration of the Navy into accord with naval sentiment.

Admiral Field

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD (A LORD of the ADMIRALTY) (Marylebone, E.): As one of the Naval Lords, perhaps the House will allow me to say a few words on the question which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. M. Maclean) has brought forward. There are other questions which I should also like to speak upon; but the hour is late, and this subject is of so much importance that I will confine my remarks to it. For a long time there has been a general feeling in the country that the system of organization in the Admiralty is not so good as it ought to be. I will endeavour to show how it has been brought about. It is the penalty we pay for Party government—a different policy is pursued by different Parties when they come into Office. One Government may think it necessary to reduce the Estimates, and the next Government, on coming in, perhaps goes on with the Estimates for the moment; but when there is a possibility of war they consult naval experts as to what is requisite, and the result is that very large Supplementary Estimates are brought in. In other words, large Estimates are necessary to pay for what the country wants in consideration of receiving it in a time of panic. The system of the Admiralty has always been based on the principle of Party government, and seamen—experts—have really had nothing to do with the government of the Admiralty. Let me explain what I mean. Take the question of shipbuilding. The men who have to fight the ships know exactly what they want, and understand modern requirements—what guns they ought to have, where they should be placed, what speed the vessels should have, what coal they should carry, what horse-power is required, and what complement of men is necessary to fight the ships and take them into action. But the seamen on the Board have very little to say to it. The scheme my noble Friend has brought in is, I think, as nearly perfect as it could be. The seamen are to say what is required for a ship, and each will put a Minute on the design that will be submitted to them by the Constructor, showing where the guns are to be placed, and the arc of range they are to have, and the scheme will then be passed on to the Controller, and so each individual will be individually responsible for the ships built. It would then be referred to the Board; they would order the vessel to be constructed, and by these means the country will have a proper fighting ship turned out quickly. The construction of a ship in this way would take two years and five months, instead of seven years, like the Inflexible, and you will get it for a considerably less sum of money than under the old régime. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Admiral Field) has made one mistake as to the Order in Council made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He will find that the wording of the Order is that it should be rescinded, and he is wrong in thinking that the Order of the right hon. Gentleman is in force at the present moment. My noble Friend the First Lord has gone further. He has added to the responsibility of each Member of the Board of Admiralty. Every Member of the Board will put a Minute on the Paper and sign it, so that each Member will be individually responsible, instead of there being the sort of haphazard system of organization that formerly prevailed. With respect to the question brought forward by the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston), some people have been good enough to give me credit for the institution of the Intelligence Department. It would be better to give the credit to the Board. In my opinion, this Department will be of the utmost importance to the Admiralty. I will give my reasons. Ships are built, and seamen are paid that they may be ready in time of war. War in these days is a question of electricity. In the old days there was no kind of organization whatever. I am not blaming our Predecessors, but the system. Time after time seamen have represented the necessity for a Department such as the Intelligence Department; but there has been nothing in this country resembling the Naval Intelligence Departments in Germany, France, Russia, and other Continental countries. An organization was required which shall enable the Navy to be prepared for time of war. When war is declared, a country like England, with a vast Empire which can be assailed at so many points, requires a complete organization, and for that purpose the Intelligence Department is of the utmost importance. With reference to this question of Party government, I will mention one circumstance which will illustrate clearly its working. The discharges of Dockyard workmen which we have heard of were the result of Party government. One Party said they could not turn the men off because of the Vote; but the State should not make the Dockyards a charitable institution. If you had a continuation of policy, you would not get rid of the Dockyard men as you do now. It is very hard on the men to be turned off suddenly; and if there were a continuity of policy in everything connected with the Naval Service, instead of the weather-cock policy that now prevails, there would be no necessity for turning men off suddenly. During the course of the debate many remarks have been made, and no doubt many remarks of a similar description will be made, as to officers of the Navy wishing money to be spent. That is not the case at all. Officers in the Service do not wish to spend money. They wish so to organize the Service that the country may not have to spend more than is necessary. What occurs at present? When war looms on the horizon, Parliament says to the experts—and it is the same at the War Office—"What do you want?" The officers then represent what they do want, and they get the credit of asking for the money which is spent, as it often has been in times of scare, in a wrong way. I maintain that each individual in the Board should be allowed the right of expressing his opinion on the large questions affecting the Navy. The hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) made a remark with reference to seamen and shipbuilding. I am delighted to hear the remark, because I remember a publication of the hon. Member's which appeared in Macmillan's Magazine, in which he said—"Seamen must bow their proud heads at the altar of science." I am disposed to remark on that, that "Seamen have often shaken their wise heads at the altar of doubt;" because many ships have been turned out without the opinion of Members of the Board having been obtained—without the opinion of men who have to use these ships for the benefit of the country. The hon. Member for Banffshire (Mr. R. W. Duff) taunted me regarding an expression of opinion to which I gave utterance last year in the House of Commons. The hon. Gentleman has not quite gathered my meaning. What I said was this—To put the Navy in the state of defence in which the taxpayers thought it was would require £5,000,000. I elaborated this view in detail. That was my opinion in order to reduce the danger to our trade, our floating wealth, our food supply, and the defence of our ports to a minimum. I adhere to every word which I uttered on that occasion. In time of war the country would be most severely hit during the first three weeks of the outbreak, and in order to reduce the danger to a minimum, I adhere to the view I previously took on the subject. Of course, the hon. Gentleman knows that when a Member of Parliament is in Office he cannot do all that he wished when out of Office. [Laughter.] My hon. Friends laugh; but the First Lord of the Admiralty will bear me out when I say that not only in private, but in public, I have persistently put forward my ideas with the view of strengthening the Navy, and placing it in that condition in which it ought to be placed. I therefore cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite that it is all Party judgment.

Lord Charles Beresford

MR. R. W. DUFF: I referred to the statement which had been made as to the condition of the Navy from 1880 to 1884, and I pointed out that the Estimates for 1881 had been omitted.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD: But from 1881 to 1884 and 1885 we were living on our capital. It is when we come to a time of panic that we find so many stores which ought to have been replaced by the Estimates for the year are deficient. Recent occurrences in the Navy have been due to want of system, want of organization, and want of responsibility on the part of individual Members of the Board to the Board. An hon. Member has asked how it is that my name does not appear on the Estimates. The reason is, because the Estimates were brought to me too late. I told my noble Friend that I would not sign them. My noble Friend replied—"You must do what you think proper." And the reason why I did not sign the Estimates was because each name on the Estimates, I think, should mean that the individual is responsible for the whole Estimate, or if such individual is only responsible for his Vote, it should be clearly put in black and white for what he is responsible. Next year I shall probably get the Estimates in time to study them thoroughly, and then I will sign them. The object of the Board is to have a Fleet as efficient as it can be made, not to spend a shilling more than is necessary, and to let the public know, as far as possible, how that money is spent. I believe in publicity. The new system which my noble Friend has inaugurated will be greatly for the benefit of the country and of the Service. It will enable the Navy to do what the taxpayer expects it to do for the money he pays—namely, to defend the country in time of war.

Mr. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I should not have risen to address the House had it not been for the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for the Eastbourne Division of Sussex (Admiral Field), who referred to some action of mine 18 years ago. In the few remarks I intend to make I hope the House will grant me some indulgence, on the ground that I have not had time to look into matters which occurred in 1869, and have no power to refer to the Papers on the subject. With regard to the general subject before the House, I most heartily join in the approval expressed by all sections of the House as to the general construction of the Estimates, and especially of the Minute with which the First Lord of the Admiralty has prefaced them. I entirely endorse, with all the approval I can give, the improvements which the First Lord of the Admiralty and his Colleagues have made, not only in the form of the Estimates and in the arrangement shown in the Estimates, but also in other matters which have been brought before the House by the Secretary to the Admiralty, whose speech to-night will be, I think, of great use. The hon. Gentleman has argued very forcibly on the advantage of making up year by year the waste of the Navy, and has spoken as to what that waste is and how it ought to be made up. When I was myself at the Admiralty in 1869, some figures were laid before me, and I urged on Parliament the necessity of constructing an even amount of tonnage from year to year, both of armour-clad, and unarmoured ships, and I pointed out that if we had constant changes from year to year, the effect would not only be bad for the Service generally, but also be bad economically. I am glad to find that the same idea is entertained by the present Board of Admiralty. I also entirely agree in what has been so well said as to the necessity of fixing on the type of the ships to be built after consultation, not only with naval officers and officers of gunnery, but with other officers, on whose advice, as well as that of the controller and the constructor, the design on which a ship is to be built should be determined. It is a cardinal feature of good construction in my mind, that those who have afterwards to be concerned both with the fighting and the sailing of the ship, through their representatives at the Admiralty, should be effectually consulted, and I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has enunciated that doctrine to-night as clearly as he has done. Therefore, as far as I am concerned—reserving the question of past expenditure, which I do not think worth carrying further at present—I cordially concur in what has been put forward by the First Lord in his Memorandum, and also by the Secretary to the Admiralty in his speech to-night. I turn next to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member (Admiral Field), who has so much amused the House, and who has gone into the history of the Board of Admiralty and its methods of administration for a very long time past. I cannot carry my memory back, as far as reading is concerned, to the Reign of

Henry VII.; but I do know its history since the time when the system was so entirely changed by Sir James Graham under Lord Grey's Administration. Formerly, the whole affairs of the Admiralty were really carried on at Somerset House by different Boards, which managed respectively the shipbuilding, the victualling, the store-keeping, the medical service, and other matters connected with the Navy. The great change which Sir James Graham effected was to get rid of those Boards, and to establish at Whitehall one single Board for the transaction of all that business. He divided the business in this way. The Departments remained at Somerset House; but each Member of the Board was called a Superintending Lord, and in his capacity of Superintending Lord the business of each Department was brought to him, and he then brought it to the Central Authority. In establishing that system, Sir James Graham was as strongly attacked in Parliament by the naval officers of that day, as the hon. and gallant Admiral has attacked to-night what I did in 1869. The cardinal point of Sir James Graham's defence was this—that the Board could only work well, under his arrangement, if it was made as unlike a Board as possible. That was the principle on which Sir James Graham attempted to reform the old system, and to substitute one Board for three Boards. I do not hesitate to say that the system established by Sir James Graham, although, perhaps, good enough for doing the very moderate amount of business under Lord Grey's Government, utterly broke down when the business of the Admiralty became greatly increased some 30 years later. I am afraid I am the only person in the House at the present time who was a Member of the Board of Admiralty in 1864. Then, the Board met for four or five times a-week, or almost daily. When the Board met, each of the Lords of the Admiralty who was concerned in a particular Department, brought to the Board the whole of its work—that is to say, the different papers coming from the different Departments and requiring the Board's sanction, excepting, of course, very small matters. At the end of the discussion the Board's stamp was put on them, and that, without any signature, or perhaps the signature of the Secretary, carried the authority of the Board. Under that system, as I know to my cost, when a Junior Lord, I had three, four, or five hours' business to do in a Board room from day to day. Under the whole system a great deal of time was unnecessarily wasted, and it was absolutely impossible that a large amount of business could be transacted efficiently. The system was very bad; but the hon. and gallant Gentleman has not told the House anything about the condition in 1861. He spoke of the Committee of 1861, which collected a large amount of contradictory evidence; but there was also a Royal Commission in 1861, which condemned the system, and unanimously expressed the hope that it might be entirely altered. I was very familiar with the Report of that Commission. I had been a junior Member of the Board of Admiralty, and was not, therefore, uninformed upon these questions. When it was my duty, in 1868, as First Lord, to make improvements in reference to the Admiralty, which had been strongly urged by the Royal Commission, and the necessity for which was strongly shown by the Committee in 1867, I determined to recommend to my Colleagues a plan to meet the objections which had been put forward by the Royal Commission, and which had been so often discussed in the House. We did, at the Admiralty, the same thing that was done at the War Office. We divided the administration under three heads:—the first of which dealt with the military administration; the second with questions of finance. We divided the responsibility between the three heads, laying down, most distinctly, the responsibilities assumed by each—both with regard to the Minister and to Parliament. The system thus started has been in operation ever since, although, in other respects, some slight alterations have been introduced. For instance, an additional Lord has been appointed, who is a post-captain attached to the First Lord, and the first officer appointed was Captain, now Admiral, Willes. He has ceased to act, and a Controller has been appointed; but the system followed is practically that which was established in 1869, and which, I will undertake to say, has worked well. One thing has been referred to almost ludicrously—namely, the signatures to the Estimates, which are said to provide a certain security. Why, I established that system myself.

Mr. Childers

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD: The right hon. Gentleman has misunderstood what I said. What I said was, that I objected to the signing of a document, which those who signed it did not understand, because they had not had time to examine it. It gives a false impression to the public, who are under the impression that the official by placing his name upon it has examined it, and is satisfied with it. I objected to any official signing a document unless the person signing it had thoroughly looked into everything to which he attached his name.

MR. CHILDERS: I think that is exactly what the Lords of the Admiralty are bound to do; and, as I have said, it was I, myself, who introduced the system. Now, Sir, I promised the House I would only speak for a few minutes, and I hope I have kept my promise. But there is one point to which the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Charles Beresford) referred, and upon which I should like to say a word. I was somewhat surprised to hear him speak of want of continuous employment of distinguished Admirals at the Admiralty by one Government and another, as a great vice of the new system. It is not a vice of my creating; because, when I was First Lord of the Admiralty, I offered the First Sea Lordship to the First Sea Lord of my Predecessor. He was, however, very anxious to go to sea; and, instead of so appointing him, I gave him the command of the Mediterranean Fleet; but then I offered the First Sea Lordship to the next Sea Lord of my Predecessor, for the express reason that I was anxious for the continuous character of the naval supervision. I think I have now answered the criticisms of the noble and gallant Lord. I have, I think, shown him that the change which has been made was a change rendered necessary by enquiries which had taken place in previous years. Then, when the noble and gallant Lord says—"Now that we are in a position, let us sweep all this away," I think he will find that the Party to which he belongs was really in power from 1874 to 1880, and that they made no change in this direction. I do not think the noble and gallant Lord's appeal is warranted by the facts; but I, on the other hand, appeal to both sides of the House to deal with this question in no Party sense, but as a matter of good administration. If any change is required, I do not object to it; because it is a change upon what I laid down in 1869. On the contrary, I shall never allow Party considerations in matters of this kind to influence me in the slightest degree.

MR. CAINE (Barrow-in-Furness): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a few remarks to the House upon the Report of the Committee of Inquiry into the system of Purchase and Contract in the Navy—a Report which has excited some comment in the public Press, and created great public interest. The object of this Committee, as stated in the Instruction to the Committee, was to inquire into the system adopted by the Admiralty in regard to the purchase, supply, and examination of stores, contracts for hulls and machinery, including the organization and functions of the Contract Department, and its relations with the Executive Departments of the Admiralty, the Dockyards, Victualling Yards, and Medical Establishments at home and abroad. The inquiry was called for, and I think that many of the recommendations of the Committee are extremely good; but I wish to take exception to one or two points in connection with the Report. First of all, I wish to take some exception to the Committee itself. The Committee consists of the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood); the Accountant General, Sir Gerald Fitzgerald, K.C.M.G.; Captain C. F. Hotham, R.N., C.B.; and the Members for Mid Armagh (Sir James Corry) and North Worcestershire (Mr. B. Hingley) and the Govan Division of Lanarkshire (Mr. Pearce). It is to the appointment of the latter Gentleman as a Member of this Committee to inquire into the matter of contracts that I wish to take particular exception. I do not wish to dispute the fitness of the hon. Member himself to take part in this inquiry. We all know perfectly well he is at the head of one of the most distinguished shipbuilding firms in the world, and that his peculiar knowledge of the business which had to be inquired into fitted him very well indeed, other matters not intervening, to join in this inquiry; but the reason I object to him having been placed on the Committee is, because he himself is a disappointed tenderer for many contracts. ["Oh, oh!"] I do not say that in any disrespectful manner. He was disappointed his tenders were not accepted; surely, there is no objection to an expression of that kind. He was a disappointed tenderer for those contracts which form a very considerable portion of the inquiry of this Committee. Now, Sir, it seems to me that it is most unfair to the other firms tendering and contracting, for an hon. Member of this House, a leading partner in a firm which is, to say the least, a most dangerous opponent to them, to have access to all their confidential documents, and the plans which have been submitted, with the view of securing the orders of the Admiralty. If hon. Members would take the trouble to read the evidence, I think many would agree with me that, during the inquiry, the hon. Member subjected both the late and present Advisers of the Board to a cross-examination very much more like what you would expect from the counsel of a prosecution than from one who was really in the position of a Judge. As I read the evidence, the inference to be drawn from the hon. Member's cross-examination certainly is that the Board's Advisers had been guilty of gross and wilful carelessness and neglect of the public interest. And, in my opinion, the only object of the cross-examination was to show that the firm of which he is a member—Messrs. Elder and Co.—had been unjustly set aside in favour of the contractors who received the Board's orders in question. It seems to me that it would have been the easiest thing in the world to have found some other Gentleman to have taken a position on the Committee in place of the hon. Member for the Govan Division of Lanarkshire. There was one gentleman in particular who gave valuable evidence before the Committee, and who was described by the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) as a most distinguished engineer in his profession—I refer to Mr. William Wallace, the engineer-in-chief of Messrs. Allan and Co. I think if he had been placed on the Committee, and the hon. Member (Mr. Pearce) had been called as a witness, it would have been very much more in accordance with the fitness of things than that which took place. It seems to me that the Report is virtually a severe censure on the whole shipbuilding and controlling departments of the Admiralty. It is proposed by the Committee to transfer to the Director of Contracts the duty of purchasing hulls and machinery, as well as contracting for all business in the Works Departments of the Admiralty. Now, I am glad to say that one of the Members of the Committee enters a strong protest against this recommendation. Captain Hotham, a very distinguished naval officer, concurs generally in the Report, with two important exceptions. He says—

Mr. Cairns

"I entirely dissent from the proposal to invest the Director of Contracts with any responsibility of making contracts for building or repairing ships and constructing engines. That official can have no knowledge whatever of the matter, nor can he be expected to understand the specifications on which contracts are based; and he must of necessity be guided by the opinion of the professional officers of the Controller's Department. The Controller is a Lord of the Admiralty, and he is provided with professional assistants, who may be considered, and who ought to be experts in their respective Departments; and I am of opinion that the Controller should make his own contracts (under the Board) for the supply of ships, and engines, and for repairs; otherwise delay will be caused, friction will arise between the Departments, and inefficiency will be the result. The same objection applies to the proposal to place contracts for works under the Director of Contracts."

I must say, Sir, that if the recommendations of this Committee are carried out, I should expect the present distinguished Admiral, who is the Controller of the Navy, to send in his resignation at once. Just let us examine for one moment the proposal of the Committee; let us examine the mass of work which is already undertaken by that Director of Contracts. No one who knows anything of the present Director of Contracts can speak in any other way of him but in the highest possible terms. When I was at the Admiralty, I had the opportunity of watching the way in which he conducts his business, and I have no hesitation in saying that, under his management, the Admiralty buy their stores cheaper than anyone else in the world. Before I entered Parliament, I was largely engaged in buying exactly the same class of materials that is bought by the Director of Contracts, and I can only say that, if I had had the services of the Director of Contracts, I should be a very much richer man than I am at the present moment. But what is the work which the Director of Contracts at present undertakes? He has to buy everything under Vote 2 — Victualling and Clothing — which amounts to £1,278,000. He has to buy all naval stores under Vote 10, and these amount in value to £1,370,000. He has to buy medical stores under Vote 12, amounting to £75,000; indeed, this official has positively to see to the contracting and purchasing, examining and testing of goods to the value of £2,730,000 in the course of a year. Now, if that is not enough work for one man, I should like to know what is. Well, what is it that is proposed to be added to the work of this already over-worked official? It is proposed he should purchase hulls and machinery; and, under Vote 10, the Government ask this House for hulls and machinery for nearly £2,000,000—£1,911,000; it is also proposed that he should look after the Contracts Works Department. Positively, under this head alone, it is proposed, by one blow, to add to his responsibility the expenditure of £2,464,000. But that is not all. There is now under consideration—at least I believe it is settled—that in future the Admiralty is to buy its own guns. If that is so, I suppose that that also, as a matter of course, will be added to the work of the Director of Contracts, a very serious business in itself. It will more than double his work, adding, as Captain Hotham says in his protest at the end of the Report, to his duties matters of which he can have no knowledge, nor can he be expected to understand the specifications on which contracts are based. But this will not be the end of the additional work placed on the Director of Contracts. It is recommended in this Report—and I entirely concur in the recommendation—that, in future, those things which are now manufactured in the Dockyards should be purchased outside. I have no doubt a very large saving, indeed, will be effected if that recommendation be carried out. It is proposed to give up ropemaking and sailmaking at the Dockyards. I understand it is also proposed to give up the manufacture of biscuits and so on. There are some 2,000 hands employed in these works; and the purchasing of these articles, amounting in value to £250,000 sterling, will also be thrown on the overburdened back of the Director of Contracts. But that is not even all; for in Clause 42 of the Committee's Report, there is a recommendation of fresh work for the Director of Contracts. Clause 42 says—

"It is most desirable that the Director of Contracts be relieved, as much as possible, of office work, in order that he may have time, subject to the instructions of the Board, to visit manufacturing districts and the Dockyards, and to keep himself fully informed as to the best centres of production and in touch with the wants of the Services."

It really seems to me that anything more ridiculous than these proposals I have never seen made in a Report presented to Parliament. A justification for the transfer of contracts under Vote 11, it is impossible to find from the evidence. As Civil Lord, I had charge of this Department, and I can appeal to the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Eccleall Division of Sheffield (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), who succeeded me in that office, and who is now occupying it, as to whether Colonel Percy Smith, the Director of Contracts, is not himself capable of arranging for the various contracts under this particular Vote? Why on earth this duty is to be transferred to the Contract Department I altogether fail to discover. But, Sir, in regard to the proposal to transfer the buying of ships and machinery to the Contract Department, the Committee rest their recommendation almost entirely on the charge that in purchasing the two ships, the Renown and the Samparail, Lord Northbrook's Committee Board paid in the one case over £18,000 and in the other case over £17,000 more than if the work had been done by other firms tendering for the same work. I should point out to the House that these Estimates are based on the suggestion that the hulls and machinery had been purchased from separate firms, instead of under one contract. Now, what are the facts of the case? I will turn to Clause 23 of the Report, in which the Committee summarize what they think were the right proportions of the terms tendering. The Committee say that—

"Had the £8,000 proposed to be charged by the engine-makers for the additional indicated horse-power been abated by the professional officers from the accepted tenders, instead of their arbitrary valuation of £15,000, the tenders in order of price would have stood as follows."

So that the table which follows that remark is the table, as I understand it, which the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) considers ought to have been presented to the Board by the officials responsible for these contracts. Now, it shows that Messrs. Palmer and Co. tendered for hull and engines £587,854; that Messrs. Elder and Co. for each of two ships tendered £590,000; that the Thames Shipbuilding Co. tendered £593,000, and that Messrs. Armstrong and Co. tendered £596,000. So that, on the face of it, the contracts having been given to the Thames Shipbuilding Co. and Messrs. Armstrong and Co., the highest of these tenders, it does appear that the Board, of which I was a Member, had given too much money for these particular ships. But there is a great deal of suppression of the truth in these two statements. Let us examine the matter more carefully. Messrs. Palmer and Co. tendered for one ship £587,854, or in round figures £588,000; but they only tendered for a ship of 9,000 horse-power. Messrs. Elder and Co. tendered £590,000 for two ships. But if the Board had carried out the recommendation of the Report, and accepted, in the first instance, the lowest tender—that of Messrs. Palmer and Co.—there would have been one ship only for Messrs. Elder and Co., who tendered £594,500 for one ship. And yet the Committee report that Messrs. Elder and Co. tendered £3,000 less than the Thames Co., as if it were for one ship. Now, it is true that Messrs. Elder and Co. tendered for 10,000 horse-power; but they wanted, if they were to put 10,000 horse-power into the ship, to add 100 tons to the weight of the machinery, so taking away 100 tons from the rest of the carrying capacity of the ship. Now, the Thames Shipbuilding Co. tendered £593,000, and we got 10,000 horse-power guaranteed; we also got a knot extra speed in consequence. We secured the same conditions in the case of Messrs. Armstrong and Co's tender of £596,000. I see many hon. and gallant Admirals on the opposite side of the House, and

I appeal, without the slightest hesitation, to any of them, whether, in order to secure an extra knot in the speed of the two iron-clads in question, it was not worth while to pay, in one instance, £3,000 more, and in the other £6,000 more, rather than accept the tender of Messrs. Elder and Co., who wanted to load the ship with an extra 100 tons of machinery; or of Messrs. Palmer and Co., who only offered 9,000 horse-power. But now let me trouble the House for a moment more in reference to the prices. I must remind the House of what some may have noticed in the public Press, that when these orders were given to the Thames Shipbuilding Co. and Messrs. Armstrong and Co., these firms contracted that if they failed to produce 10,000 horse-power, they would submit to a fine of £12 per horse-power for every one they fell short of that amount, so that I maintain that, whether we got eventually a 10,000 horse-power ship, or 8,500 horse-power ship, from these two contractors, we paid in hard cash very much less than we should have done if we employed Messrs. Elder and Co., or Messrs. Palmer and Co., or any other combination that it was possible to be tendering for engines and hulls. I will suppose that we got the full 10,000 horse-power from either of the three firms who were able to supply it—Messrs. Elder and Co., the Thames Shipbuilding Co., and Messrs. Armstrong and Co. We should have paid £595,000 to Messrs. Elder and Co., for a 10,000 horse-power ship, plus 100 tons. Now, that 100 tons is an exceedingly valuable element. If you get rid of 100 tons in the engines, you can use it for coals, for armaments, for ammunition, or for a variety of other purposes, and I maintain that 100 tons space in any ship is worth an extra £5,000 or £10,000. The Thames Shipbuilding Co., were to get £601,000 for a ship of 10,000 indicated horse-power. The engines would have been 40 tons lighter than those tendered for by other firms; so that, as a matter of fact, the ship would have been 140 tons lighter or of less displacement than the ship which was tendered for by Messrs. Elder and Co., a fact which would have given a knot extra speed. There may be some comment made that Messrs. Armstrong and Co. were £3,000 higher than the Thames

Mr. Cairns

Shipbuilding Co. That £3,000 was required; because the engines were manufactured on the Thames, and the ship was built on the Tyne. Suppose the ships, when delivered, only turned out to be of 9,500 horse-power. The price paid to Messrs. Elder and Co. would have been the same, £595,000, and the price paid to the Thames Shipbuilding Co., on the terms of £12 per horse deduction, would have been precisely the same as to that paid to Messrs. Elder and Co.; but the ship would have been minus 40 tons in the weight of the engines. Messrs. Armstrong, under the same conditions, would have been paid £598,000. Now, let us suppose the engineers had failed in their engagement to produce a full 10,000 horse-power, and had only given us 8,500 horse-power. It has been the contention of this Committee all through, that we ought to have considered, in giving out the orders, only the prices that were tendered for ships of 8,500 horse-power. The lowest tender for hull and machinery from two different contractors was £581,000. The Department object to buying the hull from one firm and the engines from another firm; and, therefore, they get one tender: That, in itself, was an objection to Messrs. Palmer and Co.'s tender of £587,000. But under the £12 fine, the Thames Shipbuilding Co. would only have been paid, if they had delivered a ship of 8,500 horse-power, £483,000, and the ship would still have been minus the 40 tons weight. Messrs. Armstrong and Co. would have been paid £486,000. So, taking these figures as you please, arranging them as you like, if you speak honestly, it is impossible to bring any charge against the Board of which I was a Member, to the effect that we did not purchase these vessels on the very lowest and best possible terms. There is a good deal in the Report of the Committee about the fancy value of a horse in a ship's engines. One authority places it at 30s.; another at £5 1s. 3d.; and another at £6 10s. I confess I do not understand the value of a horse-power in these engines, or know how it can be arrived at; but I do understand, and every naval officer perfectly understands, the value of an extra 140 tons of space. Naval officers know perfectly well the value of a knot. It is quite possible that one knot might turn out to be the value of a whole ship. I have no hesitation in saying that the charge brought by this Committee in their Report against the Board, of which I was a Member, that they bought ships at a higher price than they could obtain them for elsewhere, is absolutely without foundation. I strongly protest against the charge. If the Committee have no more basis for the charge than it has for taking away the contracting for ships from the Controller's Department, and adding it to the already overburdened Department of the Director of Contracts—if the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) does not assure me that he will not persevere with the carrying out of the recommendation of the Committee, I shall be bound, at as early a date as possible, to ask the House to express its opinion in the Division Lobbies.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Mr. Speaker, I regret the Forms of the House do not enable me to raise the issue which is involved in the terms of the Motion I have on the Paper—namely,

“That this House will not proceed to the consideration of the proposed expenditure for the Navy without having first learnt what steps have been taken to improve the system of Admiralty Contracts.”

The particular Services to which the Motion I have read would direct the attention of the House are dispersed over a number of different Votes, and therefore it is impossible to discuss the question, except at this particular stage. This is a question of very great importance, and at the present time it is attracting a great deal of public attention. But were it not so, the fact of the amount of money involved under these Contract Services would secure for it considerable attention at the hands of, at any rate, a large section of the House. Now, Sir, on the present Estimates the amount under these Services is nothing like as great as it has been. On the Estimates now presented, the sum of £3,288,000 under one Vote alone will show the extent to which these charges go. But that is only under the original Estimate. The experience of the last year tells us this will probably be supplemented, as the original Estimate of last year was supplemented, by something which will raise the total considerably above the figure I have mentioned. Last year's figures will let the House see what the immense sums are which are covered by these Contract Services. In the 7th section of Vote 10, for the year 1885-6, on account of Machinery and Ships building by Contract, the original estimate was £2,126,000. The expenditure went up to £3,555,387. But the other section of the same Vote is hardly less involved, for the amount taken under it in Committee of Supply was £1,544,000. This is far from meeting the entire liability connected with timber, materials, coal, and other naval stores, which really amounts to £2,155,000. So that, on the whole, we have expended during a single year on this Vote £5,710,771. That includes £700,000 on account of the hire of armed cruisers and their appurtenances; but it does not include a still larger item on account of hired transports, which amounts to £1,113,000. This, with the sum I have mentioned, makes a total of £6,824,000 in round numbers. But even that immense sum does not represent the entire expenditure on Contracts in a single year, because it is dispersed over a number of items, which go to swell this total to something over £7,000,000. Therefore, it will be seen that the question which my Motion will raise is one, not only covering a large sum of money, but affecting a number of Services under the control of the Naval Authorities. The very easy way in which the authorities at Whitehall deal with these contracts is exemplified in a comparatively small matter which occurred during the period to which the figures I have quoted refer. It will be in the recollection of the House that some time ago Her Majesty's Government took it into their heads to occupy Port Hamilton. It has since been ascertained that this place is incapable of defence, except at a great expenditure, and that it is also of very little practical value as a coaling station. Under these circumstances, the Admiralty magnanimously resolved to surrender it to its rightful owners. But already a considerable expense had been incurred in connection with it. In view of the difficulty with the Russian Government on that and other accounts, it was thought necessary by the Admiralty to have telegraphic communication between Hong Kong and Port Hamilton in the first place, and, in the second place, between England and Port Hamilton. When this little piece of contract work was made known by the Admiralty to the Treasury, the submarine requirements for the service had already been purchased, at a cost of £218,000; the cable to Port Hamilton had actually been laid to the place which was subsequently abandoned. The other cable, however, still lay on the premises of the contractors, coiled up, ready for orders as to what should be done with it. What was done with it? It was not used. I do not know whether the House will recollect it or not, but it was sold at the first favourable opportunity, and the proceeds went to diminish the net charge on the Vote of Credit. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope), standing at the Table the other night, emphasized what we had already read in the Statement relating to his Department, and declared to the House that the appropriating of the proceeds of sale to the reduction of Votes was a dangerous system, and one which ought to be discontinued. The same system which has obtained in the case of the Board of Admiralty has obtained under the War Office. The price obtained for the cable is lumped with the proceeds of other stores sold, one of the principal items of which is the coal furnished for use at foreign stations, and which, of course, at some time or other, will have to be replaced at considerable expense to the country. The next point to which I ask the attention of the House I take from the clever and interesting Memorandum issued to Members as explanatory of the Estimates which we are now asked to consider. It will be seen, at pages 5 and 6 of the Statement, that in 1885 the Government, recognizing the insufficiency of previous arrangements, entered upon an expenditure, in addition to that of the ordinary shipbuilding programme, of no less a sum than £3,100,000 in the building of ships by contract in private yards. Besides this, £1,600,000 for guns was to be added to the Ordnance Vote, which is included in the annual Estimate of the expenditure for the War Office. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, we are told, estimated that this outlay would be spread over five years, ending on the 31st of March, 1890. The Expenditure for 1885 was to be £800,000; for 1886-7 it was likewise to be £800,000; while the balance was to be taken in 1887-8, 1888-9, and 1889-90, at the rate of £500,000 a-year, thus making up the £3,100,000. But what has really happened? In 1885, instead of £800,000, the Admiralty spent on this business over £1,000,000 sterling.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

In the year which is now within a fortnight of its close, instead of the second round, 800,000, they have spent £1,320,000; and it is instead of taking only £500,000 for the coming financial year, the First Lord tells us that he wants £997,336—or, in round numbers, another £1,000,000—and that thus, before three years of the five years which have expired, the Admiralty has expended more than £250,000 over and above the total sum stipulated for during the five-year period. But, Sir, although they have been spent, or will have been spent, in a very short time, the work has not been done. Of the five steel cruisers included in the programme, of which the £3,100,000 was to have been spent, not one single cruiser has been completed. The six steel torpedo cruisers included in the programme have been completed; but we are informed that there has been some trouble in the preliminary steam trial, and their completion is, in consequence, delayed. Now, passing from that subject, I say that one of the points which must forcibly strike anyone attempting to elucidate the relations between the Admiralty and the fortunate contractors who happen to have dealings with them, is the very great indulgence which is sometimes extended to the contractors, especially when it suits the convenience of the naval authorities. For instance, we have it officially reported to the House that, last year, the contractors for some machinery had received advances to the amount of £38,140 beyond the sum which they were entitled to receive according to the strict terms of their contracts; and, in the same way, the contractors for shipbuilding had received, over and above what they were entitled to receive, the amount of £50,490. Similarly, Armstrong & Co. received £199,950 in respect of gun mountings for various ships in course of manufacture for the Admiralty, although, in the arrangement entered into with that firm, no provision for such advance had been made; and the curious feature of that particular case is, that of the immense sum so improperly advanced, £67,000 was paid on the very last day of the financial year—namely, the 31st of March, 1886. Of course, it is very easy to see that by so accommodating the contractors, the Admiralty were enabled to dispose of a large sum of money which, if they had kept it over to the following morning, they would have been compelled, under the law, to surrender as an unexpended balance. Again, under the arrangement of April, 1885, Messrs. Whitehead & Co. contracted for the supply of 200 torpedoes, to be delivered free on board at Fiume for £300,000. Fifty of these were to be delivered within six months from the date of contract, and 25 during each succeeding month. According to the contract, they ought to have delivered, by the end of March, a total of 175 torpedoes; but, as a matter of fact, only 100 were delivered, and they were paid for. But, besides the £30,000 to which the contractors were entitled on account of the torpedoes which they had delivered, they were paid the sum of £21,000 more on account, although the torpedoes were not delivered according to contract, and the contractors were actually in arrear with the delivery. We may usefully contrast this treatment with that we find to be the conduct of the Admiralty in respect of certain other persons who do not happen to be so favourably regarded as the particular individuals I have referred to. In order that I may not be considered as speaking without book, I confine myself to what is reported by the Committee specially appointed to inquire into the Contract Business of the Admiralty. That Committee was presided over by the hon. Member for the Govan Division of Lanark (Mr. Pearce), and his selection as Chairman was a very admirable one; because, at the time it was made, the Gentleman had not had time to allow all his good intentions to evaporate. The three Members of this House who were upon that Committee, whatever may be their professional occupations, are not only men of unquestionable ability, but men of unquestionable character; and I am bound to say that, although they sit on the other side of the House, and are opposed to me in politics, as I am opposed to them, I should feel positively ashamed if I could think myself capable for one moment of alluding to one of them as "a disappointed tenderer." I heard, with a feeling of disgust, that expression applied to the hon. Member (Mr. Pearce), than whom, I am perfectly certain, there is no more straightforward, honest, and useful man in this House, and I tender my hon. Friend the expression of my personal respect, having had, on many occasions, opportunities of judging of his qualities as Chairman. This Committee reported, among other things, upon this particular point—that more expedition is requisite in passing contractors' claims for ships and engines, the delays in connection with payment being at present unreasonable. That is the story, and it is a true story, with regard to the conduct of the Admiralty in certain cases. There is unreasonable and undue delay in certain cases; but in the case of other contractors, as I have shown to the House, there is no delay, but, on the contrary, they have given large sums of money before payment of those sums was due. The Committee, unquestionably, found itself compelled to point out what they termed many and grave defects in the general administration and system pursued at the Admiralty with regard to the matters referred to their consideration. I will not dwell upon the blots indicated in regard to the administration, such as the want of co-operation between the different Members of the Board; neither will I venture to go into matters which, as a layman, I do not profess to understand, such as specifications being complete or incomplete, alternative designs, and so forth; but in this Report there are things which any man of ordinary intelligence can understand; and certainly, I am surprised to read, as I do in page 19, that notice is taken of the apparent absence of a thoroughly practical Engineering department, the result of which is that there is no one at the Admiralty competent to design engines, and to bring the latest engineering science to bear upon designs. Anyone can see that there must be something very unsatisfactory in the administrative system at Whitehall, when it can be reported that large contracts were made in 1885, prior to the appointment of the present Controller of the Navy; that when a large number of contracts were concluded, in many cases the lowest offers were not accepted, and that designs were adopted quite at variance with the specifications sent out; that tenders were sent out for ordinary compound engines, and that designs had been accepted for those of treble expansion. We are told, further, that it has all through been the custom, after tenders have been received, to discriminate between the offers on ground of a supposed difference between the relative reputation and ability of the parties tendering; and when, probably, they have only been invited to tender after the Admiralty had satisfied themselves of their capability to do the work, elements of uncertainty have been introduced into the awards. That is rather a peculiar system to read; but, after the exhibition of to-night, there is probably ground for it. "This, no doubt, is judicial in the minds of contract shipbuilders to the impartiality of the Admiralty." When such a system is adopted, it is no great wonder that the results obtained correspond with the system. One of the results is shown in the case of two vessels, the Renown and the Sanspareil. Tenders were invited in the early part of 1885 for hulls and engines to these vessels jointly, the holds to indicate 5,500 horse-power by natural draught, and 8,500 horse-power by forced draught, with a request for alternative designs. I will not read through the figures and details; but the end of it was that after some differences with regard to horse-power, and after several different firms had tendered, Messrs. Elder and Co. offered to provide this additional horse-power without extra charge; and Messrs. Palmer and Co. also proposed to increase the guaranteed power to 9,000 indicated horse-power free of cost. Ultimately, however, both by reason of the discussion with regard to horse-power, and the modification of the proposal originally put forth, and from the fact that the hulls and machinery were regarded separately, an offer was accepted from Sir William Armstrong, Mitchell and Co. for one ship at £18,500, and another from the Thames Iron Works Company for the other ship at £17,500, in excess of the proposals made by other firms for the same work. That is the way in which the money of the country is squandered. The further payments on account of the increased horse-power are put on page 11 of the Report. The Report, after speaking of the first contract for engines, goes on to say, that six months after it was concluded rough tenders were invited for engines of a fac-tious character with boilers, to produce the same once better for the Nile and Trafalgar. The lowest ability was from Messrs. Harland and Wolff of £4 for each ship, or equal to a reduction en, price of 500 for the two sets of engines from the invited above stated."

Mr. O'Doherty

tender of Messrs. Harland and for these engines was not accepted, in submitting a list of the firms invited to tender—amongst whom is firm of Messrs. Harland and the professional Advisers of the salty remarked—are the principal engineering firms of country, and comprise all to whom it would our opinion, desirable to entrust the of such important machinery."

tenders were one for £94,000 and £78,215—the former being from same firm who, in August obtained, negotiation, £112,000 for that which February following they offered to at £94,000. I cannot under-why the contract was not given to Harland and Wolff, who were to do the work for £78,000 odd.

I read the paragraph bearing on matter, I thought it necessary to myself into communication with a man perfectly well acquainted the firm, and a number of other throughout the country; and I asked of him whether, as a matter of fact there was any good reason why Messrs. Harland and Wolff should not the contract, and whether they really capable of performing the

His answer was short and emphatic. "Most unquestionably," he said, "they were perfectly qualified to do the work." Under these circumstances, and looking at the matter from every point of view, I cannot understand why, when a contractor has been ordered to do certain work for £78,000 contractor who has done work for Government, and who is recognized as thoroughly qualified for such work—the contract should be given not to him but to another firm paid £94,000 to do it. So we see how payments in advance are made, even though they are not due; while in other cases, there is blameworthy delay in meeting claims which have fairly been put forward for work actually done; and so we see, also, that firms perfectly competent to do the work are passed over, and the tenders of other contractors are accepted at a very unnecessary increase in the cost to the public. But, Sir, even when tenders are accepted, are contractors bound to the terms on which they tender? It would appear from paragraph 27 of this Report that they are not—or, at any rate, not always. The paragraph is this—

"A serious discrepancy was shown by the evidence before us to exist in some cases between the terms arranged with the contractor for engines and the conditions eventually embodied in the contract in regard to penalties and payments for extra indicated horse-power."

Well, Sir, this is the way in which the contract business of the Admiralty has been conducted in the past, and it is not a matter of wonder that the Committee report as they do in paragraph 39—

"It is inexpedient that purchases amounting to something like £50,000 a-year should be negotiated by the Director of Contracts without superior authority."

I will not enter into the question of whether the Director of Contracts ought to be the sole purchaser on behalf of the Admiralty, though, I believe, the system has worked well in respect of the Army Services—at any rate, so far as the Director of Army Contracts is concerned. I do not see why it should not work equally satisfactorily in the Naval Service. But, surely, when the Director of Contracts can purchase on his own authority to the extent of £50,000 a-year, there ought to be some kind of check upon him—there ought to be some kind of higher officer who ought to be competent, at any rate, to look at the details of these contracts both before and after they have been entered into. I do not, for a moment, pretend to think that the system of contracts ought to be curtailed or diminished. It is equally true of the Navy, as it is true of the Army, that the Admiralty authorities are not able from their own Establishments to supply the needs of the Service even in time of peace. The War Office Establishments cannot supply in times of peace more than 50 per cent. of the requirements, and the Navy authorities, I suppose, find it difficult to provide even so high a proportion. It is, therefore, clear that the wants of these two great Services must be dependent to a large extent upon supplies by contract. And the more they are dependent on the contractors, I think, the better, because you cannot expect the contractors, if the sudden demands of war should come upon them, to be prepared to furnish what is required for such low charges and on such reasonable terms as they would if the demands regularly made on them during the time of peace were such as to make it profitable for them to keep efficient and sufficient machinery. Therefore I am by no means desirous of seeing the system of contracts curtailed; but I do say this, that there is evidence not only in this Report, but in the Reports of the Government itself, and in the Statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty, and in the Reports made by the Comptroller and Auditor General to this House, with regard to proceedings in connection with contracts in the past—there is abundant evidence to show that the whole system of contracts under the Admiralty authorities does require a very complete overhauling. That has been recognized, but I submit that the Minute that is placed at the beginning of this Report, and signed by the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty, is altogether short of the requirements of the case. What he says is—

“Since 1885 new regulations have been adopted, and a series of reforms initiated in the Comptroller’s Department, which will, I hope, go far towards attaining the objects the Committee have in view, and for the accomplishment of which they have made numerous and practical suggestions.”

That is all very well so far as it goes; but the House will probably wish to know how far it goes, and what does it mean? What are the regulations that have been adopted in order to prevent the blots and defects the Committee have pointed out, and how does the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty propose in the future to avoid these things which I have mentioned, and which certainly, in some cases, amount almost to a scandal?

Mr. O’Doherty

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): The discussion commenced by the hon. Member for Barrow-in-Furness (Mr. Caine) and continued by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. A. O’Connor) is one of very great importance, and if it had been commenced at an earlier hour of the evening I should have felt justified in going at length into it. I am quite aware, however, that the noble Lord has to take the first Votes to-night, therefore I will confine my remarks to very few minutes. I should like, however, to say that I entirely—or almost entirely—agree with the remarks fell from the hon. Member for Barrow-in-Furness, leaving, of course, on consideration some rather personal remarks which fell from him, and which I must say, I did not agree with. I endorse the opinions he expressed, and declared himself entirely opposed to the policy of leaving the giving of contracts to the Director of Contracts. I think a most mischievous thing to do these officials with such affairs. I agree with what has been said by the noble Lord Hotham in this matter; but does this discussion raise a very important question in our minds for consideration? Is it worth our while, or is it right, for us to go so largely into this system of contracts at all? Why is it that with our magnificent Dockyards, where we can produce everything required in the Navy, that we go so much into the open market and spend large sums of the public money on these contracts? Sir, I must protest, in the interests of economy, against the immense sums that are being squandered by the Government in this matter of contracts. It seems to me in the highest degree unbusiness-like that, having spent enormous sums on our Naval Dockyards, and having spent millions of money in setting up plant with which to build our ships, we should not make proper use of that plant, but should go to private yards to get work done which could be equally well done in our Royal Dockyards. I have only to turn to this Report of Contracts to find a useful illustration of what I am urging. We are told that in the case of certain iron-clad ships certain tenders were given. Well, one tender is, I think, £18,000 lower than the tender that was actually accepted; and are we to suppose that no profit is made by the contractors who build these ships for us? I know we are sometimes told so. I go into a shop sometimes to purchase an article. I complain of the price; and the shopkeeper tells me—"Oh, I can assure you we do not get any profit at all on this article; on the contrary, we are great losers by it." I would as soon believe a statement of that kind on the part of a shopkeeper, as the statement that the contractors who build our ships do not make a profit out of the work. Such statements are all nonsense. Of course, no profit, and a large profit, is made by the contractor. I do not suppose the owners of the shipbuilding yards who are called on to build the ships on which we spend £500,000, would attempt to go to Messrs. such an extensive business as that. I have not getting a profit of something like 10 per cent. Well, if you take the shop we may suppose to be made by the shipbuilders as Messrs. Harland and Wolff, and add to that £10,000 or £20,000, which we are giving to Messrs. Harland, Mitchell, and Co., we have made of something like £60,000 which we are giving away for the manufacture of ships over and above what we receive have given if the ships had been built in the Royal Dockyards. But this is not the only reason why I say it is a mistake and a mistake to build these ships so extensively in private yards. At the commencement of this evening's debate I remember an hon. Gentleman—I think the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed)—rather surprised us by stating that all our designs for ships that were being obtained from private dockyards were made public property—that is to say, that the designs for our ships, which, we do all we can to keep secret, and to keep from falling into the hands of Foreign Powers, in the case of ships built in private dockyards are made perfectly public property. Anyone can buy them for almost anything he likes. That is a serious consideration, and it is a thing which cannot happen in the case of ships which are built in Public Dockyards. Now, in the statement which the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) has laid before us, he has told us the allowance which ought to be made for the depreciation of our stock in ships. I wish he had carried out the same principle as regards the value of our stores. I think it would be a very important thing, and a very excellent thing, if, in future, he was to give us some idea of the nature and value of our stock and stores in hand. We are told what is required to buy stores for the year; but we never have a valuation of all the stores in the Service—for instance, of the timber, metal, and so on. That item is a very large one; it is something like £500,000 or £600,000. I see there is a very large decrease made this year in that item. I wonder why that is. Is it because the stores were depleted last year? In another item we find a corresponding increase, so we never know exactly where we are. It has often been the case that Boards of Admiralty, finding that their shipbuilding is rather running down, and wanting to get more money from the House of Commons to make up for the deficiency, deplete the stores, and the House of Commons knows nothing about it. It is sometimes the case that the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty will come down and astonish the House by saying he has done more than his Predecessor in the way of increasing the Navy; but, at the same time, he hides from us the fact that the stores are depleted, and that if another Board of Admiralty came in they would have to spend a great deal of money in getting the stores up to the required amount, and that in consequence of having to do that they could not spend the necessary amount of money in building. I hope that in future the First Lord of the Admiralty will be able to give us some idea of what stock of stores we have in hand. Now, I should like to make a few remarks upon the personnel of the Navy; it is quite as important as matériel. At the commencement of the evening, I asked the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty what he intended to do as regards carrying out the recommendations of the Duke of Edinburgh's Committee concerning the pensions to the widows of our seamen. The Report of the Committee was sent in two years ago; but the recommendations it contained have not been acted upon. My noble Friend very courteously and kindly stated that if I would come to him he would tell me the reason why the Committee's recommendation had yet not been carried out; but this is not a matter which can wait. I think the noble Lord should have told the House to-night, as I think I can tell them, what the reason is. I believe he will not deny the fact that the whole of the Board of Admiralty are unanimously of opinion that this recommendation should be carried out, but that they cannot get the small amount of money which is required from the Treasury. I believe that if the noble Lord were to ask the House of Commons to back him up in this matter—it is a small matter as far as the amount of money goes, but a very important matter to a great number of poor deserving people—the House of Commons will have no difficulty in providing the money which is necessary for these pensions. One word in regard to our warrant officers. Many years ago, during the time of the Crimean War, it was thought a great shame and a hardship that our warrant officers, that our seamen were the only seamen in the world who were never able to get a commission, never able to rise to the rank of officers. That was felt to be a hardship, and an Order in Council was made that our seamen should be allowed, under circumstances of long servitude, or of bravery in action, or for other special services, to rise to the rank of officers. Now, will the House believe that from that time to this not one single seaman has ever been given the commission of an officer?—they rise to the rank of warrant officers, but beyond that they cannot go. The matter was fully discussed some years ago, and the then First Lord of the Admiralty—I am not sure it was not the right hon. Gentleman the present Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers)—thought he would get over the difficulty in this way. He said, well, we will give some warrant officers commissions. Now, what are those commissions? Instead of being called gunner or boatswain or carpenter, they are called chief gunner, chief boatswain, and chief carpenter, and they are asked to believe they are commissioned officers; you may just as well tell a cabby that he is a coachman to Her Majesty the Queen. Well, that is the way the difficulty was got over. I think it is a great shame; and I submit to the House that it is a standing disgrace to this country that the Navy, which we always look upon as the finest profession in the world, is the only profession where a common man before the mast cannot in course of time, if he shows himself worthy of it, secure the uniform of an officer. There are supposed to be difficulties in the way; I do not see any difficulties at all. There are supposed to be social difficulties, but social difficulties should not exist; the warrant officers do not ask to be lieutenants and put in rooms with other lieutenants on a ship. There is no occasion for it. There are hundreds of appointments in the Navy where they need not come in contact, if they do not like it, with the other executive officers of the Service. There is the whole Coastguard open to them. There are appointments to gunboats and the torpedo service, and many other services which I need not mention, where these officers might be very usefully employed as lieutenants. Again, they argue if that cannot be conceded to them, why should they not, after they have served their time in the Service and come on retirement, receive the rank of lieutenant on retirement. That looks a small matter, but it is not. It is one of great importance to them and to their families. These are the only few remarks I shall make with regard to the personnel of the Navy. The noble Lord would do well to take this matter into consideration. If the noble Lord would do something towards offering commissions to our seamen, and also in helping our men to make provision for their widows, he would do a great deal more to perpetuate the Queen's Jubilee than is to be done in spending large amounts of money on statues and the like.

MR. HOOPER (Cork, S.E.): At this late hour (1.10) I will not trespass very long upon the attention of the House. But what I wish to bring before the House is, in the words of the Motion, which I regret the Forms of the House will not permit me to move, that the Government should take more energetic steps to bring to completion the works at Haulbowline Dockyard in Cork Harbour, in order that the large expenditure already incurred there may at the earliest possible date bear useful results to the Navy and the Public Service. In order that I may correctly place before the House the usefulness of this work, I have to refer to the early history of the undertaking. It was preceded by a very long agitation, beginning, I believe, at the time of the Union, for the construction of this dock was one of the bribes held out to the Irish people to consent to the Union of the two countries. But I shall begin with the year 1864, at which time a Committee was appointed, on the Motion, I think, of a predecessor of mine in this House, Mr. John Francis Maguire. That Committee was asked, on public grounds, and also on the ground that a fair share of the Imperial taxation should be expended in Ireland, to recommend the construction of a dock in Cork Harbour. I mention this fact lest the hon. Gentlemen who then on the other side of the House should imagine my moving in this matter is of merely or mainly the result of any desire to obtain Imperial expenditure in this locality. A mass of evidence was introduced before the House; and among those who gave evidence in favour of the project was the Duke of Somerset, who has been already mentioned by—showing speakers as closely allied with the Administration—Captain Godfrey, Captain Stuart, and Rear Admiral Mill. Rear Admiral Mill stated that man, probably in time of war you would have one disabled which might make for Cork, and perhaps it would be as well to have a dock there to meet the emergency, more especially at the present time."

Then he gives his reason, to which I especially ask the attention of what I may call the non-professional Members of the House—

"In consequence," he says, "of the introduction of machinery there are many little derangements which take place, so that ships require to be docked much oftener than they used to be formerly."

The Committee also received evidence from Mr. Maguire, and he said that he had heard several naval men give their strong opinions in favour of the establishment of this dockyard. Sir George Sartorius stated before him the necessity of having a naval dockyard at Cork Harbour. Sir George Sartorius was of opinion that there should be a naval dockyard and arsenal on the West Coast of Ireland, because it was very unwise to have the defences of the country intrusted entirely to the Dockyards in England. The Committee in their inquiry felt the full force of the advantage to the Fleet of a first-class dock at Cork, and they advised the immediate construction of a first-class dock in some convenient spot in the Harbour, and also, if practicable, the deepening of the existing docks for occasional naval requirements. The Admiralty at that time acted on the Report, and they proposed to spend a sum of £150,000 in the construction of a dock in the course of six years. Well, Sir, for some reason or other that sum of £150,000 has been raised to something like £700,000 or £800,000. That large expenditure may seem to make the House a bit weary of this undertaking; but it is no detriment to my argument at present so far as there is practical result. This large sum is practically thrown into the sea, and therefore it behoves Parliament to see whether by some vigorous effort the dock cannot be turned to some useful account. But the work has been in abeyance for some time, owing, as it has been said, to the unfortunate circumstance that the Government cannot get a sufficient number of convicts for the work. Undoubtedly the proximity of convict labour at Spike Island was an inducement to enter into this enterprise; and while the convict establishment existed there and while convict labour, which cost the Government so little, was to be had, there might be some cause for dragging this work slowly along. But that state of things no longer exists, the convict establishment has been removed to Galway during the last two or two-and-a-half years; and now whatever money is to be spent—that is, if this dock is to be finished at all—and surely it ought to be finished when £700,000 or £800,000 has already been spent upon it—it will have to be completed by paid labour. I have quoted the reasons for which the dock was originally entered upon; and I ask any hon. Member of the House who is acquainted with the progress of affairs since that time to say whether those reasons have now less or more effect than they had at that time. I think it will be admitted that the reasons have greater effect now, for with the increased power of projectiles the chances are far greater that vessels in Her Majesty's Navy will require more docking, and will require to have more docks in which they can find refuge. I also call attention to the fact that the length of transport vessels has greatly increased since that time. The right hon. Gentleman was shocked to find that he could not take one of Her Majesty's ships into Malta; but what would happen if one of these splendid cruisers were to get damaged? If the arrangements at Cork were complete, you would have a dock that you could take her to; and I may mention that Cork would be an excellent place from which to send troops. If one of the ships is disabled, how are you going to deal with her; is she to be brought to London for repair and then taken back again? I believe the whole history of naval administration shows that you use enormous sums of money which you might save if you had kept your Dockyards in an efficient state. In the time of the Crimean War I think there was something like the worth of £1,000,000 in the work done in private dockyards, because the Government Dockyards were overworked, and if such a time were to come again, I say it would be of the greatest consequence to the country to have the dock at Cork in a working state. If Her Majesty's Government are wise they will take this work seriously in hand, and that soon, and for this reason among others, that I see, with the greatest regret, that the shipping industry of Cork Harbour has been declining for years past, and that the trade is almost threatened with extinction. There are still some first-rate workmen left there, and the sooner they are saved from extinction the better. Apart altogether from that, I suppose that Her Majesty's Government are not altogether free from the apprehension of war at no distant period. France is not at the moment on the very best terms with England; on the contrary, she is the close ally of Russia, and perhaps the alliance which exists may be more friendly hereafter at a time when the Irish Coasts might not be free from attack. Under these circumstances, I say it would be well for the Government to have a harbour at Cork with all the appliances necessary for docking ships. It is a very capacious Harbour; there are splendid forts there mounted with the best artillery, and altogether it is the best position in which Her Majesty's ships can be placed. I will now remark that after all the money spent in the last 27 years, a new stage has been reached, and we are told that 80 men per week are to be discharged in June next. I ask the noble Lord whether it is his intention to allow the £700,000 or £800,000 which has been spent to lie waste, and whether he will not give these men some other work, which he can do very easily? Finally, I thank the House for the great courtesy they have shown during the time occupied by these remarks; and I ask the Government to consider carefully whether some new departure should not be taken to make this large sum of money immediately productive, and to provide, as soon as possible, on that part of the Coast a place in which Her Majesty's ships can be constructed and repaired alike in time of peace and war.

Mr. Hooper

MR. PEARCE (Lanark, Govan): [The speech of the hon. Member for Barron-in-Furness (Mr. Caine) seems to me to have had two points. In the first place, he vindicated a very pernicious system of contracting which had been going on for some years, especially during the term he was connected with the Admiralty; and, in the second place, he made a personal attack upon me, because I consented to act on the Committee of Contracts. He calls me a "disappointed tenderer." I am not a "disappointed tenderer," because years ago I discovered that the partiality existing amongst the professional advisers of the Admiralty was of such a character that it was not to be expected that I should get a contract under any circumstances whatever. I have tendered because I wished to remain on what is known as the Admiralty List; if I were not on that List I should be precluded from tendering in foreign countries. That is the sole reason why I was on the List—it was not because I had an idea of getting contracts. The hon. Member has also referred to me as cross-examining a professional officer. I simply asked that officer eight questions, and I ask the hon. Member if, out of those questions, he can point to one which was indiscreet? He cannot do so. As a professional man, I was supposed to ask questions of a technical character. I was solicited to act on the Committee, and it was pointed out to me that my professional knowledge would be of great service to the Admiralty. I think, in a case of this kind, the hon. Member should not make a personal attack on any Member of this House for doing what he considered to be for the public good. Now, I may state that I was not prompted, nor was any Member of the Committee prompted, to inquire into the question of the Sanspareil and Renown, on account of the firm to which I belonged having tendered for them. But the Committee were induced to inquire into the matter from the fact that the engines were given to a firm which has at the present time has 100,000 horse-power under construction. If the hon. Member turns to the Appendix of the Estimates, he will find that this firm has received orders for the engines for the Trafalgar, Anson, Howe, Rodney, Collingwood, Mersey, Severn, Renown, and Sanspareil. These represent 100,000 horse-power, and, roughly speaking, £1,000,000 sterling; which represents an amount of work greater than all the engineers in the country have in hand for the Government; and that being so, we concluded something was going on which was as desirable to find out. The hon. Member endeavoured to show that the two ships were obtained at a lower price by deducting the penalty which he said might be deducted if the engineers did not give the horse-power contracted for. But, as a matter of fact, in this contract there is no penalty at all. If the hon. Gentleman had read the evidence a little more carefully, he would not, I think, have made the rash statement which he did make, or have spoken about the suppression of the truth. Here is a suppression which he made in giving his version of the case to the House. With regard to the Belfast firm which offered to do the engines of the Nile and Trafalgar at a cost of £34,000 less than the Government are now paying, there was no reason that we could discover why they should not have had the contract. We were told that they were thoroughly competent to have the contract, and, when we asked why the Admiralty had invited the firm to tender, we were told that at the time there was great talk about justice to Ireland. There has been a great deal said about giving the Director of Contracts a great amount of power. When the Director of Contracts came before us we asked him whether he had anything to do with the contracts on these ships, and he said he had had nothing whatever to do with them. Well, Sir, when we found that this pernicious system was going on, which has been backed up by the hon. Member for Barrow-in-Furness, we considered that it would be desirable to have a man of commercial mind to elucidate the system of contracts. I conclude that the hon. Member for Barrow-in-Furness was formerly installed at the Admiralty on account of his commercial knowledge. I believe that the firm with which he was connected contracted with the Government for certain materials. [Mr. CAINE: Never.] Then I beg the hon. Member's pardon; I have been misinformed. But he has been in the habit of making contracts with large firms—my own firm, for instance—and I should have thought that he was a man of commercial mind. I have nothing further to add than this—that my opinion with respect to the system of contracting is embodied in the Report of the Committee.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): At this hour (1.40 A.M.), and at the close of a not unsatisfactory discussion on naval matters, I feel it is not necessary for me to inflict a speech on the House; but as a number of questions have been put to me relating to several matters which are not referred to in the Memorandum, it is, perhaps, desirable that I should say a few words in reply. The hon. Gentleman the Member for East Cork (Mr. Hooper) raised a question as to Haulbowline Dock, and seemed to be under the impression that there was an intention on the part of the Admiralty to postpone the operation of those works. I have not had the advantage of meeting the hon. Gentleman in connection with the subject. When I was over in Ireland I received a deputation of local gentlemen in regard to it, and I stated to the gentleman heading that deputation the course we intended to pursue. I told him that the amount of money we should spend in the succeeding year would be as much as we had spent the year before; but I added that, inasmuch as we should be completing a portion of the work, it would be necessary to discharge some of the workmen from time to time. In June next these discharges will have to commence; and, in arranging the time, we have been guided by a desire to get rid of the men at a period of the year when it will be the easiest for them to get other employment. It must always be remembered that we shall only be getting rid of the men because the work on which they have been engaged is being completed. As to the dock, I hope it will be ready to receive vessels in the course of the year, and that it will be found as valuable for naval and commercial purposes as the hon. Member anticipates. There has been some discussion with reference to the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the system of making contracts at the Admiralty. I regret very much that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Barrow-in-Furness (Mr. Caine) introduced a personal element into that discussion, and I can assure the House that it is not my intention to imitate his example. What I would say on the subject is that, when last year it was suggested that a Committee should sit and investigate the question of the making of contracts at the Admiralty—a suggestion which originated with an Admiralty Departmental Committee—I asked the Secretary to the Admiralty to undertake the task to preside over the inquiry, and associate with himself, in the duties of investigation, three Members of Parliament in addition to other Admiralty officers. We were very anxious to have as a Member of that Committee some gentleman of commercial experience, who had a knowledge of that particular class of naval stores that the Admiralty were in the habit of contracting for. The proposition was made to the Member for the Govan Division of Lanarkshire (Mr. Pearce) that he should serve on the Committee, and he assented. I believed, at that time, as did the Secretary to the Admiralty, who had the management of the inquiry, that the question of contracts for engines and hulls only would not be investigated; but the old Chief Constructor of the Navy, Sir N. Barnaby, came up to give evidence as to the last contracts that had been made in reference to certain vessels and engines. In the course of his examination, Sir N. Barnaby stated the principle on which he had recommended certain tenders; and it became apparent to the Committee, as I say, that some error had been made. I have not had time to read all the evidence; but I have no doubt that a mistake was made by an Admiralty official, and I base my assertion on the fact that, in last year's Estimates, it will be found that engines were contracted for for the Nile and Trafalgar, both of which are larger and heavier vessels than the Sanpareil and Renown, at a price lower by £10,000 and £12,000 than that paid for the last-mentioned vessels. It is clear, therefore, that the contracts made in the first case were much more beneficial to the contractor than those made in the second. So far as I can make out, the mistake arose from the Admiralty officials knowing that a certain penalty was attached to every horse-power falling short of the required power. They assumed that that penalty was the price, and deducted that sum from the total amount of the tender, by which process they brought the tender for the greater horse-power to a figure apparently lower than those for the higher. Those who read the evidence will see that one of the late chief officials admitted that he had made an error and an oversight. These contracts were completed under circumstances of great hurry, which is a fact which should not be lost sight of. It was in the year 1885, when it was considered not unlikely that we might be forced into collision with a great European Power. When the Report was presented and put on the Table of the House, a short Minute accompanied it, pointing out that the officials who now hold the position of Controller of the Navy and Chief Constructor were not those who were in Office at the time the contracts were made, and I pointed out that I believed that certain arrangements had since been made which went in the direction of meeting certain of the suggestions made by the Committee; but, at the same time, I can undertake on behalf of the Admiralty, that we will do our best to give effect to the purport of the suggestions made by the Committee. There may, however, be some controversy as to the advisability of transferring the making of contracts from the official upon whom the duty now rests. There is a reference to the matter in the Blue Book published two days ago, and the Report speaks of those recommendations. I believe we shall be able to arrive at some satisfactory conclusion which will prevent, in the future, any recurrence of what I believe to have been an error on the part of the technical officers of the Admiralty. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Devonport (Captain Price) asks me if we can give an estimate of what is the value of stores at the end of the year, and he pointed out that there is a decrease in the amount of timber. I would say, in reply, that this decrease has been deliberately made, as we find we have enough timber on hand to last us three years. The House must bear in mind that in regard to this question of naval stores the circumstances of the country have greatly changed in recent years. The great storehouses in our Dockyards were established and set up at a time when the productive power of the country was comparatively small, and when railroads were not in existence. In those days it was necessary to accumulate large quantities of stores for cases of emergency; but nowadays, should an emergency arise, we should find no difficulty in procuring large supplies of stores such as the hon. and gallant Member refers to at very short notice. I have no doubt, thanks to the agencies of electricity and steam, that now, on the shortest notice, large quantities of stores would be obtained from outside, and laid alongside the ships more quickly than they could be taken from our storehouses. The hon. and gallant Gentleman put two other questions to me—one concerning the proposal to provide pensions for widows; and the other, in reference to the promotion of warrant officers to be executive officers. I must point out that, in this matter, you have to deal with the question of half-pay, and that warrant officers under the system proposed would find it difficult to live; and I have also to point out that no warrant officer could assume the position referred to without undergoing a certain prescribed examination which is an examination that I do not suppose many warrant officers would be able to pass. With regard to the pension fund, the question is a difficult one. My hon. and gallant Friend is aware that strong opposition has come from the men themselves, so much so that a certain portion of the proposals with regard to pensions we have been obliged to abandon. I have not been able to go thoroughly into the matter myself; but I think it will be necessary to substitute some other arrangement for that proposed by the Committee. Then, the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Eastbourne Division (Admiral Field) drew attention to certain Orders in Council which, he said, have inflicted great injury and wrong upon naval officers who form part of the Board of Admiralty. Well, Sir, as was pointed out, the first Order in Council was repealed 15 years ago.

Lord George Hamilton

ADMIRAL FIELD: I know that; I stated it. I do not want to be misunderstood. It is well known that a new Patent of the Board of Admiralty rescinds the previous one. The Order in Council of 1872, no doubt, rescinded the one of 1869; but the one of 1869 is the parent of the one of 1872.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) wished to put the Board of Admiralty into the position of the Treasury Board, and he stated so. He desired to make the Naval Lords subordinates and assistants. That Order was rescinded, and the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) substituted another Order in Council, which put the Naval Lords of the Admiralty into their old position, making them Colleagues of the Board. What I have endeavoured to do, since I have held my present position, has been to increase as much as I could the individual power of the Naval Lords, and make them, as far as possible, responsible for their Departments, whilst, at the same time, giving them the opportunity of rendering themselves cognizant of the policy the Board as a body is pursuing. My noble and gallant Friend (Lord Charles Beresford) objected to attaching his name to the Estimates, because he had not had time to examine them. The desire is to make the Naval Lords share in the responsibility, and they accordingly feel it part of their duty to consider the Estimates, going carefully through them so that they may have no hesitation in attaching their signatures to them. Then, the question of naval education has been referred to. In two sentences, I will tell my hon. and gallant Friend who raised the point, how far we can agree with him, and how far we feel it impossible to agree with him. We are prepared to increase the age of entrance, and we have made arrangements for rendering examinations as general as possible. We have appointed a Council of Education to consider the whole subject; but we are not prepared to assent to the proposal of the Committee by which the age would be raised from 12½ to 16 years, nor are we prepared to assent to the system of unlimited open competition. I am perfectly satisfied that the proposals of the Committee in this respect are impracticable; and I am afraid they have made a mistake in the matter by drawing an analogy between the system in force in the Army and that that exists in the Navy. The proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, if accepted, would have the effect of diminishing the amount of competition. The hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed) pointed out that, as my Minute stated, certain of our iron-clads were much more deeply immersed than had been anticipated; and he went so far as to say that, in consequence of this defect, the vessels in question were useless. I think he quoted a remark made by the hon. Member for Southampton last year, in which he expressed a very disparaging opinion as to the utility of the Impérieux. Well, since the hon. Gentleman the Member for Southampton spoke, the Impérieux has been thoroughly tested. The officer who went out in command of the vessel was the hon. and gallant Gentleman's own flag captain on the North American Station, and he gave a most favourable account of the ship. The statement I myself made I gave after consulting the naval technical advisers—namely, that, notwithstanding the deep immersion of this and other large vessels, though there has been some miscalculation as to their draught, are amongst the most powerful iron-clads afloat. As to the observations of my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham (Mr. Maclean)—who expressed some doubt as to whether, hereafter, there was to be any statement on the Navy Estimates, and who is doubtful as to the operation of the proposed depreciation fund—I would point out to him that, on page 16, there is a statement in about half-a-dozen lines—a summary of the present condition of naval finance. We are spending this year £1,000,000 of money more than we should spend in an ordinary year, to carry out the programme of Lord Northbrook; but we are spending £138,000 less than we ought to do to make good the annual depreciation fund. If you deduct £138,000 from £1,000,000, you will have £860,000, the difference which is the margin upon which I think hereafter reduction or retrenchment can be made. The depreciation fund will give an annual sum to be expended on new construction, which will keep up the Fleet at the strength and efficiency it is estimated it should reach. [Mr. R. W. DUFF: How about the coaling stations?] There is an inquiry still going on as to them. There is no doubt that the facilities which we have for coaling are deficient, but experiments are being made. A certain apparatus was set up, which I have no doubt the hon. Member is aware of, which has been found quite inoperative; and until we are convinced as to what is the best method of shipping coal, we do not propose to incur large expenditure on this matter. Still, it is a question which must be attended to. I have answered all the questions which have been put to me. It is satisfactory to find that the experiment of publishing a printed Statement has proved successful. This is shown by the fact that the discussion to-night has been much more germane to the subjects contained in the Estimates than previous discussions. I hope the Speaker will be allowed to leave the Chair, so that the 1st Vote may be taken.

Lord George Hamilton

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I shall allow the Speaker to leave the Chair, and the first Vote to be taken, I trust the Government will permit the general discussion to take place on the Vindicating Vote in the same way as is done in connection with the Army. I have been anxious to make several observations; but I have not been willing to interpose during the discussion on the special subjects with regard to which Notices of Motion were put upon the Paper. It would have been very inconvenient if I had interposed to-night. Therefore, I hope that if the Speaker leaves the Chair, there will be no objection to discussing the question of general policy on the Vindicating Vote.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Certainly; there will be no objection.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.): I do not wish to intrude myself for very long before the House. I have sat here very patiently, for eight hours, for the purpose of supporting the Resolution which was put on the Notice Paper relating to the Haulbowline Dock. I am as deeply interested in the question as if I were the Representative of Queenstown; but I do not wish at this late hour (2 o'clock), to do more than merely tell the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) that the Irish Members do not intend to put forward their claim in regard to this dock in any ad misericordiam sense. We speak the unanimous opinion of the Irish Members, and we are determined to press this matter forward rather upon the basis that Queenstown Harbour is a most suitable site for a Royal Naval Dockyard, and that a Naval Dockyard is a necessity from our point of view; that we contribute upwards of £1,000,000 of the money on the Navy, and that some of our money ought to be returned to us in the way of expenditure in Ireland. These are the two grounds upon which we make the claim that the original plan for the construction of docks at Haulbowline shall be carried out. I sincerely hope that before it is within our power to refer to this subject again, the First Lord of the Admiralty will see his way to modify the declaration he has made that the Admiralty cannot at present proceed with the work. I am persuaded that turning the matter over in his hands to the First Lord of the Admiralty will see that the Irish people have a very strong claim on the Admiralty for some portion of its expenditure. But it must not be supposed that we merely claim that this work shall be proceeded with in order that we can get back our money. We believe that money expended on a Royal Dockyard in Cork Harbour will be money wisely expended for the benefit of the Empire at large.

Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That 62,600 men and boys be employed for the Sea and Coast Guard Services for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1888, including 12,900 Royal Marines."

DR. CLARK (Caithness): On this Vote I should like to say a word or two with regard to the use to which some of our gunboats and Marines have been put. At this early hour (2.5) I do not intend to say much; I only want to show how ridiculous it is to use gunboats and Marines as they have been used lately in the North of Scotland. The first time they were used there was about five years ago. The Liberal Government sent a gunboat and a force of Marines to coerce half-a-dozen crofters who had allowed some stock to graze on certain hills where it was said they had no right to do so. The Marines could not arrest these unfortunate crofters; indeed, all the captain could do was to suggest to the men that they should go to Edinburgh to be arrested. One-half of these so-called criminals—a Royal Naval Reserve man and others—went to Edinburgh, for the purpose of being arrested. I believe they had to wait a week before any of them were arrested. The circumstances attending the second employment of the Marines were pretty similar to those on the first occasion. A gunboat and Marines were sent to arrest a crofter. They arrested this crofter, kept him in prison for a week, and then turned him out without trying him. The man is now bringing an action in the Scotch Courts for damages. Now, our fishing districts have been the best nurseries for both Marines and blue-jackets. In the district visited by these Marines we have a large number of Naval Reserve men; but if this course is persevered in, we shall lose the district as a recruiting ground. The men of the Highlands have a great contempt for the Commissioners of Supply in the county; but up to now they have had great respect for the Marines and blue-jackets. They will soon lose this respect, if the Marines are sent often on such errands as I have described.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Perhaps it will be regarded as an acceptable suggestion that we should now adjourn. I do not wish to make a Motion to that effect; but simply to suggest that the Committee may think it worth while to report Progress. No one seems inclined to answer the remarks of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark). Perhaps, at the present moment, hon. Members are not possessed of facts to enable them to do so. [A laugh.] One of the hon. Gentleman's countrymen thinks it worth while to laugh, but not worth while to answer his speech. I think it is not unbecoming in me to suggest that we have gone far enough to-night, so far as talk is concerned. ["Hear!"] Well, I do not think the night has been marked by any serious effort at progress to-night, but, so IMPERIAL AND COLONIAL GOVERNMENT—THE CONFERENCE IN LONDON.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY, in rising to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he could assure the House that every endeavour would be made by Her Majesty's Government to secure the presence, at the opening of the Colonial Conference in April next, of suitable local Representatives of every Crown Colony, in addition to those of the self-governing Colonies for whom provision had already been made, so that the whole of Her Majesty's Colonial Empire might be represented on this important occasion? said, he had found that some great misapprehension had arisen with regard to the supposed action of Her Majesty's Government in not summoning the Representatives of the Crown Colonies to the forthcoming important Conference at the Colonial Office. He was himself convinced that there was some mistake; but the question was an important one, which strongly affected the feelings and sentiments of the Colonies, whom we desired to treat with the greatest consideration. He was sure no one desired to treat the Colonies with greater respect than his noble Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies (the Earl of Onslow), whose long association with the Colonies and his known sentiments fully bore that out. This Conference would mark a new departure of the greatest importance in regard to the Colonies. It was possible that the Colonial Office even now hardly appreciated the very grave importance of the step they had taken in summoning the Colonies to confer with us as to matters affecting the Empire. Perhaps those outside the Colonial Office saw more clearly than those within it the gravity of the matters involved. In the first place, the object of the Conference was to confer as to the mutual business arrangements between the Colonies and the Mother Country, as to our mutual defence in case of war, and it also applied to facilities for inter-communication by post and otherwise, and he imagined it would touch upon Colonization. The Conference ought to tend, and ought to be so conducted as to tend, to the unity of the Empire and the mutual relations of every part of it. The sight of the Colonies meeting in Council with ourselves would help to raise the question out of the position of a merely local one, and he ventured to say that it was needed to get rid of the local feeling which existed in many of our Colonies. He had been told that in one of our leading Colonies at the present moment there was not an elementary school in which the history of England was taught; the only history taught was the short and purely local history of that Colony itself. He would ask their Lordships to remember what our Crown Colonies were, which apparently had not been represented in the list of Colonies invited to the Conference. Amongst the Crown Colonies that had hitherto not been represented or summoned to this Conference were the West Indies—Jamaica, Honduras, Barbados, Trinidad, Bahamas, Bermuda—the West African Settlements, Gibraltar, Malta, Cyprus, Ceylon, Eastern Mauritius, the Straits Settlements, Borneo, and Fiji. The safety of the Empire depended on the safety of those Colonies whose names he had gone over. Anybody who carefully considered the matter would feel doubtful whether our more important Colonies could be maintained but for the existence of those precious little spots on the ocean. In case of war it would be everything to us to have the warm sympathy of the inhabitants of those Crown Colonies. He was in great hopes that his noble Friend would be able to assure the House that Representatives would be invited to come from every one of the Crown Colonies. It was possibly too late now to issue invitations to the first sitting of the Conference; but he would suggest that there might be two sessions, to the second of which the leading men of the Crown Colonies might be invited. He hoped they would this year see the Representatives of all the Colonies joining in the Jubilee Thanksgiving Service. In conclusion, he hoped no question of expense would be allowed to stand in the way of having the very best Representatives from all these various Colonies. He was sure their Lordships would be the very last people to grudge the expenditure necessary to secure so great a result.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of Onslow), in reply, said, he was very glad to have an opportunity of removing what the noble Earl (the Earl of Harrowby) had accurately described as a certain amount of misapprehension which appeared to have arisen in the public mind not only with regard to the Representatives of the Crown Colonies at the coming Conference; but also as to the value and importance which Her Majesty's Government attached to the meeting of that Conference generally. He believed he spoke the opinion of Her Majesty's Ministers, as well as of noble Lords in that House, when he said that there was probably no event in the forthcoming Jubilee year which would be of such interest and importance as this great meeting of distinguished men from all parts of Her Majesty's Empire. The increasing interest which was felt with regard to our Colonies in this country, and also the increasing desire on the part of the Colonies for closer communion with the Mother Country, were among the most significant features of the times, and he was quite certain Her Majesty's Government were desirous and eager to accord a hearty welcome to the Representatives whom they had summoned from distant shores and all parts of the world to meet in the capital of the Empire for the purpose of conferring together on Imperial questions. Since the Question of the noble Lord had been placed on the Paper, a Notice had appeared in the Press that the Colonies not possessing Representative Governments would not be officially represented in the Conference. That was to say, a communication had been made by the late Secretary for the Colonies to the Governors of the Crown Colonies, in the course of which he made the following statement:—

"In the case of any Crown Colony which may not send a special Representative, I shall take care that other provision is made for securing such representation. If, however, you are in a position to furnish me with the name of any high officer or leading public man connected with the Colony who is likely to be in London during the Spring of next year, I should be glad to arrange for his presence at the Conference, at which matters specially affecting your Colony are likely to come up for discussion."

After the first meeting of the Conference he apprehended that there would not be a very large number of subjects which would fall under that latter category, but at the same time the noble Earl might rest assured that if there were such subjects there were Representatives in this country for most, if not all, the Crown Colonies, who would be invited by Her Majesty's Government. He might inform the noble Earl that Her Majesty's Government had made inquiries as to which of the distinguished persons from the Crown Colonies were now in England or could arrive in time for the opening of the Conference, and the result of those inquiries had been to show that there would be a Representative from very nearly every Crown Colony, who would be invited to attend at the opening meeting. It would then be seen that Her Majesty's Government had endeavoured to carry out the proposition contained in the Question of the noble Earl. He might add beyond that, that where there was more than one such distinguished person in this country, preference would be given to Members of local Legislatures, in order that they might hear the views of Her Majesty's Government and explain such unofficial views as were taken on the subject in the Crown Colonies.

House adjourned at quarter before Five o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 18th March, 1887.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee
—Resolutions [March 17] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS.—Ordered—First Reading—Water-works Valuation and Rating (Scotland)* [203].

First Reading—Justices' Jurisdiction* [201]; Army (Annual)* [202].

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.—First Reading—Local Government (Ireland) (Carrick - on - Suir)* [200].

QUESTIONS.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAMS—REGISTERED ADDRESSES.

Mr. BLANE (Armagh, S.) asked the Postmaster General, If he would allow telegrams to be sent without insisting on a multiple address when telegrams are within the same district or town, thus—

“Broker,” London,
to “Foundry,” London, might be rendered—“Broker,” } London?
to “Foundry,” }

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I am not quite sure whether the hon. Member refers to telegrams sent from one registered address to another. If so, I may state that there is no necessity for the sender of such a telegram to give either his name or address. If, however, the Question relates to telegrams with multiple addresses, it would be very inconvenient to make the concession suggested. To prevent misunderstanding in dealing with such telegrams, it is necessary that the name of the place of destination should be telegraphed with each address. An important consideration in the matter is that the Department has registered, as part of abbreviated addresses, a large number of double names; and much confusion would result from any change of practice likely to render less apparent the distinction between telegrams for such double registered names and telegrams intended for a multiple address.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)— MONITORS IN NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

Mr. BLANE (Armagh, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland have determined not to appoint any more monitors, on the plea that the country is overstocked with teachers; and, if so, what compensation they intend to offer to the monitors who may lose appointment as assistant teachers; whether the Government will consider the desirability of prolonging the apprenticeship, at an increased salary, of the present staff of monitors who may be unable to obtain the promise of a school, and would thus be debarred from entering the Training College; and, whether in the large convent schools paid by Capitation Grant, one out of every two of the out-going monitors may be retained as assistant teacher, and allowed the usual salary by the Board?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The

Mr. Blane

Commissioners of National Education inform me that they have merely suspended the appointment of new monitors until next July, owing to excess in the number over the requirements of the service. No question of compensation arises. The Commissioners do not consider it expedient to prolong the period of monitorship.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—POLICE AT TOBERMORE, S. DERRY.

Mr. OHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) (for Mr. T. M. HEALY) (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why no police are stationed in Tobermore, South Derry; is it the fact that Nationalists passing through the village are exposed at night to constant apprehensions of violence, that in other villages of the constituency the population and number of police are as follows:—

Magherafelt, pop.	1,514,	eleven	police
Moneymore, „	588,	six	„
Castledawson, „	160,	five	„
Ballyronon, „	100,	five	„
Gulladuff, „	50,	five	„

while Tobermore, with over 400 inhabitants, has no police; and, if protection in future will be afforded to travellers through that village?

Mr. LEA (Londonderry, S.) said, before the Question was answered, he would ask if the inhabitants of Tobermore did not bear the highest character as people of orderly conduct; and if it were not quite unnecessary for the police to be stationed there?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): In answer to the Question on the Paper, I am informed that the statistical portions are correct. No single instance is known to the District Inspector of any violence having been offered to the Nationalists of Tobermore. The locality is a particularly peaceable one, and adequate police protection is afforded by patrols from the neighbouring stations. I hope the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lea) will take that as a complete answer to his Question.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—IM- PRISONMENT OF WILLIAM CASSELS.

Dr. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is the case that William Cassels, sentenced on the 5th instant by the Sheriff Substitute at Portree to three weeks' imprisonment from his committal on December 23, had been kept in prison awaiting trial 10 weeks from that date, or seven weeks beyond the term of his actual sentence; and, if he will explain why a prisoner ultimately tried summarily before a Court whose powers of imprisonment are limited to two months, was detained in prison 10 weeks awaiting trial?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I have made inquiry into this case. During last winter the time of the Procurator Fiscal of Skye was much occupied in consequence of important criminal investigations and trials, some of which latter took place in Edinburgh. But, while this, to some extent, explains the delay in Cassels' case, it does not, in my opinion, excuse it altogether, as I am satisfied that there was no sufficient cause for so long a detention in prison before trial, and my decision that this was so will be conveyed to the Procurator Fiscal. I ought to add that, although the offender was tried in the Summary Court, this was not the original intention, as Cassels was ordered by my Depute to be tried by a jury; and the order was only cancelled in consequence of the long and improper delay in preparing the case, Crown Counsel thinking it better to order trial at once in a Summary Court, rather than detain the accused over the additional time of notice required in jury cases.

JURORS (IRELAND)—RETURN.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) (for Mr. T. M. HEALY) (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Would he have any objection to grant a Return showing the number of jurors in each county and county of a city having separate Assizes in Ireland for the present year, and the number of Parliamentary electors also?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have no objection to such a Return being laid on the Table as soon as it can be prepared, if the hon. and learned Member wishes to move for it.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)— THE RIOTS AT BELFAST—CHARGES OF JUDGE O'BRIEN TO THE GRAND JURIES.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) (for Mr. T. M. HEALY) (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Would he have any objection to lay upon the Table a copy of Judge O'Brien's Charge to the Antrim Grand Jury after the late Belfast riots, and also his Charge to the Kerry Grand Jury last week; and, could he state the number of persons killed and wounded during the Belfast riots, and the number killed or wounded by outrage in Kerry or Limerick, from the Summer Assizes of 1886 to the Spring Assizes of 1887?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Addresses of the Judges are, I have no doubt, published with substantial accuracy in the Press. The Government have no special information on the subject, and I do not see what advantage would be gained by laying the newspaper extracts on the Table. I am informed that the number of persons known to have been killed during the Belfast riots last year is 30, including the Head Constable and soldier who lost their lives. There is no record of the wounded. The police have information of eight persons killed and seven wounded by outrage in Kerry and Limerick since the Summer Assizes.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—BUILDING OF ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS—THE CONSULTING ARCHITECT.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, with reference to the Circular recently issued by the Education Department—“Education Department, Whitehall, London, S.W.

“Experience has shown that efficiency and economy in school-building have been greatly promoted by means of suggestions made by the consulting architect of this Department, and by conferences between him and the architects of school boards and voluntary managers.

“As the making of such suggestions and the holding of such conferences are beyond what can be officially required from the consulting architect, and occupy a very considerable portion of his private time, your attention is directed to the following regulations:—

"1. The duty of the consulting architect is to advise the Department and to point out which of the building rules have been violated; and he is prohibited from himself undertaking the erection of elementary schools.

"2. In cases where school boards, managers or their architects require professional information or suggestions from the architect to the Department, as to the best mode of making the plan conform to such rules, he shall be entitled to charge fees on the following scale:—

"For advising on plans of schools not exceeding 250 children, £3 3s.

"For advising on plans of schools not exceeding 500 children, £4 4s.

"Above this number, £5 5s.

"In the case of a school board the fee will form part of the sum to be borrowed.—I have the honour to be, etc., P. CUMMINS."

Whether, inasmuch as the arrangement suggested to school boards is that they shall employ at their expense an officer of the Education Department in a matter in which he has afterwards to officially advise the Department, he will state the reasons for issuing the Circular?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The rules as to planning and fitting up schools are published, and are so plain and explicit that any competent architect should be able to apply them. It is the duty of the Education Department, through their architect, to point out in each case any of the rules which have not been observed; but it often requires special professional knowledge to discover the best mode of making a plan conform to the rules, and this does not fall within the province of the consulting architect of the Department. He is not an officer of the Department in the sense of being a Civil servant and entitled to a pension; but he is a gentleman in general practice who is retained to advise the Department whether the printed rules laid down have been complied with. He is debarred from himself undertaking the building of elementary schools; but many school boards have expressed a desire to avail themselves of his professional services, and by the Circular in question they are permitted. The employment of his services is entirely optional in each case, and other Departments have adopted the same principle.

IRISH REPRODUCTIVE LOAN FUND ACT—CO. KERRY.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury

Mr. J. E. Ellis

What is the amount of money under the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act to the credit of the County of Kerry; and, whether any portion of this might be available for the purpose of erecting artisans' dwellings in the town of Tralee; and, if so, how much, and on what terms?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The amount to the credit of County Kerry under the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act is £12,784. No portion of this could be applied to the erection of artisans' dwellings (see Section 4 of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 86, the Act which regulates the purposes to which the Fund may be applied).

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE MAAMTRASNA TRIALS—PAT JOYCE.

MR. MC CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the report which appeared in The Galway Observer of the 5th instant, of a case brought by Pat Joyce against Stephen Joyce, at the Clonbur Petty Sessions, in which it is stated that, according to the oath of the clerk of Petty Sessions, the cuts which appeared on Pat Joyce's forehead at the time of the trial, and which he swore had been inflicted by the defendant, were not there when the complainant applied to the clerk for the summons, and must have been caused since then; whether the presiding magistrates are reported as having made the following observations from the Bench:—

"Mr. Lynch, J.P.—During my whole experience as a magistrate I have never heard or seen such a glaring case of perjury. I certainly would be for sending the blackguard to gaol with hard labour.

"Mr. Jackson, J.P.—I must certainly agree with you, that he deserves the severest punishment we can inflict;"

whether these statements are true; whether Pat Joyce was a Crown witness at the Maamtrasna trials; whether he is the son of Anthony Joyce, who was a Crown witness at same trials; and, whether, under these additional circumstances, the Government will now cause an inquiry to be made into the cases of the Maamtrasna prisoners, with the view to consider the justice of their continued imprisonment?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am informed that the facts are substantial as stated, except that the observations of the clerk of Petty Sessions were not on oath, and that the relationship between the two Joyces is not as described. I am advised that there is nothing in these circumstances to call for any re-opening of the Maamtrasna case, the result of which depended in no way on the evidence of any single witness.

Mr. M'CARTAN asked whether this man Joyce was not a witness for the Crown in the Maamtrasna cases?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe he was.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND)—

MR. C. H. JAMES—LATE OFFICIAL ASSIGNEE.

Mr. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether Mr. C. H. James, late Official Assignee to the Irish Court of Bankruptcy, had been required to give security before or after his appointment; if so, whether he can state who were the sureties, and for what amount was the bond given; whether the bond was in force at the time of his dismissal; and, whether the sureties have since paid the amount of their liability; if not, whether steps will be taken to enforce the payment of same?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The late Official Assignee gave security to the extent of £5,000, which security was in force on his dismissal, and one half of it has been already paid, and the remainder is secured. The whole matter is now being investigated, and I think I can assure the hon. Gentleman that no loss will be sustained.

IRELAND—HARBOURS &c., ON WEST COAST—PORT OF SLIGO.

Mr. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received a copy of a Resolution passed by the County Sligo Grand Jury at the late Spring Assizes, calling attention to the necessity of improved port facilities to that part of the West Coast of Ireland; whether the Port of Sligo, considering its importance towards the development of the industries of the Western Province, is entitled to the favourable consideration of the Treasury; whether the Royal Commissioners on Irish Public Works will be instructed by the Government to inquire into the claims of the Sligo Harbour Board, as put forward in the several Memorials forwarded by them to the Treasury; and, what reply, if any, was sent to the Secretary to the Grand Jury, on receipt of the copy of Resolution referred to?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): A Resolution of the Sligo Grand Jury in favour of improved port facilities was received by the Government; but it is one with regard to which the Government regret to say that they do not feel in a position to take any present action. As the hon. Member is probably aware, it is not competent for me to give any instructions to a Royal Commission as to what evidence they will receive.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—EXEMPTION FROM ATTENDANCE—THE BYE-LAWS—ATTENDANCE PARTIAL.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the Education Department expect school attendance authorities to carry out the requirements in the Department's model form of bye-laws, to the effect that before a child of school age can be partially exempt from attendance at school, its parent must show to the satisfaction of the Local Authority, that the employment of the child is necessary on account of the circumstances of the family; if so, whether school attendance authorities should carry out this requirement fairly to all parties by making no distinction as to the kind of employment, provided that it is not an injurious one; and, whether any unfairness to others would arise in the Local Authorities making a distinction as to the kind of employment, by acting in accordance with a declaration by the Department, that if a child of school age is employed half-time in a factory, it should be assumed that the employment of such child is necessary, without having any regard to the circumstances of the family?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The Education Department do expect school attendance authorities to carry out the bye-laws; and they should do so, of course, in a manner which is, in their opinion, fair to all parties. What the Department has said is, that where a child is employed in a factory, school authorities generally assume that such employment is beneficial and necessary, and grant partial exemption to such children as half-timers. It is difficult to see how this view can involve injustice to others, as the bye-laws leave the Local Authorities the right to exercise their judgment in the matter.

POST OFFICE — THE TELEGRAPH BRANCH AND THE POSTAL BRANCH.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether he is aware that the utmost dissatisfaction exists in almost every Telegraph Office in the United Kingdom, owing to the fact that in the Postal Branch the number of "superior appointments" largely exceeds that of similar appointments in the Telegraph Branch, although the Telegraph Staff, in the aggregate, exceeds in most cases that of the Postal Branch, and the duties performed in the Telegraph Branch are, if not superior, at least equal to those in the Postal Branch; and, whether, if he finds this to be so, he will endeavour to equalize, as far as possible, the "superior appointments" in the two Branches?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I am not aware of any great dissatisfaction such as is stated to exist in almost every telegraph office. The number of superior appointments allotted to each post office is regulated strictly according to the number of supervising or other superior duties to be performed. For the indoor telegraph work a smaller number of supervising officers is required than for the indoor postal work. The postal work, in contradistinction to the telegraph work, comprises several branches, such as the receipt and disposal of mails, including letters both ordinary and registered, book packets, newspapers, and parcels, the transaction of money order, savings banks, insurance, and annuity business, the sale of stamps, both postal and inland revenue, the issue of inland revenue licences, and the general charge of the accounts, including, in some cases, large money responsibility. Of the total gross revenue earned by the Department less than one-fifth consists of revenue from telegraph business. These several duties must at large offices be conducted in more separate rooms than the telegraph business; and they, therefore, require for their efficient performance a larger number of superior officers in proportion to the whole of the postal staff than are required in the Telegraph Office, in which there is no such diversity of duty. Under these circumstances, it would not be right to endeavour, as the hon. Member suggests, to equalize the superior appointments in the two Branches of the Service by creating appointments for which there are no corresponding duties. I may add that the complaint made can only apply to the very large Provincial Head Offices, about 60 in number, as only at those offices separate staffs are employed for postal and telegraph work. At all the other Head Post Offices, about 850 in number, there is one establishment for both Branches.

TELEGRAPHS ACT, 1868—PRE-TRANSFER TELEGRAPH CLERKS.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether pre-transfer Telegraph Clerks can, under "The Telegraphs Act, 1868," still claim the title and privileges of "Clerks in the permanent Civil Service of the Crown;" and, if so, what rights and privileges does that Act confer upon them; and, has the Postmaster General the power to substitute the title of "Telegraphist" or "Sorting Clerk and Telegraphist," either of which apparently deprives such pre-transfer Telegraph Clerks of their rights and privileges?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR RICHARD WEBSTER) (Iale of Wight): The rights of pre-transfer clerks are fixed by The Telegraphs Act, 1868, and they are entitled to the rights and privileges which are determined by the character of the offices to which they were appointed in the same way as other officers and clerks in the permanent Civil Service of the Crown. By Sub-section 7 of Section 8 of the Act means were provided whereby the question whether an appointment offered to a pre-transfer clerk was of equal value with an appointment previously held by him should be ascertained at the time of his appointment by agreement, or, if necessary, by arbitration. No change of title or description can, in my opinion, alter the rights which pre-transfer clerks now possess by virtue of their appointment.

Sir William Hart Dyke

IRELAND—ALLEGED ILLEGAL LOTTERIES.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether the lotteries advertised in The Scotsman of 6th November, 1886, and 14th December, 1886, to be held in Dublin on the 20th November, 1886, and 15th December, 1886, respectively, were contrary to law; and, if so, why such lotteries were permitted by the Legal Authorities?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): My attention was only called to this matter a few days ago by the Lord Advocate, and at this distance of time from the occurrence there would be but little utility in investigating it. I observe, however, from the advertisement, that the drawing was for a charitable purpose; and I am aware that when similar drawings were brought to the notice of some of my Predecessors they did not deem it expedient to prosecute.

INDIA—(BOMBAY)—THE HINDOO MARRIAGE LAWS—CASE OF RUKMABAI.

MR. COZENS-HARDY (Norfolk, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Rukmabai, a defendant in an action, pending in the Bombay High Court, for the restitution of conjugal rights; whether this lady, when only a child of 11, was married without her consent; whether she has since received a high English education and developed considerable literary power; whether, while she is a lady of refinement, her nominal husband is a labourer earning only 10 rupees a month, unable to support her, and suffering from consumption; whether the Judges of the High Court have ordered her to join her nominal husband within a month, and whether she will be liable to be sent to prison for six months if she refuses to do so; and, whether the Government propose to take any action to prevent the Courts of Law from being used to compel adult Hindoo women, whose child marriages have never been followed by cohabitation, to live with their nominal husbands?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The proceedings of the Courts in India, which are public, are not officially reported to the Secretary of State. I have thus no means of information not equally open to the hon. Member. It appears from the Indian law reports that Rukmabai when a child of 11 was married with the consent of her guardians to a husband then aged 19. After the marriage she continued to live with her mother, and the marriage was never consummated. Eleven years afterwards the husband called upon his wife to live with him and she refused. I have no reasons to doubt the statements as to the relative positions of the husband and wife implied in the Question. The husband instituted a suit for institution or restitution of conjugal rights. The Court of First Instance held that the suit was not maintainable. This judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal in March, 1886, and the case was remanded to the Court of First Instance for a decision on the merits. The decision of this Court appears to have been now given in favour of the husband. How the decision of the Court is to be enforced, and what would be the consequence to the wife disobeying its orders, are questions of Indian Law upon which I must decline to give an opinion. But the wife may appeal to the Court of Appeal against the decision on the merits, and the two judgments of the Court of Appeal—that on the law and on the merits—if given—may be reviewed by the Privy Council; while the case is thus still pending any consideration such as that suggested in the last paragraph of the Question would be premature.

CUSTOMS HOUSE—FOREIGN GOODS BEARING BRITISH TRADE MARKS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, What are the Regulations issued to Customs House officers as to the importation of foreign goods bearing British names or marks; and, if he will direct the greatest vigilance to be exercised at all ports in the United Kingdom, to prevent foreign manufactured goods entering this country having any indications whatever calculated to suggest the belief that they are British made?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The goods in question are designed to be marked at Section 2 of the Revenue Act, 1883. As regards the second part of the Question, I am informed that great vigilance is being exercised under the existing law; and the House is aware the Government has introduced a Bill, now before a Select Committee, which, if passed, will make still more stringent the Regulations.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside) asked, whether the hon. Gentleman was aware that these Regulations were differently administered in different ports; that in some ports the goods were impounded, while in other cases they were allowed to pass free?

MR. JACKSON said, he feared he was not sufficiently acquainted with the different Regulations to be able to answer that Question. He had, however, had some conversation with the Custom House Authorities with a view to the carrying out of the Regulations.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF POOR LAW GUARDIANS—CLAIMS TO VOTE.

MR. HOOPER (Cork, S.E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, under the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 83, s. 15, any ratepayer claiming to vote at the election of Poor Law Guardians in respect of property not in his occupation, or in respect of a beneficial interest in property in his occupation, must first execute a claim to vote in presence of a Justice of the Peace; whether it is a portion of the duties of Justices of the Peace to take declarations necessary by law, and to permit documents of the nature in question to be executed before them, or whether it is in the power of Justices to disfranchise voters of different political opinions by refusing; whether it is the fact that the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Sir Edward Sullivan) on several occasions reprimanded Justices for refusing to permit claims to vote to be executed before them; whether, on the 19th day of February, 1887, Mr. John M'Donnell applied to Mr. Whitney, J.P., Nohoval Cove, Kinsale, to be permitted to execute a claim to vote in the Kinsale Union before him, and was refused, and whether Mr. Whitney, on the 21st of February, refused John Kiely under similar circumstances; and, whether Mr. Whitney was justified in so refusing?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, he was afraid it was scarcely in accordance with his duty to advise an hon. Member on an abstract question of law, such as that raised by the Question of the hon. Member. He was informed there was no record of any reprimand to magistrates on this matter by the late Sir Edward Sullivan. His predecessor, the late Mr. Law, when Lord Chancellor, did investigate such a complaint; but he was satisfied with the explanation which was given by the magistrate concerned. No complaint had been made to the present Lord Chancellor of any such action as was attributed in the Question.

Mr. Jackson

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS—FIXITY OF TENURE.

MR. COCHRANE-BAILLIE (St. Pancras, N.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of the Government to give a guarantee that the Civil Service writers employed on permanent duties shall receive the fixity of tenure which their work warrants, and that they shall be discharged only in case of misbehaviour or incompetence, thus relieving them of the necessity of being at the caprice of Heads of Departments, who are not in all cases disinterested parties; and, whether, if necessary, he will cause a Treasury Order to be issued to that effect?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): I wish to take the opportunity which the Question of the hon. Member affords me to say that the Chairman of the Commission appointed to inquire into the condition of the Civil Service has informed me that the Commission will deal with the case of the writers. I must decline to give a guarantee of fixity of tenure to Civil Service copyists. Such a guarantee would contravene the principles regulating their entrance into the Public Service. Copyists are not dismissed by Heads of Departments. The power to dismiss them rests with the Civil Service Commissioners. When the Heads of Departments say that their services are no longer required they come again under the control of the Civil Service Commissioners, who decide the conditions of their future employment. Now, I wish to call attention to a phrase in this Question which ought not to have been introduced into it. I refer to the following words:—

“Thus relieving them of the necessity of being at the caprice of Heads of Departments, who are not in all cases disinterested parties.”

I am not aware of any ground justifying the sweeping allegation contained in those words. There are certain classes of Civil servants who are able to form themselves into large Associations, and by that means to exercise considerable Parliamentary influence, to the detriment of the Public Service generally. The Heads of Departments have no such means of influencing public opinion; and they ought, therefore, all the more to command the support and consideration of the Government and Parliament when allegations of this kind are made.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked, whether it was a fact that during the last few weeks a very large number of copyists in different Departments had been removed by those over them from the work upon which they had been engaged for a considerable time, and had been put upon work properly described as copying? He also asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman would obtain from the Civil Service Commission a Return showing the work upon which copyists had been engaged during the last six months, such Return to be verified in each case by the copyists personally concerned?

MR. GOSCHEN replied that the Royal Commission was inquiring into the case of the copyists. As the Commission had undertaken that duty, he was not disposed to interfere in the way suggested.

LAW AND POLICE—ALLEGED ASSAULT ON MR. FRANCIS CONNOLLY.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If Mr. Francis Connolly, of 29, Foley Street, Portland Place, on coming out of Hyde Park on Sunday, 13th instant, was violently assaulted by Police Constable “35 D,” and forcibly thrust from the pavement; whether the constable followed him to the opposite corner of Cumberland Place, endeavouring to trip him up, and struck him a violent blow with his closed fist; whether, in consequence of Mr. Connolly's resistance to this treatment, the constable arrested him, and had him brought before Mr. De Rutzen, at Marylebone Police Court, and sentenced to 14 days' hard labour; and, whether the evidence of the policeman was unsustained by other testimony, and the defence was supported by the evidence of Messrs. J. G. Pope, G. Kurman, A. Bryant, and P. Fitzpatrick; and, if so, whether the Government will cause an inquiry to be made into Mr. Francis Connolly's imprisonment?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.), in reply, said, that he had obtained the magistrates' Report and a copy of the evidence. The magistrate was satisfied beyond doubt that the prisoner was guilty of assaulting the policeman. The prisoner had given notice of appeal; but he had not appealed. The evidence of the police-constable was corroborated by three others; and, in the opinion of the magistrate, there was not the slightest reason to suppose that the police committed perjury. There was no ground for advising an inquiry or an interference with the sentence.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—POLICE SUPERVISION.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that in every Constabulary barrack, or in every district barrack, throughout Ireland, there is a policeman appointed to keep, in a diary supplied for the purpose, a note of the movements of certain persons in that particular district; whether the persons so kept under police supervision consist of Roman Catholic clergymen, and those persons in the district who in any special way assist in the advancement of the Irish National movement; whether the list of names of persons so watched was made up from the Return furnished from the various police stations, in pursuance of a Circular issued in November, 1885, and a copy of which appeared in United Ireland of the 20th of November last; whether this list of names was furnished to each barrack from the office of the Divisional Magistrate within whose division such barrack is situate; whether the Return required by this Circular included as directed men and also

“who were likely to take a leading part in the commission of outrage.”

"Roman Catholic clergymen, and other persons of note, who take a leading part in the National movement, and from their position and status have influence over the people;"

whether instructions have been given to the diarist to make an entry of the persons with whom any prominent Nationalist visiting the district may happen to call or associate; and, whether promotion or reward has been given to some of the policemen so employed, for the manner in which they had executed their duty in this regard?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The instructions issued to the police in Ireland are confidential, and I cannot undertake to communicate them to the House. But I may state generally, in answer to the hon. Member, that the police are directed to watch any person whose movements are thought likely to be injurious to the peace and good order of their districts.

MR. MC CARTAN pointed out that the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the part of the Question which asked if the police were not directed to watch "Roman Catholic clergymen and other persons of note?"

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no exception to the general rule I have laid down in favour of either clergymen or laymen.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked, whether the police were watching certain people at Derry who threatened that unless they got reductions of rent they would form an Association—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

ADMIRALTY—COALING AT HOME PORTS.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he will lay upon the Table the Report of the Committee on the existing facilities for Coaling Ships at the Home Ports, the best means of improving the same, and proposals for their rapid extension, 1885; and, whether the Admiralty propose to take any action upon it?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The Report in question is strictly confidential, and could not be made public. Experiments are now being carried out at Portland, with a view to ascertaining how far the system recommended by the Committee can be practically applied to Her Majesty's ships. We propose, when these are completed, to commence improving the present scheme, and it is intended to erect a coaling jetty at Haulbowline recommended by the Committee this year.

ADMIRALTY—THE DOCKYARDS—CONSTRUCTION OF SHEERS AT PEMBROKE.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether a letter, containing an offer from a well-known firm, has been laid before him, for the construction of the most approved form of sheers at Pembroke, to lift 100 tons, for £5,000 to £6,000, in four to five months, or at less than half the official estimate, and in less than half the time; and, whether he will cause the sheers to be constructed at this small outlay, thereby render Pembroke Dockyard efficient, and be enabled to hoist the engines and boilers into the ships now building there, as well as to perform any future heavy work, which, though not at present contemplated, may be required at any time in the event of war?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): I am given to understand that a communication on this subject has been received at the Admiralty; but the matter has not been brought to my notice, and until I have had time to look into it carefully, I can express no opinion upon its practicability.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—MULLINGAR POST OFFICE.

MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether four additional letter carriers have been added to the staff of the Mullingar Post Office within the last 18 months; whether, notwithstanding the recognized rule of the Department, that where any such increase is made in the staff of a post office, extra stripes are provided for that office, no additional provision has been made for the Mullingar Office; whether three of the letter carriers at Mullingar are, by reason of their years of service, due stripes for a considerable time past; whether, although recommended for same by the Postmaster, the stripes have not as yet been awarded; and, what is the cause of the delay?

Mr. M. Carlan

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The short Notice which the hon. Member has given has not admitted of my making inquiry into the particular case of Mullingar. I may observe, however, that in the Question the rule of the Department is not stated quite correctly. Except in the case of five or six Post Offices—and those of the largest size—good conduct stripes are allotted not to offices, but to districts; and it by no means follows that, because a particular office receives an increase of force, the good conduct stripes which the increase carries will fall to the same office. There is hardly an office in the Kingdom at which postmen who have served the prescribed periods are not waiting for stripes; and as these become vacant they are conferred upon the men who, out of the whole of the district, are considered to have the prior claim to the distinction.

VACCINATION—INSTRUCTIONS TO PUBLIC VACCINATORS.

MR. M'ARTHUR (Leicester) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, with a view to minimise the risks of vaccination, new Instructions have been issued to public vaccinators; whether, in Article 7 of these Instructions, direction is given for the careful examination of vaccinifers as to the existence of skin diseases, and particularly of hereditary syphilis; and, whether eminent authorities like Mr. Jonathan Hutchinson and Mr. Brudenell Carter have testified that the signs of syphilis are frequently undistinguishable until after the vaccination age?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Revised Instructions have been issued; but the direction referred to was contained in the old Instructions. I am not aware whether Mr. Hutchinson and Mr. Brudenell Carter have testified in the way referred to in the last Question; but I may say that the Board know of no evidence of syphilis having been communicated by vaccination from a child not itself presenting signs of syphilis. I may add that I am informed that signs of inherited syphilis in a child usually make their appearance within two months after birth, and the customary vaccination age in England is three or four months.

CHINA—GERMAN PROTECTORATE OVER ISLANDS OF CHUSAN.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that Germany has annexed, or occupied, or acquired, a protectorate over the Island of Chusan, or one of its Dependencies; and, whether such an act would be regarded by Her Majesty's Government as constituting a violation of the Convention between Great Britain and China, signed on the 4th of April, 1846?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): No such information has reached Her Majesty's Government.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON asked the right hon. Gentleman if he would answer the latter part of the Question?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I cannot undertake to answer a hypothetical Question.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—“STORMY EVICTIONS IN MAYO.”

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to a paragraph on page 8 of The Pall Mall Gazette of Wednesday, 16th March, headed Stormy Evictions in Mayo, or if he has other knowledge of the facts referred to therein—namely, that the Resident Magistrate present at the eviction stated—

“If the people offered resistance the police must shoot them down.” “A bailiff, named Gallagher, abused by an old woman when he was removing her furniture, drew a revolver and threatened to shoot her.” “A dying lad was carried from one of the cabins, and last night he received the last rites of the Roman Catholic Church?”

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have inquired whether these statements are true; but as the Question only appeared yesterday, the reply has not yet reached me.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE QUEEN'S CORONER — POWERS OF COMMITTAL.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether the Queen's Coroner, presiding in his Court, has power to commit witnesses for contempt, in refusing to answer questions put to them at an inquest; whether the officers and men of the Royal Irish Constabulary, to whom a Coroner's warrant committing a witness for contempt is directed, are bound to execute the same; and, whether an Executive officer is entitled to supersede such warrant, or suspend its execution?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I am asked in this Question for an abstract legal opinion which I have always declined to give, as it can be rarely useful and must be often misleading. If there is brought to my notice any specific instance in which it is alleged constables acted illegally, I shall endeavour to deal with it.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Constable Bulmer, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, was committed to gaol by Mr. Coroner Rice, on Wednesday last, for refusing to answer questions tending to discover the person who bayoneted Patrick Hanlon, of Youghal; whether District Inspector Smith, to whom the Coroner handed the warrant for execution, has executed or made any attempt to execute the same; and, what steps the Government intend to take to insure the execution of the Coroner's warrant?

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the Coroner has made repeated complaints of receiving no assistance in the conduct of the inquest from the police officers at Youghal; whether the District Inspector refused to execute a warrant which the Coroner issued against a policeman for contempt of Court; and, whether he will telegraph orders to the officer in charge of the police at Youghal to render the same assistance to the Coroner in this case as he would give in a case where the suspected culprit was not a member of the Constabulary Force?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have called for a Report as to the alleged matters of fact set forth in both these Questions; but there has not been time to admit of its receipt.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)— THE DISTURBANCES AT YOUGHAL.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the following statements, which appeared in The Times of last Friday, are true:—That a determined effort was made on the previous night to burn the house of Inspector Kerin at Youghal; that the crowd broke the windows of the Protestant Schools and the Methodist Church at Youghal; that children of 12 to 14 years of age were found drunk in the doorways, early on Thursday morning, in the streets of Youghal; and, whether any official Report, in reference to the above alleged outrages, was made by the local police officer to the authorities at Dublin Castle previous to this Question appearing on the Notice Paper?

Mr. Lane

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The foundation for this report appears to be that on the night of the 7th instant a lighted tar barrel was thrown against the hall door of the District Inspector's house, and that some glass was broken in the windows of the Protestant Schools and of the Methodist Church. The police do not know of any children having been intoxicated.

MR. LANE asked, was the right hon. Gentleman aware that the throwing of this lighted tar barrel into the doorway of the Inspector's house had been represented as a determined effort to burn the house down?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not see it is part of my function to ascertain the accuracy of reports in newspapers. I have informed the hon. Member of the facts, and he may put what construction he pleases on them.

MR. LANE: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether he is aware that it has been sworn by responsible officers in Youghal that there was not a scintilla of foundation for these reports in The Times?

[No reply.]

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)— THE DISTURBANCES AT YOUGHAL— LETTER OF DR. C. RONAYNE, J.P.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has seen a copy of the following letter, which was addressed by Dr. Charles Ronayne, J.P. (the only magistrate living in the town of Youghal) to Mr. Kerin, the District Inspector of Youghal:—

"Dear Sir,—I am just after coming from the death of a fine young man, who was stabbed by a policeman. I went to the barracks to see who was in charge of the police, and to inquire what circumstances produced the sad business. I found there a number of strange police, and a young officer, Mr. Somerville, who assumed the responsibility of having ordered the charge that caused this young man's death. Now, as I have taken great pains for the past 24 hours to preserve the peace in this usually quiet town, and as I am of opinion that there was not the least danger to apprehend any public disturbance, and as I am afraid that it was the advent of these new men led to this calamity, I desire to know from you, as the Residing District Inspector, under what circumstances they were brought or sent here.—Yours faithfully, whether this magistrate had been taking a very active part for some days previously, in co-operation with the Catholic clergymen of Youghal, in allaying the excitement caused by the threatened arrest of the Reverend Father Keller; why the police authorities ignored him by not consulting him as to the necessity of bringing a force of strange police into Youghal; and, whether the preservation of the peace of Youghal has been transferred from the magistrates of Youghal to the police officer?

"6th March, 1887. CHARLES RONATNE;"

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Report on this subject was only called for yesterday, when the Question appeared. It has, of course, not yet been received.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULUS.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Zulus have now accepted the settlement made between Her Majesty's Government and the Boers of the New Republic, or whether their protests against the new boundary line still remain unrevoked?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): I have heard nothing of a later date on the subject from Sir Arthur Havelock than his telegram of February 15, printed at page 191 of Parliamentary Paper C 4,980, saying that Mr. Osborn had received favourable answers from Dinzulu, Undabuko, and other Chiefs. The correspondence printed at the end of that Parliamentary Paper shows that the Zulus had had the situation fully explained to them; and I entertain little doubt that they now practically acquiesce in the general settlement as well as the boundary line.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT (1854)

AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What course the Government intend to pursue with reference to the Merchant Shipping Act (1854) Amendment (No. 2) Bill, which raises an important International Question, and seeks to annul arrangements which have subsisted between Great Britain and Foreign Countries for upwards of 30 years?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The course to be taken by Her Majesty's Government with reference to a Bill for the amendment of the Merchant Shipping Act belongs naturally to the Board of Trade. The Law Officers are being consulted with reference to the bearing of existing Treaties upon the proposed legislation.

INDIA—FORCE OF OBSERVATION ON THE PISHIN FRONTIER.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Indian Government intend to station a Force of Observation on the Pishin Frontier; if so, what is amount of the Force, and with what object is it being massed on the road to Candahar; and, will the Secretary of State promise that Parliament shall be informed before orders are issued to any such Force to cross the Afghan Frontier?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Oatham): The Secretary of State has received no information which in any way corroborates the report referred to in the Question.

MR. BUCHANAN: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman answer the second part of my Question?

SIR JOHN GORST: The hon. Gentleman cannot expect any assurance when the grounds on which he asks for it are quite baseless.

POST OFFICE—THE ANNUAL HOLIDAY.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether the order of 30th November, making uniform the rule as to ann has been extended to London Postal Service; and, if not, whether he will place those officers on the same footing as the officers in Dublin and Edinburgh?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The order of November last to which the hon. Member refers applied only to Provincial offices. The question whether it should apply to sorters of the London Postal Service, and, if so, to what extent, is now being considered.

SCOTLAND—SHOOTING STRAY DOGS.

MR. MARK STEWART (Kircudbright) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to the damage sustained by farmers to their flocks by stray dogs; and, whether a dog found worrying sheep may be destroyed by the owner of the sheep?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): My attention has not recently been called to the matter referred to in the Question of my hon. Friend. It is not legal to destroy a dog which is found straying or doing mischief; but the owner of such a dog can be sued summarily, and ordered either to put the dog under control, or to have it destroyed, under penalty if he fail to do so.

MERCHANT SHIPPING — ACCIDENTAL LOSS OF LIFE—INQUIRY.

MR. LEES (Oldham) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether, after any accident resulting in loss of life on board a British merchantman, it is customary for the officials of the Board of Trade to interrogate the crew respecting the causes of the accident collectively in the presence of their officers, or individually and apart; and, if not, whether he will consider the advisability of taking steps to insure that the men shall be privately questioned in all such cases?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): In cases of wreck and casualty, to which I presume the hon. Member refers, the Board of Trade instructions already provide that each witness shall be examined individually and apart. These instructions apply to seamen as well as officers.

Mr. J. Rowlands

DEFENCES OF THE EMPIRE—COALING HARBOUR AT SINGAPORE.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid) asked the Secretary of State for War, What measures he proposes to take to secure the safety of the coaling harbour at Singapore from now to 1889, whilst its defences are to remain only approximately defended; how he proposes to redeem the bargain made with the Colony in 1884, that the armament then agreed upon should be completed in 1887; whether the colony has fulfilled its part of the bargain, and has already spent £81,000 upon its defences; and, whether the Elswick manufacturers are able to turn out the required guns in half the time, approximately, required by the Woolwich manufacturers; and, if so, why no tender has been made to them?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. NORTHOOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said: The Colony of Singapore has fulfilled its part of the contract for the security of the Colony, and there will be no unnecessary delay in the fulfilment of the Imperial share. In the meantime, although the defences of Singapore are not absolutely complete, they are very strong, and leave no practical doubt as to the safety of the coaling station. The two guns which will not be completed in 1887-8 are being made at Elswick.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—IMPROVED POSTAL SERVICE AT KINSALE.

MR. HOOPER (Cork, S.E.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether he is in a position to make any further statement on the subject of suggested improvements in postal arrangements at Kinsale?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The hon. Member will be glad to hear that I have authorized the employment of a mail car by means of which the hours of the day mail service to and from Kinsale during the fishing season will be made more convenient.

LONDON COAL AND WINE DUTIES CONTINUANCE BILL.

COLONEL HAMILTON (Southwark, Rotherhithe) asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether, in the event of the London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance Bill passing the Second Reading, looking at the injury done to the trade of the waterside districts of the Metropolis by the Duty imposed on wine brought into the Metropolis by the River Thames; while wine brought in by rail or road is admitted free of Duty, and looking at the small sum raised by this Duty, he will undertake to withdraw so much of the Bill as relates to the continuance of Wine Duties?

THE CHAIRMAN (Sir JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG) (Middlesex, Hornsey): In reply to the hon. and gallant Member, I beg to say that if the Bill is read a second time, I think the Bill, as a whole, had better go before the Committee; and if the Committee see fit to withdraw the part relating to the Wine Duty, the Corporation of London and the Metropolitan Board will be quite satisfied to abide by the decision.

SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE EASTER RECESS.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he can inform the House as to the date of the commencement and as to the duration of the Easter Recess?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I regret, Sir, that in the present condition of Public Business it is quite impossible for me to make any announcement with regard to the Easter Holidays.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): Is the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury able to tell us what the course of Business will be next week?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am afraid I cannot go beyond Monday; but, perhaps, that will be sufficient for the right hon. Gentleman. On Monday we propose, in accordance with the engagement which I made at 2 o'clock this morning with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), to put down the Navy Estimates and the Vote for Clothing, so that there may be a discussion upon them, and afterwards to take the Vote on Account for Civil Services.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) inquired, whether the Government proposed to take Wednesday and next week for Public Business? He asked because there were some Scotch Bills.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid there is no chance that Members will get Wednesday for their ordinary Business.

PARLIAMENT—NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE—RULE 2—ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE ARREST OF FATHER KELLER.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask permission of the House to move the Adjournment of the House, in order to call attention to a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely, the arrest of Father Keller, parish priest of Youghal, under a warrant issued by Judge Boyd, and the disturbances and loss of life which resulted from the issue of the warrant.

MR. SPEAKER said, is it your pleasure that leave be given? ["No!"]

The pleasure of the House not having been signified—

MR. SPEAKER called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and not less than 40 Members having accordingly risen in their places.

MR. DILLON: I have no desire, Sir, to occupy the attention of the House at any great length, or that the debate should occupy the attention of the House at any great length, but I have just received a telegram from Limerick—a telegram from the City of Cork—announcing that Father Keller has just been arrested, and is now on his way to Dublin as a prisoner. Father Keller, the parish priest who has been arrested, is notoriously—as will be admitted by all, even by the gentry of the county of Cork—one of the most respected and most eminent of the Roman Catholic clergy of the district. I venture to say that there is not even a landlord of the county of Cork who will not admit that Father Keller is entitled to respect from all classes of the community. Now, what are the facts which I wish to lay before the House in order to justify myself for taking this unusual proceeding of moving the adjournment of the House? I do not contend that anything illegal has been done. I do not propose to argue anything of the kind. I am well aware, and I am informed by those who know better than myself, that Judge Boyd has not in any way outstepped his legal powers in order to arrest this priest. But I could not by any possibility exaggerate the feeling felt by our constituents, who believe, not that an illegal thing has been done, but that a legal power of an undefined character given for certain uses has been grossly and flagrantly abused with respect to a gentleman whose arrest will create throughout the South of Ireland a feeling of the most profound disturbance and intense disgust, and will convince every individual living in the South of Ireland that the Judge who used his power in such a way as that which led to the arrest of Father Keller has placed himself and the powers of his Court under the orders of the Emergency Association and the Property Defence Association. What is practically the power under which Father Keller has been arrested? He has been arrested for contempt of Court. We, in Ireland, are unfortunately familiar for a number of years past with what has been admitted to be a growing and increasing abuse of this dangerous privilege of committal for contempt of Court. A Judge can commit any individual citizen to prison for contempt of Court without cause given, and there is no appeal—practically he can suspend the Habeas Corpus Act. In England the simple reason why that power has been left in the hands of the Judges is because it is almost never exercised, and is only exercised under circumstances of such flagrant contempt that the general public naturally rally to the side of the Judges. What are the facts in Ireland? During the last few years there has been a growing disposition on the part of certain Judges—whose language used inside the Courts has plainly indicated them as most violent partizans—there has, I say, been a growing disposition on the part of these Judges to avail themselves of this undefined, unchecked, unlimited power of committing for contempt of Court as a political weapon to put down political opponents of the Government, and to give assistance to the Executive of Ireland. This power has been exercised lately by two or three men—notorious political partizans—and to such an extent was it abused, that three years ago the then Prime Minister, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), proposed to introduce into this House a Bill to limit that power, but owing to some disagreement which arose that Bill was dropped. Judge Boyd has exercised that power so oppressively that at the present moment he has men lying in prison whom I know to have been lying in prison for upwards of six months without any power of appeal to any Court of Law, and in a recent instance he issued warrants from his Court to arrest the wife and five children, the last being but six months of age, of a poor man who had already been nine months in prison. In issuing these warrants, Judge Boyd uses language which would be justified in no Judge, and which would not be tolerated for a moment in England. Judge Boyd has no right to inquire into the politics of men brought before him, and if it be permitted for a Judge—

Mr. Dillon

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now impugning the conduct of a Judge of a Superior Court on making a Motion for the adjournment of the House, to which no Amendment can be moved. It is perfectly competent for the hon. Member to call the attention of the House to the arrest of Father Keller; but I cannot allow the conduct of a Judge of a Superior Court to be impugned in this way except upon a direct Motion, when an opportunity would be afforded for giving an answer.

MR. DILLON: May I not refer to the circumstances attending the issue of the warrant which are of vital importance to the point I wish to bring forward?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot do so except upon a definite Motion impugning the Judge of a Superior Court whose conduct he desires to call in question.

MR. DILLON: Then I will only add that a great deal of the strength of my case rests on the fact, that upon the issue of this warrant, Judge Boyd took occasion to deliver a political oration from the Bench.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is distinctly out of Order.

MR. DILLON: Then I will bow to your ruling, Sir. What happened was that Father Keller was the priest of a parish on which the tenant of one estate adopted the movement known as the Plan of Campaign. Father Keller has in no way been engaged in the movement with me; he is not a Trustee of the Estate Fund, nor has he money in his hands which would render him in any way directly connected with the case of bankruptcy, which has arisen in connection with one of the tenants of the estate. He has been summoned as one of the witnesses before the Court of Bankruptcy on the supposition which, I believe, is generally entertained in regard to the people of the South of Ireland, that the parish priest of a district is likely to know the secrets of his parishioners. This is the feeling—the very intense feeling—created through the southern districts of Ireland, that this attempt is not a bond fide effort to get, as in ordinary circumstances, and looking at the thing from a purely judicial, and not a political, point of view, a substantial and important witness; but this is an attempt to drag up a parish priest who, from the nature of his office, would know the secrets of his parishioners, and be trusted by his parishioners, and to compel him to turn as an informer against his now people. Now, Sir, the reason why Father Keller did not attend on that warrant was because he felt that an outrage had been put upon his cloth and upon his office. If he had been in any business way mixed up with this transaction he would, of course, have gone to Dublin; but because he is convinced that this is part and parcel of a policy to compel him and other priests in Ireland to turn informers—a course which, I need hardly say, no self-respecting priest in Ireland would for a moment indulge in—he thought it would be just as well to take his stand against this policy at the beginning, instead of going up to Dublin to be committed to prison for contempt of Court for refusing to reveal the confidences of his parishioners. I dare say the Judge has not exceeded his legal rights, but it is a great abuse of a power which unquestionably will very soon have to be legislated upon and circumscribed by this House. I would like to say a word or two of the results that have followed in Youghal on the issue of this warrant. I have endeavoured to point out why is it not unnatural that great public excitement should have followed from such proceedings. Great public excitement did follow; but we have it on the sworn statement of the only magistrate who was resident in Youghal, and who on the day previous to the occurrence of which I wish to speak remained in the streets up to one or two in the morning to see if there was any danger of disturbance, or any necessity for extra police—we have it on his sworn statement that the people were peaceful and the crowd thoroughly good-humoured, though excited, and that not only no injury was offered to the police, but no insulting word was addressed to them. There were 10 policemen in the town, and amongst the thousands of people nobody offered them the slightest violence. When leaving to go to bed this magistrate called on the Head Constable, who was responsible in the absence of the District Inspector for the peace of the town, and said—"Will you need any more men to keep the peace of the town?" The Head Constable replied—"Certainly not. I have more than enough, and am perfectly able to cope with disturbance." "Has injury been done to property?" asked the magistrate. "None, sir, except a few panes of glass," said the Head Constable. The people were expecting men down with a warrant to arrest their priest. The Head Constable after this conversation, without consulting the magistrate, telegraphed off to a neighbouring town to bring in extra police, after telling the magistrate that he had more than enough force, there being no excuse for bringing them. The people thought that these police were bringing down a man to arrest their priest, and there was some disturbance. We have heard statements about the extensive injuries done to these men. Now, I sat in the Court and listened to the sworn evidence of the doctor. Out of the whole force only one man was struck over the forehead, and that was all the injury. This individual was the only injured man in Youghal that night on the police side. He was hurt over the forehead, and there was an immense apparatus of bandages and plasters over his forehead, and nobody was allowed to see the wound except the police doctor. It might have been a scratch for all we knew. The police were ordered to charge with bayonets. I sat by and heard the doctor who held the post-mortem examination on O'Hanlon give his evidence. Now, I have heard of military charges in cases of disturbance, and it is the universal practice of a soldier to give nothing but flesh wounds when the crowd turns and flies. But what happens in the case of Hanlon? Poor Pat Hanlon was flying from the police with his back turned to them, and the policeman, instead of giving him a mere flesh wound, drew back and gave a lunge which broke off a piece of bone, knocked it into splinters, and went six inches into the man's bowels, cutting the main artery of his body. A more murderous stroke was never given. We have it on the evidence of the doctor that it would have pierced the man clean through had not the bone been struck. Firing is nothing to this. When you fire you do not know where the bullet may go, but here is a man in full flight, and yet we have it on evidence that the policeman did not prod him, as is the custom, but gave a full lunge. The police went behind the back of the only magistrate who was there; they deceived him, and the first news he heard of the introduction of the extra police was when he was called on to attend the dying man, for he is a doctor as well as a magistrate. I have not the slightest doubt that if the police had discharged their duty, and told the magistrate, that this gentleman, who has lived for 20 years in the town, and is trusted by the people, would have gone to the station, there would have been no disturbance. I say there is not a man in Youghal who does not believe that the object was to have a row that night in Youghal, and to draw blood; and that the magistrate, who is known and loved there, was left in his house lest he should prevent that row. Such is the conviction of the magistrate himself, and so outraged was he by the conduct of the police that he went instantly to the police barracks and protested against the conduct of the sub-Inspector. What I want to know is, is this system to be carried on—is occasion to be sought out for goading the people, who have exhibited extraordinary patience under great sufferings, into sufficient outrage to justify the passing of a Coercion Act? I believe the issue of this warrant was part and parcel of a deliberate policy. We know how difficult it is to control the people of the southern counties in Ireland when they see an old respected parish priest dragged away from his cure as a prisoner in the hands of the police—we know how desperately difficult it is, and we say that to carry it out in any way you choose to do it must be a thing of danger and offensively irritating to the people, but you do it in such a way as to increase that danger and irritation to the utmost, and to bring about the shedding of blood. I must confess I view the whole circumstances attending that arrest and the issue of the warrant—which I have not been able to enter into now, as I hope to do on another occasion—I view them with the utmost possible anxiety as to what may be the result of such conduct if persisted in in future. I know perfectly well that that policy will probably be successful for the Government up to a certain point. Human nature is human nature, and human patience has its limits. You may be successful up to a certain point if you are determined on goading the Irish people into such desperation that you may have what you consider a sufficient justification for sticking a few more of them into prison. It is an odious policy. As long as we Irish Nationalists are permitted to remain in this House, and as far as we can, under the Rules of the House, we should be shamefully and basely false to our duty if we did not endeavour to expose that policy before the people of England. The people of Ireland have on this occasion, as on other occasions, been patient. I have not had any details of to-day's arrest, but I trust the Government sent a large force, because the larger the force the less is the danger of outrage. Before I sit down I want to direct attention finally to one circumstance of a most extraordinary character. When this excitement arose in Youghal last week with reference to the anticipated arrest of Father Keller, the solicitors acting for the plaintiff wrote a letter to The Daily Express newspaper, and the letter appeared also in other newspapers, and in that letter the solicitors stated that there was no intention to arrest Father Keller at all, and that all this bogus excitement was got up by the leaders of the people for their own political purposes. Now, these solicitors did not appear in Court when the warrant was issued. Their letter is on record stating that they had no intention of arresting Father Keller. If the solicitor for the plaintiff did not want him arrested, at whose instigation then was the warrant issued? Was it the Cork Landlords' Defence Association? I maintain that this is a question to which we ought to have an answer, and it is a question important to the case which I have endeavoured to lay before the House, because if it turned out that this most unjustifiable and dangerous action is the result of incitements either from the Government or from the Cork Landlords' Defence Association, my case will have been made out very much clearer.

Mr. Dillon

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Before I come to the circumstances which have been detailed to the House by the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), let me relieve his mind on one point—the arrest of Father Keller, as I have heard by telegram this evening, has been carried out without any disturbance or difficulty whatever. As to the hon. Gentleman's speech, let me say this—that in the whole history of this House—full as that history is of violent language and violent partizanship—I do not believe that an accusation so violent has ever been levelled by an individual in this House against the Executive of his country as that to which we have just listened. What the hon. Gentleman has accused us of—not by insinuation, but by direct language, of which the hon. Gentleman is so great a master—is goading the population of Youghal into resistance to the law in order that some of the people might be killed, and that the Government might thereby be able to show their justification for introducing their Coercion Bill. A more monstrous and unfounded accusation was never levelled by a public man against those responsible for the government of the country. Now, Sir, I presume that the apparent incoherence of the argument of the hon. Gentleman is due to the fact that he was not allowed, owing to a breach of the Rules of the House, as decided by you, to lay the whole of the argument which he had prepared before the House; but he did make before you, Sir, called him to Order—and I regret very much that he was allowed to do so—an attack upon Judge Boyd.

The hon. Member, Sir, used words about that learned Judge which, I think, should never be used in this House against Judges of the Courts of Law who are not present and who are not able—that is, who have not the opportunity—to defend themselves. But what is it, let me ask, that has been done? Why, this: that the Bankruptcy Court summoned a man to appear before the Court as a witness; and I presume, Sir, it is not to be concluded that, because that man appears to be a priest, even though he be, as the hon. Member says—and as I do not for a moment doubt—that Father Keller is a most respectable and eminent gentleman, he should not be summoned. Well, Sir, if the Bankruptcy Court is allowed to summon before them any man as a witness, and if the man refuses to appear in answer to the summons, what course, may I ask, is before the Judge but to put the man into prison? The hon. Member for East Mayo suggested no alternative; but he talked about the abuse of the Rule under which a Judge may commit a man for contempt of Court. Well, Sir, this action on the part of Judge Boyd does not come under the condemnation which has been levelled against the use by Judges of the power of commitment for contempt of Court—the contempt of Court in respect to which, as a preventive against the use to which Judges were said to put their power, a Bill was introduced into the other House, which may or may not have been occasionally used by Judges who thought they had not been treated with sufficient respect in Court; but imprisonment is the only weapon which can be used by a Judge to make it certain that the jurisdiction of his Court shall be respected; and to take away the power of inflicting such imprisonment would be to destroy the whole system of the Bankruptcy Court in Ireland root and branch. The only other matter which I think requires remark relates to the police, and here I must say that I think the hon. Gentleman appeared to me to have allowed himself a licence of criticism with regard to a case which is, I believe, still pending most unusual and improper in debates in this House. I shall not follow the hon. Gentleman in this matter except as to one matter, and I am doubtful if I ought to go so far in a pending case; but statement—I should say mis-statement—which I must correct. The hon. Gentleman says the only injury which the police of Youghal had undergone was a scratch received by one man on the forehead.

MR. DILLON: I did not say so; I said a cut, the nature of which we were not allowed, or anybody except the police, to investigate. [An hon. MEMBER: A scratch.] I beg pardon, I said it might have been a scratch for all we knew.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, I will give the hon. Gentleman the advantage of the "cut;" but the facts are not as the hon. Member stated them. So far from its being the fact that only one policeman was injured more or less slightly on the forehead, the facts are as I read them from a telegram in the House which I said yesterday I had received from an authentic source of information. Twenty-one out of 22 policemen were struck, 15 were hurt, and three were seriously hurt. Well, I will say nothing about the hon. Gentleman's attack upon the humanity of the Police Force, save that I am unwilling to think that anybody in Ireland should suppose that I allowed an accusation of the kind to pass for a moment in this House without giving it the most absolute contradiction. The hon. Gentleman has attacked the police for inhumanity. [MR. DILLON: One man.] My belief is that the charge of the police was not ordered by the commanding officer till he was fully convinced that the very lives of the police were in immediate danger—and if that position of affairs does not justify the action of the commanding officer I am at a loss to know what, in the opinion of the hon. Gentleman, would justify the police in resorting to extreme measures in self-defence.

MR. DILLON: The right hon. Gentleman is really misrepresenting what I said. I made no charge whatever against the police. I made a charge against the man who drove the bayonet into the back of Pat O'Hanlon.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, Sir, I might have misunderstood the hon. Gentleman. What I thought the hon. Member said was that the police were the instruments in goading on the population of the district to resistance; and that they deliberately misled the Magistrate for the purpose of producing a butchery which would assist the Government in passing the Coercion Bill. I need not say much more. I think I have dealt with the hon. Gentleman's speech so far as he has been able to lay the case before the House. The hon. Gentleman accuses us of being responsible for the lamentable occurrences which have taken place at Youghal; but has it never occurred to him that those who are really responsible are those who continue to goad on the people of the country to carry out this illegal plan of spoliation? This illegal plan of spoliation, called the Plan of Campaign. On their heads rests and must rest the responsibility of goading on the people to resist the law. The law must be obeyed; the orders of the Courts of Law must be carried out. They will be carried out, and carried out peaceably, I believe, in every district in Ireland if only those agitators will cease from their baneful work—those agitators who are primarily responsible for all those unfortunate occurrences. I think, Sir, if the hon. Gentleman will, in his calmer moments, consider upon whose heads the responsibility rests for what has occurred, he will not find that the Government of this country or the police of Ireland are responsible, but that it rests upon the heads of those with whose policy and motives he is probably more intimately acquainted than I am.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.) said, the House could easily understand that it is a matter of congratulation to him to be relieved by this debate from the necessity of putting any further questions to the Chief Secretary, so as to bring the facts of this unhappy case under the notice of hon. Members for England. Before he referred directly to the origin of the cause of the disturbance of Youghal, he wished to reply to a few of the statements made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour). The right hon. Gentleman prefaced his remarks by stating that, instead of the arrest of Father Keller leading to bloodshed and riot in Youghal, the arrest had been carried out very quietly. There was no credit due to the Executive or to the Police Authorities in Ireland for the quiet manner in which the arrest of Father Keller had been effected. The credit was wholly due to the rev. gentleman himself, and to the other clergymen of the town, and to the good sense of the people of his parish, who obeyed his mandate. The rev. gentleman was not going to allow his people to fall into the traps set for them by the police. The fortunate discovery of the telegram sent by Captain Plunkett to the Police Superintendent showed that it was the deliberate intention of the police to excite an occasion for bloodshed and death in their midst. The right hon. Gentleman accused the hon. Member for East Mayo of having used violent language. He (Mr. Lane) put a question to the right hon. Gentleman last Tuesday in reference to the authenticity of Captain Plunkett's telegram; and after the endorsement he gave to that bloodthirsty telegram, the hon. Member for East Mayo was fully justified in the strong language he had used, and in expressing his opinion that the policy had been deliberately adopted at a meeting of magistrates in Dublin Castle, acting in concert with the right hon. Gentleman for the purpose of creating an excuse for the introduction of a Coercion Act for Ireland, which, according to the declaration of all the Judges, was exceptionally free from crime at the present moment. The Irish Members did not say, as the right hon. Gentleman contended, that because Father Keller was a priest he should not be liable for arrest under a warrant from the Bankruptcy Court, or any other Court. What they objected to was this—that Father Keller was arrested because, from his position as parish priest, he was expected by those who moved for his arrest to know the secret affairs of his flock, to act as a spy upon the doings of his parishioners, and to give evidence in favour of the landlord. This was a most serious matter, and might become more so if the policy of the Government were to be carried on on the same lines as at present. With regard to the charge of the right hon. Gentleman against the Irish Parliamentary Party of goading on the people to spoliation and excitement, if there was any Member of the Irish Party who could be said to be guilty of goading the people into excitement, he took upon himself all the responsibility of being that individual. Youghal was in his Division, and he was connected with all the operations on the Ponsonby property, from the beginning until the time he had to leave to take his place in Parliament. But he distinctly repudiated now—as he had done on the first night the House assembled—that he, or any of his hon. Colleagues had goaded—to use the word of the right hon. Gentleman—the people of that district, or any other, to put the Plan of Campaign into operation. He did not visit the estate until the tenants themselves had decided the matter. He went down on their pressing invitation, and instead of the people being goaded into adopting the Plan of Campaign, the fact of the matter was that his hon. Colleagues and himself had to use their influence to moderate the demands of the tenants on that particular estate for a reduction of their rents. He would now give the House a short history of how that excitement had arisen in Youghal, and would show how little the people and the parish priest were to blame for the existing state of things there. It had all arisen in connection with the Ponsonby estate. Mr. Ponsonby was the only landlord in the County of Cork who had refused to give his tenants a fair and reasonable reduction in their rents. This was not the first time that a similar struggle took place on the same property.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is now deviating from the matter before the House, which is a definite matter of urgent public importance; it is the adjournment of the House for the purpose of calling attention to the arrest of the Rev. Father Keller. The history of the Ponsonby estate has nothing to do with that subject.

MR. LANE: The warrant, Sir, upon which Father Keller was arrested was issued in connection with this estate—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is going into a history of the eviction on the estate, and the means that were used to bring about a reconciliation. This is quite different from the specific matter before the House.

MR. LANE: This warrant, Sir, upon which Father Keller has been arrested has been applied for by the solicitors who are employed for the Ponsonby estate, and the arrest has taken place in connection with that estate. Father Keller is summoned to Dublin to give evidence in reference to the Plan of Campaign being carried out by two tenants upon the Ponsonby property; and I would respectfully ask, Sir, for your ruling as to whether I am not in Order in referring to what has happened in connection with that property out of which the whole case arises.

MR. SPEAKER: I am clearly of opinion that it would be out of Order to allude to the circumstances of the Ponsonby estate. That has nothing whatever to do with the subject which has been brought before the House, and which is the arrest of Father Keller.

MR. LANE: The warrant was issued in reference to evidence to be given concerning the proceedings of two tenants on the Ponsonby property; and I would ask very respectfully whether I may not refer to those proceedings?

MR. SPEAKER: I have already given a very definite ruling upon the point.

MR. LANE said, that, under those circumstances, he found it very hard to proceed on the lines he had intended to do; but, bowing very respectfully to the ruling of the Chair, as he was bound to do—and notwithstanding the sneers of the Chief Secretary for Ireland—he should try and make out his case all the same. The people of the district were perfectly aware that the landlord was not a party to the proceedings taken against Father Keller, as he had told them that the property had passed out of his hands into those of the Landlords' Association, and that he would not stop the issue of the warrant. They knew the reverend gentleman was compelled to go to Dublin, and they believed that was done simply because the solicitors engaged by the landlord believed that because he was the parish priest, if they put him in the witness box there on oath they could ask him any questions, and get information from him which he possessed as parish priest, respecting certain of his parishioners, and so would enable the landlord to get his rents without any reduction. Father Keller and his brother priests had been going about amongst the people for several days, quieting them, and endeavouring to prevent the excitement getting the better of their discretion, and leading them to do things which would justify the authorities in interfering with their lives and liberties. They had the positive assurance of Dr. Ronayne, the only resident magistrate in the town of Youghal, sworn by him at the inquest, that there was a sufficient force of police in the town for the purpose of arresting Father Keller, and he was a magistrate, who for years had been able to keep order there. But the authorities thought well to send a force of strange police into the town. That evening the town was perfectly quiet until the extra force of police were brought in; but the moment they were brought in the people became excited. The people were thinking of the vindictive action being taken against their priest. The townfolk sat up all night near the residence of the priest the night before. They went out to the station to meet the police, and were only following the police into the town, when the officer in charge of the police commanded his men to fix bayonets. Up to that time not a single thing was done by the people to aggravate the police. Hon. Members would easily understand the effect which the fixing of bayonets by the police would be likely to produce upon the people under the circumstances. The crowd followed the policemen down to the barracks; and they had it on the sworn testimony of the Head Constable of the local police that the police had been allowed to march all the way from the station to the barracks—a distance of about two miles—before a stone was thrown and struck him. Then the strange policemen immediately turned round, charged the people, and killed this unfortunate man, whose death was now forming the subject of an inquest at Youghal. He had no desire to discuss the culpability of the police engaged in the charge. He thought the statement which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had made was one which ought to receive a favourable reception from the Irish Benches, that as the investigation was sub judice at present, it would be better not to refer to any detail with regard to the conduct of the police who were engaged in the fearful charge. He would not do so at this particular point. He was now brought to the telegram from Captain Plunkett, which had given rise to so much comment in the Press and the House during the last week, and in which the expression occurred, "Shoot them down." On the following morning after this riot took place in Youghal—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, but he is now clearly out of Order. He is not confining himself to the definite subject which has been brought before the House, and not only that, but he is anticipating a Motion which has been put down upon the Paper with reference to this very telegram from Captain Plunkett.

Mr. Lane

MR. LANE said, that he had not seen it, and, as he was not aware of it, he was very much afraid that he must cut his observations short; for that telegram had a great deal to do with the question of the arrest of Father Keller that day, and if he was precluded from referring to that telegram, of course he should not do so. He did not see the Notice of Motion to which Mr. Speaker referred; but he was inclined to think that that Notice of Motion must have been put down on the Paper for the very same motive which led to other Notices being put upon the Paper a few weeks ago—to prevent debates on similarly inconvenient subjects for the Government from being brought on. His belief and the belief of his Colleagues—and they were entitled to say so from the expression of opinion which had appeared in the Irish Press during the past week—and it was the opinion of the whole of the people of Ireland that the policy indicated by the arrest of Father Keller was deliberately planned by the Government for the purpose of goading the people of Ireland into excitement, and possibly from excitement to the committal of outrage; because if there was one point upon which the people of Ireland were more susceptible than another, and upon which the Government could better calculate upon working them up to a point of excitement, it was any undue interference whatsoever with the priesthood of Ireland, particularly in connection with their relations as priests towards their flocks. They were very much afraid that the arrest of Father Keller was only a prelude to a series of similar arrests that would follow of the priests all over Ireland. Ten, twenty, and hundreds of other priests would be ready to-morrow to take Father Keller's place. The right hon. Gentleman would not be able to draw the line at parish priests, because the respected Roman Catholic Bishop of Oloyne—the Most Rev. Dr. M'Carthy—felt it to be his duty in such a trying crisis, to write a letter to the Rev. Father Keller, which had received widespread publicity all over Ireland, and was read by every Bishop and priest in Ireland, endorsing Father Keller's action in this matter, and telling him that he would be untrue to the best and noblest traditions of the Irish priesthood if he did not act as he had acted in refusing to obey the summons he had received to proceed to Dublin to disclose the confidential secrets of his parishioners. Every Bishop and Archbishop in Ireland was prepared to adopt the same course. He (Mr. Lane) believed that if the right hon. Gentleman followed up his policy—as he was bound to follow it up if he was going to be consistent in it—he would force every other Bishop in Ireland to assume the attitude which the Most Rev. Dr. M'Carthy, Bishop of Oloyne, felt it his duty to take up, and that he would be brought face to face in a short time, not alone with the phalanx of the Irish Parliamentary Party, but would find himself and his Government opposed by the solid phalanx of the Bishops and priests and the whole united people of Ireland in direct, violent, and active opposition to the policy of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. LOCKWOOD (York), said, that in common with a great many other English Members, he had listened with considerable pain to the way in which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), in that practically his first appearance upon the stage in the capacity which he was now called upon to perform, had spoken, and felt considerable disappointment at the way in which he chose to deal with this question. He (Mr. Lockwood) took it that no one could listen to the statement that was made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) without feeling very considerable interest in the observations which he had made. He might say that any person who was familiar, as he supposed the right hon. Gentleman (the Chief Secretary) was familiar, with the law of this country, knew perfectly well that the powers of a Court which enabled Judges to deal with persons in contempt were regarded in this country as being powers of an extraordinary nature, and that they were used only under circumstances of an extraordinary character. He (Mr. Lockwood) was sure that very few men who sat above him on that side of the House, at the time when the right hon. Gentleman was speaking, were prepared for the manner in which he made the statement which he had made. He expected that the right hon. Gentleman would have been able calmly, as befitted his high position, to have given them the facts connected with the arrest of the rev. gentleman, and that he would have shown a fitting tone of respect towards all the Members of that House whom he might address. ["Oh, oh!"] Surely they were entitled to an explanation of the facts without a show of temper, without the employment of unnecessary emphasis, but with that calm dignity which usually characterised statements to this House from the Treasury Bench, no matter which Party occupied it. He thought it was the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to put before those Members of the House, who like himself (Mr. Lockwood) could not claim to be intimately acquainted with the details of this case, such information as would justify the Government in the action which they had taken, or rather the action which the learned Judge had taken, in regard to Mr. Keller. The right hon. Gentleman they had a right to expect would put the facts before the House—he meant the facts within his knowledge—that he would have shown that the learned Judge was acting in accordance with the powers that he had, and also in accordance with the law which he had to administer. But, instead of doing that, what did the right hon. Gentleman do? Why, in the first place, he simply indulged in a tu quoque. Addressing himself to hon. Members sitting on that side of the House, he, first of all, endeavoured to rid himself of a charge which apparently stung him to the quick—of a charge that went right home to the right hon. Gentleman—and might, perhaps, to some extent account for the want of respect which he (Mr. Lockwood) thought they were entitled to, and with which he addressed the hon. Member who introduced this Motion. The charge from these benches the Chief Secretary felt very keenly. He knew where the shoe pinched, and he cried out—but having indulged in that display of temper, the right hon. Gentleman went on to excuse himself from the charge by saying—"How can you lay this to my door, when you are just as bad yourself?" Was that the mode and spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman should approach the discharge of the important duties which he had accepted? [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I never said that.] If the right hon. Gentleman wished to interrupt him, he (Mr. Lockwood) assumed that he would, as was proper, rise from his place and do so. He thought it would be within the recollection of the House that, as he had said, the explanation offered by the Chief Secretary was simply a tu quoque, and nothing else. Was that the spirit in which to approach the question raised in that important debate? They had a right to expect the right hon. Gentleman to approach the question in a very different spirit. It was not, of course, his (Mr. Lockwood's) duty, as a young Member of this House, to instruct the right hon. Gentleman as to what his attitude should be in the matter. ["Hear, hear!"] Let him, however, remind hon. Gentlemen opposite who cheered that statement, that he was perfectly aware of his inexperience, and the great disadvantage under which he laboured in consequence of that inexperience; but he would, nevertheless, venture upon this remark—that the Chief Secretary was making a very great mistake if he approached the discharge of his duties in such a dictatorial spirit as he had shown that night. They had heard a story from the hon. Member who introduced the Motion which certainly led them to sympathize with him and those who sat around him in the account which he gave of this matter; and, as he had already said, they had been supplied with no details in the case—they had had no confirmation from official quarters to explain away the story told by the hon. Member for East Mayo, who introduced this subject, and those who sat around him; and, therefore, in the absence of any explanation from the Ministerial Bench to account for the use of these extraordinary powers on this occasion, if the hon. Member pressed this matter to a Division, he hoped that many on that side of the House would take the earliest opportunity they had of expressing their strong disapprobation of the line of argument which was indicated by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. Very probably the arrest of Mr. Keller was carried out in the same spirit that had characterized that speech.

Mr. Lockwood

MR. PICTON (Leicester) said, the right hon. Gentleman seemed to treat the arrest of this parish priest in Ireland as comparatively a trivial affair—one certainly not of sufficient importance to justify any hon. Member in moving the adjournment of the House. But in times gone by, they knew it was a very much more frequent practice than now to move adjournments, in order to bring before the attention of the House cases of an arbitrary exercise of authority, or cases of the stretching of the law. They had not needed lately—at least, as regarded this country—to exercise the right; but, if all they heard was true, it was probable that, within a very few months, it might be absolutely necessary to resort to the practice as often as they were allowed, in the interest of the much-oppressed Sister Island. That arrest of a parish priest seemed to him (Mr. Picton) very much like the first shot of a battle. The first shot might be regarded as a trivial affair; it might not do much damage, but it was the opening of a dread carnival, and he prayed Heaven the analogy might not be followed out in this case. In cases of the kind the responsibility often rested on two sides. He thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to realize, more than he seemed to do from his speech that evening, the very grave and heavy responsibility that rested upon him in justifying a course of action like that to which attention had been called. Let them realize what the relation was between this priest and his neighbours and friends. It was one of the closest, most intimate, and tenderest relationships that could arise in life. When a gentleman in this extremely confidential position was called upon to give evidence in a case like that which had arisen, suspicion, uneasiness, anxiety, and alarm must be aroused in the breasts of his flock; and he could not but call it a most imprudent enterprise to demand the evidence of a priest under circumstances like those. Irish Members were far from being alone in the alarm and deep indignation they felt on this subject, and the time that might be spent in discussing this subject would not be altogether wasted. The people of Youghal would feel that there was sympathy for them; they would feel that they were not left to “the wild justice of revenge;” and, probably, the expression of sympathy with them might lead them to persevere, as he hoped they would persevere, in carrying on a peaceful and Constitutional agitation, and in refraining from any measure that would be likely again to disturb the public peace.

MR. ARTHUR O’CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said, it appeared to him that the aspect of the question which was most fitted to arrest the attention of the House and of the country was this—that it was a signal illustration of the gross misuse which was made by the Administration of the powers of the Executive in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had assumed an air of indignant remonstrance which was not at all justified by the circumstances. The language of which he complained was not nearly so strong as had been used in both Houses of Parliament 90 years ago. For instance, the right hon. Gentleman need only refer to the debates of 1798, and the charges that were made against Pitt and Castlereagh. The fact was that a very strong feeling of suspicion had been aroused in the minds of a large portion of the people of Ireland with regard to that which they thought was not altogether foreign to the policy of Her Majesty’s Government. The action of the Executive in Ireland showed their inconsistency; for while the Government adopted one line of conduct with respect to a certain person, they adopted a totally different line of conduct with respect to another person under perfectly similar circumstances. The Court of Bankruptcy was within its right in directing a warrant for the arrest of a priest, or anybody else, who did not obey its orders; but what was true of the Court of Bankruptcy was also true of other Courts—it was also true of the Coroner’s Court; whereas, when the Court of Bankruptcy issued the warrant to arrest the priest, a man of the highest character, the Executive enforced it with all the powers that might be necessary. But when the Coroner’s Court issued a similar warrant of arrest, the Executive, instead of carrying it out and enforcing it, and bringing into custody the man against whom it was issued, so far from doing that, they shielded, and were shielding at that moment, the man against whom the Coroner’s warrant was issued on the grounds of contempt, and he was a man who was regarded from one end of Ireland to the other as a murderer. That illustrated, in a very signal way, the two-handed style of administration which existed in Ireland. But whatever might be the result of that first shot in the battle-field, he trusted that Father Keller and those with whom he was acting would stand firm—that not only the Representatives of the people of Ireland in that House, but the people at home would stand firm, and that whatever disasters might be enfolded in the struggle which now appeared to be so close upon them, at any rate they should be able to weather that, and go through it as they had gone through others of the same nature before, and he had little doubt as to what the issue of the conflict would be.

MR. HOOPER (Cork, S.E.) said, that as one acquainted personally with the rev. gentleman whose arrest formed the subject of that debate, he wished to trouble the House with a few words regarding his character, and his character was an important factor in judging of the wisdom—not to attribute any other motive—of the action of the Executive in Ireland. Father Keller was known throughout the whole of the Irish Catholic Church as a man not alone of what might be called great mental stature, but of great wisdom, prudence, and calmness; and if he (Mr. Hooper) was disposed to enter into details, which he was not, he might show that, within a very recent period, he displayed the greatest courage in the face of circumstances that might have exposed him to public odium, in correcting what he honestly thought were the political extravagances of a brother clergyman. Father Keller's action in that respect showed the strong conviction which must have guided him when he took his stand and refused to act on this summons of the Court. He (Mr. Hooper) took it that this was an attempt not only to intimidate him from further action in reference to this estate, but an attempt to intimidate and degrade the character of the Irish priests generally. If the only object of summoning Father Keller to Dublin was to obtain information, it could have been obtained much more easily from tenants on the estate. For Father Keller was not a tenant on the estate, and had paid no money under the Plan of Campaign. There were, however, 400 tenants who had paid money under it, each of whom could have been brought up at Dublin, to say whom he had paid it to, and whither it had gone. Why did not the Executive summon from among these some weak, illiterate, men, who might be terrorized by legal forms, rather than the parish priest of Youghal? He used the word "Executive," because they knew that the solicitors of the estate were anxious to withdraw from any proceedings against Father Keller; then he should like to know on whose responsibility another warrant against this clergyman was issued? He regarded the exhibition of temper that evening by the Chief Secretary for Ireland as fortunate; and, if only on that account, they might congratulate themselves on the raising of that debate. English Members would now see the temper which governed Irish officials. What was the meaning of the arrest of an Irish priest? It meant that every Irish pastor would place himself in exactly the same position as Father Keller; and he ventured to say that if the Chief Secretary thought he was going to terrorize congregations by attempting to deprive them of the advice and courage of their pastors, by arresting these, he would be completely mistaken. The Chief Secretary for Ireland must feel in his heart that he had made a fatal mistake; and he (Mr. Hooper) invited the House to watch if, when he had occasion to make another statement, he would not, in the meantime, have accustomed himself to better Parliamentary manners. What he complained of was that the Chief Secretary had not only shielded the police, but had encouraged them to further irregularities of a most dangerous kind. He had met the Questions put on the Paper with reference to the conduct of the police at Youghal by the most deliberate evasion and delay. The police had been allowed to flout the authority of the Coroner's Court, which was one of the most ancient Courts in Ireland, and one in which the people had confidence. What would be the construction placed on the right hon. Gentleman's action by the Irish Constabulary? Would it not be that, as the Chief Secretary for Ireland had shielded their irregularities, they might do anything, as they were sure to be shielded afterwards? He desired to know if the right hon. Gentleman had ordered the Inspector to call in the co-operation of the local magistrates in future. Let him remember that this was not Belfast, where he (Mr. Hooper) could have understood such an order as that telegraphed by Captain Plunkett to the County Inspector at Youghal being issued in view of possible outbreaks of a bloody character breaking out at any moment. But Youghal was a most law-abiding place—[Laughter]—and there the local magistrates should not be ignored. He challenged hon. Gentlemen to contradict him. Youghal was one of the most peaceable places in Ireland. He believed the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) had some knowledge of the fact, for it was near a place which that right hon. and learned Gentleman once represented as a Home Ruler. He (Mr. Hooper) believed that if the local magistrates had been present this unfortunate man would not have lost his life. Under all the circumstances, they were entitled to say that this unhappy determination to bring the people and the police into conflict synchronized with the right hon. Gentleman's entry into Office, and they would not retract that charge until the right hon. Gentleman convinced them that they were wrong.

Mr. A. O'Connor

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.) said, he looked upon the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), which he had listened to with an amount of pain and regret he could not express, as the beginning of a new policy which they had heard of under the name of firm government, but which bade ill both to that country and to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman's remarks made them feel what a loss the House and the Government had sustained through the retirement of his right hon. Colleague the Member for West Bristol (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), who, even in carrying out a policy of which many of them did not approve, had always, by his behaviour and temper, secured the respect of all those who differed from him, as well as of those who agreed with him. When life had been lost, and human souls sent into eternity, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had spoken in a flippant and unfeeling manner, which, if persisted in, must ultimately tend to bring the Executive in Ireland into great contempt. He hoped that, in future, the right hon. Gentleman would endeavour to apply his mind to the problem placed before him, with a desire rather to grapple with the arguments and facts that were addressed to him, than attempt to excite the feelings of the House in the manner he had done that night. He was afraid that that was the beginning of a new policy which would work ill for them all. While it was necessary that the law should be administered, it was far more necessary that it should be just. He therefore invited the Government to see that the law was not only firmly but justly administered, and administered with due respect to the age in which we lived, and the spirit of humanity with which we ought to be governed.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.) said, he intended to support the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) if he went to a Division, simply from what had passed before his own observation that night as to the style and attitude of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He must say he had been extremely disappointed in observing the style of the right hon. Gentleman that night. As a Scottish Member he felt considerable pride and satisfaction in noticing the fact that the right hon. Gentleman had been promoted by his noble Relative at the head of the Government to what he (Mr. Wallace) might call the box of the Irish chariot, and to hold the reins on that very difficult pinnacle; but from what he had seen that night, it was probably one of the most hazardous experiments in charioteering which had been made since Father Phœbus entrusted Phaethon with the temporary driving of the solar tandem.

MR. FINCH-HATTON: I rise to Order. [Cries of "Sit down!"]

MR. WALLACE said, he ventured to tell the right hon. Gentleman that, unless he altered his style, it was very probable that he might come to considerable sorrow. The whole style of the right hon. Gentleman's reply was not in any way argumentative, but seemed to him to be simply declamatory denial. It reminded him very much of the position of the advocate who was recommended by his client to act on the principle of "no case, abuse the plaintiff's attorney." He (Mr. Wallace) had had sufficient experience of various sides of human life to know that, when that style was indulged in, there was very little real defence to be offered. He did not think that the right hon. Gentleman had a case upon which he could rely, simply from the right hon. Gentleman's demeanour; not from what he had said, but from what he had not said. It was evident that the case was altogether indefensible. For his own part, therefore, he had no hesitation whatever in giving his humble support to the case made out and the Motion put forward by the hon. Member for East Mayo.

Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, that certainly the tone of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) was most deplorable. Certain specific charges had been made by the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon). He meant his hon. Friend; he was only anticipating what was to come. Those statements of his hon. Friend went to show that the police had acted most inhumanly and most improperly. His hon. Friend had brought before the House a specific charge that when there was a magistrate in the town those police were employed against the desire and the wish of that magistrate; to that charge the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland did not condescend to offer any reply. His hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo had pointed out that when the mob were broken, and were running away, a particular policeman ran his bayonet through the back of an unfortunate man with such force that had it not broken one of the bones inside would have come out on the other side. What did the right hon. Gentleman answer to that? The right hon. Gentleman rode off on a general protest against the hon. Member for East Mayo, daring him to say that the entire body of policemen in Ireland were inhuman. What answer had they to that specific charge of inhumanity? If these things which had happened at Youghal had happened in France, if they had occurred in Poland, if these events had been stated in English newspapers, they would at once have been dealt with as instances of gross and needless acts of inhumanity on the part of an armed force against a defenceless mob. His hon. Friend had complained to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the Government were seeking to goad the people into resistance in order to justify a new Coercion Act. To that the right hon. Gentleman replied that so monstrous a charge was never before made against a Government. Surely, the right hon. Gentleman was the last person to object to hon. Members below the Opposition Gangway having specific views and "philosophical doubts" upon that point. The Leader of what was called the Fourth Party, of which the right hon. Gentleman himself was a Member at the time, had made as strong charges against the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) as were now directed by the hon. Member for East Mayo against the present Government. For his own part, he shared the belief of his hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo that the Government were goading the Irish people. They were as weak men trying to be strong men, who were endeavouring to bring their courage up to the point of introducing a strong Coercion Bill. The Government wanted a justification and an excuse for it. The Government has certainly acted in Ireland in a way that was enough to make any people in the world resist. He (Mr. Labouchere), for one, held that the people had a perfect right to resist. He honoured them for having resisted, and he trusted that whenever the right hon. Gentleman let loose his myrmidon police, without even consulting the magistrate, the people would resist again. The hon. Member for East Mayo would not have done his duty if he had not brought this Motion before Parliament. So much for the particular case of this priest; but what about the death which had occurred in what the right hon. Gentleman called maintaining law and order in Ireland? Whenever a death occurred on account of the action of the military in Ireland or in any other part of the Kingdom, he trusted that some hon. Member representing the portion of the country in which the death took place would bring the matter before Parliament. If such a fatal occurrence had happened in any English town from the action of the police, depend upon it the Representative of that town would at once have brought the subject under the notice of the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary and the Government must clearly understand that if they had adopted this course in Ireland, the Home Rule Members—as long as they had breath and as long as they had the right—would protest against the conduct of the Government in season and out of season in that House.

Mr. Wallace

Mr. T. P. GILL (Louth, S.) said, he felt bound to ridicule the pretence put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)—namely, that the police were put in danger of their lives. The right hon. Gentleman had said that 20 out of 23 policemen were injured. What were the facts? An inquest was proceeding before the Coroner upon the body of the unfortunate man who had been killed, and at that inquest several constables were examined. For a couple of days those constables gave their evidence freely; since then a change had taken place—their mouths had been shut. But while they were free to speak, what evidence did they give as to the nature of the resistance which the Crown offered? One constable named Downes declared that the crowd that met the party of 23 extra policemen at the railway station, numbered only 30 unarmed persons. There were 23 constables armed with rifles encountering 30 persons unarmed and making up the crowd, some being women and some children that offered resistance to those armed police. Could anything be more monstrous? When the police marched up the town—said one of the constables—there was no resistance offered to the police at all; a band was simply playing, and the police followed the band. Another of the constables examined at the inquest, Head Constable Higgins, swore that during their passage through half the town the policemen remained unmolested; they were simply marching at the rear of the band, and he saw the force of police marching with fixed bayonets; the band was playing, and there was no disturbance at the time, except cheering and shouting. That was the crowd upon which the police made this murderous outrage. It was while the crowd was flying and while they had their backs turned that the police directed against those who were in it fixed bayonets, and the man who perished was killed by a policeman rushing and lunging upon him with one of these deadly weapons. At the inquest were two persons who saw this murder committed, and according to their evidence the policeman, having killed that man, chased another who had run into a doorway, and there endeavoured to stab him too with the bayonet. That policeman seemed eager to hang another scalp to his girdle in order to win the approbation of the Irish Office. What had all this bloody work been about? It had simply been about the execution of a warrant. The whole forces of the Crown had forsooth been put into operation to drive the people into a disturbance, and as it proved, even to slay, just in order to execute a warrant for contempt of Court. The evidence of the policemen given at the inquest was a little too damning for the case of the Government, and they were ordered to shut their mouths and refuse to give any more evidence. After that though, one policeman after another was called and asked the question "Did he see anybody stab anybody on that night?" yet in each case there was a refusal to answer. Such was the conduct of officers who were the boasted guardians of the law, whose profession was the discovery of crime! They declined to answer the question because, as distinctly admitted in one instance, they feared to criminate themselves. Here was contempt of Court surely similar to that on the part of Father Keller. Father Keller refused to give evidence in one Court against his flock—that was contempt of Court. In the Coroner's Court there was a policeman who refused to give evidence, and the Coroner issued his warrant for the committal of the constable. The warrant was handed to a police officer, who on seeing that it was against a fellow-constable instead of executing it put it into his pocket. Here were the two pictures—let hon. Members look upon one and then upon the other. In the one case an armed force was employed against an unarmed, inoffensive crowd, scarcely larger than itself; in the other, the policeman puts the warrant quietly into his pocket. That was a state of things without a parallel in the history of the world, and in calling attention to it his hon. Friend was fully justified. It was the duty of every Englishman who had any respect for the law of England, or any desire to see it respected by others—in Ireland or anywhere else—to support his hon. Friend to the utmost in making this protest against the infamous and disgraceful proceedings on the part of the Government.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT (Manchester, S.W.) said, my object in rising is to ask whether we are likely to get any reply from the Treasury Bench to the statements which we have heard made by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. T. P. Gill.) We have had one speech from the Treasury Bench already. But we have two Law Officers of the Crown on the Treasury Bench who know something about Ireland, and should be able to tell us whether what we have heard is true. If the speech of the hon. Member for Louth, who spoke last, has any truth in it, if one half the things he has uttered are true, it does strike me as something extraordinary that Her Majesty's Government should maintain a dumb silence and make no reply whatever to what has been uttered. I should like to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith). I should like to state to him that unless some notice is taken of the charges that have been made against the conduct of the Irish Government, it will be the first time in this House that in such extraordinary circumstances the Government of the Queen have maintained silence. Is it true, or is it not true, that the police were as numerous as the people they were dispersing? Is it true that a policeman killed an Irishman who was running away from him; that he stabbed him in the back? Is it true that when he had done so he sought to do the same to another man? Are these things true or not? I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that some Irishman on that Bench, some man who knows Ireland, may give an answer to these extraordinary charges.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I cannot but express surprise at the speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down. I have already stated in this House that the charges made are now the subject of judicial investigation. Inquiry is being made into the truth of the allegations. There is a Coroner's Inquiry going forward at this moment for the purpose of ascertaining whether these things are true or not.

Mr. T. P. Gill

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): The police will not give evidence.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I appeal to the House whether these interruptions should take place. It is alleged by the hon. Gentleman that the police will not give evidence; but I would ask the House, and even hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, whether it would be right for the Government to make any statement on facts which are in dispute as to circumstances that were unknown to them, and which might inculpate or tend to exculpate persons who are before a judicial tribunal, and whose conduct, if they have done wrong, will have to be answered for to a jury. Remarks have been made as to the conduct of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour). I protest against the tenour of those remarks. The utmost my right hon. Friend has stated is this, that it is the duty of the Government to see that the law is carried out. There can be no doubt whatever as to that, whatever the law may be. So long as the law remains the law of the land it is the duty of the Government to support and to give assistance to those charged with carrying it out, and in the way declared by the Judges of the land to be legal. The question as to what the law shall be is a question for Parliament, but there is no question to my mind, and I think there is none in that of the House of Commons, that the Executive Government is bound to sustain the judgments, orders, and directions of the Courts of Law. That is the sole and entire responsibility of the Government at the present moment, and we decline to enter further into a question which we are not justified in judging, and on which we have only partial information.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) said, there were circumstances connected with this case into which it behoved Her Majesty's Government to inquire before they took the steps they had taken. No case whatever had been made out to show that Father Keller was a necessary or material witness to attend at the Bankruptcy Court. On the other hand, there was no less than 400 tenants on the Ponsonby estate, each of whom had been cognizant of the circumstances which led to the adoption of the Plan of Campaign, and each of whom could have given evidence; and, under such circumstances, it seemed to him to be an extraordinary thing that Father Keller could know anything except as pastor of his people. He was a man of great prudence and moderation, and exercised great influence with the people, always in favour of order, peace, and tranquillity. It was desired to weaken and undermine his influence; it was desired that these people should be handed over without assistance to the forces of the Crown, and their leaders taken from them. If the summons served on Father Keller had been obeyed, his influence would have been seriously weakened, and the bailiffs and spies of the landlords, and the Landlords' Association would have gone round the estate, telling the tenants that Father Keller had abandoned and betrayed them. The warrant, in connection with which a man had been killed, was so irregular that it had since been withdrawn and abandoned. The Government sent a force of 25 police to enforce this warrant. This force met an unarmed crowd of 30 people, among whom were many women and children, and, without any consultation with the magistrates, without any attempt to read the Riot Act, and before a single stone was thrown, charged the people and did one man to death. The Government had admitted that the circumstances which led to this was an unjust rent. Their Commission, by their report, had admitted that, and they were desirous of maintaining law and order. They should maintain it in all cases, and not in one. The Government had taken no steps to bring the murderer to justice, and the only conclusion they could draw from that was, that there was one law for the people and another for the landlords. The Government allowed their officers to deliberately impede the Coroner's Inquiry, and make it fruitless. They all knew that was done for the purpose of making a case for a Coercion Act, and no excuse was needed for bringing the matter before the House. It was their duty to warn the country of the battle in which the Government now deliberately engaged, and the guilt and shame of which would rest altogether on the Government.

Mr. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) said, it was not his intention to engage the attention of the House long, but he felt bound, in reference to this grave matter, speaking, as he knew he did, on behalf of his constituents, to join his protest to that which had been made by the hon. Member for York (Mr. Lockwood) and other hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House, against the tone which was displayed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour). He did not think the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) had mended the matter by what he said, for he made no attempt to reply to the argument advanced by the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon). The Coroner who was conducting the inquiry now proceeding, had made a very grave charge against Her Majesty's Government. That gentleman had declared that he had received no assistance from Her Majesty's Government in the inquiry which he was conducting. He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) gathered from the language of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House that the right hon. Gentleman was entirely ignorant that such a charge had been made. It was not to be expected that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House should be acquainted with all that was taking place at Youghal; but it was part of their case that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had manifested the utmost ignorance of what is taking place in that town at the present moment. He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) and others wanted to know why the orders with regard to Father Keller were being enforced with such alacrity, when no assistance whatever was rendered to the Coroner in the inquiry he was holding. It was undeniable that the significance of the events of the last few days, in relation to the state of Ireland, could hardly be exaggerated, and therefore he ventured to say that unless the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland treated these events with a little less levity, and answered hon. Members from Ireland with a little more respect, something serious would before long occur in that country. He thought that what had taken place amply justified the hon. Member for East Mayo in bringing these matters before the House. He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) agreed with the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labour-where), that whenever anything of this kind occurred in Ireland, or in any part of the United Kingdom, it was to be hoped that some one connected with the constituency would feel it to be his duty to bring it before the House, as the hon. Member for East Mayo had done. To do so would be to follow the best traditions of the House of Commons. He himself intervened in the discussion on behalf of his constituents, and with their full sanction, and they were determined that every case of grievance in administering the law should be probed to the utmost. Whenever Irish Members thought fit to bring before the House, in their Representative capacity, anything of which they thought the House should take cognizance, they would have his most earnest sympathy.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camberne) said, he also felt bound to complain of the levity of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) in dealing with this matter, and the general want of respect shown by the Government and their Representatives, to the House in these proceedings. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith)—who had said that nothing could be done to-night because there was a judicial investigation going on—whether he would, first of all, direct his menials and agents in Ireland to cease putting obstruction in the way of the Coroner in the course of his inquiry? It was practically impossible, owing to the conduct of the Government officials, for the Coroner to get any evidence as to why the poor fellow, Hanlon, was brutally murdered, as they contended he was. He would also ask whether the right hon. Gentleman would give an assurance that the House would have an opportunity of discussion on some future occasion when the inquiry was over? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had told them that he had authentic information, which contradicted the evidence given before the Coroner. They had a right to ask where he got his information; and, unless he gave his authority, they had a right to consider the evidence before the Coroner as more trustworthy than that on which the right hon. Gentleman relied. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary had used such language as that something worse than batons would be used. Whether the right hon. Gentleman intended it or not, he believed that here they had the direct consequences of such reckless language. If the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary did not mend his ways, and treat the House with more respect, and if he did not show a little less levity in his method of dealing with these matters, he would be as responsible as the late Chief Secretary must be held to be for the consequences of such utterances. The proceedings of the Government in Ireland were most arbitrary and despotic, and before they talked of Irish Representatives leading the people of Ireland into illegal courses, they should set an example of legal and law-abiding behaviour in the administration of the law.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.) said, he was desirous of calling the attention of the House and of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) to the fact that there seemed to be no necessity for the collection of a Police Force at Youghal, that the telegraphing for extra men was a mistake, and the death of Hanlon following from that mistake was directly attributable to whoever committed that error. Where had they been drafted from, and what was the character of these men who were to give the people of Youghal something more than batons? There were hundreds of cases of contempt of Court in Ireland in which witnesses refused to attend Courts where no warrants were issued. Why, then, this frenzied energy in the case of a priest, and why this particular demonstration on the part of the authorities? Was it attributable to the discontent of some of the Representatives of the Protestants of Ulster, who had been very restless of late, and who had been clamouring for energetic action, and who thought that the arrest of a priest or two, with, perhaps, a Bishop thrown in, would most likely exasperate the people? He failed to see why the forces of the Crown should be devoted exclusively to executing landlord decrees, whilst the decrees of merchants and others were rotting in the Sheriffs' offices and could not be executed. He would give the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland precedent for the arrest of policemen for acts done in the execution of their duty. In the case of the Belfast riots 13 policemen were arrested in Belfast, because some people engaged in wrecking houses were killed during an attempt to disperse them, and the Attorney General himself refused at an Assize Court in the North of Ireland to allow these men out on bail, and said an application should be made to the Court of Queen's Bench. In the case of one of the Londonderry riots, two officers were put on their trial and produced in Court their rifles with the indentations made on them by the revolver bullets of the mob. The contrast between the course taken in these cases and the frenzied energy displayed at Youghal seemed to illustrate once more how in Ireland all law and all authority were disturbed in the interests of the landlords. If a policeman killed an Orangeman in the North he must go to gaol, but if he runs a bayonet through a Papist in the South he goes free.

Mr. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion) said, he did not consider that the fact that a judicial investigation was pending afforded any ground in the present instance for not discussing the matter, for the only investigation that was pending was a Coroner's inquest, which did not arraign the conduct of anyone, but merely inquired into the facts. Unless some further information was given by the Government the House would be led to the conclusion that the law was not evenly administered in Ireland. How was it that the warrant for the arrest of Father Keller was so promptly executed at all hazards, while the warrant for the arrest of the constable who was committed by the Coroner for refusing to give evidence was wilfully left unexecuted? There was one other point to which he wished to call attention. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had been led unwittingly to make a statement which had turned out to be unfounded, to the effect that 21 out of 22 policemen had been injured in the riot. Now the judicial inquiry showed that only three had been injured; and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland himself that evening did not assert that more than three had been injured. He thought that they ought to know on what information the right hon. Gentleman had acted.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said, he thought that the hon. Member misunderstood the facts of the case. He had answered a Question put to him without Notice, and stated that 21 out of 22 had been seriously hurt. He had qualified that statement by saying that he could not guarantee its accuracy, and yesterday he had stated the facts as they had occurred—namely, that 21 had been hit, 15 hurt, and three badly hurt.

Mr. BRYN ROBERTS said, he thought that that hardly affected the question. The right hon. Gentleman must have got the first information from somebody, as he would not have uttered that statement from his own consciousness. He thought that the House was entitled to have a full explanation of the authority upon which the right hon. Gentleman had given his first answer.

Dr. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, that as one of the Protestant Representatives from Ireland, he regretted extremely the manner in which the question had been dealt with by the authorities responsible for law and order in Ireland. He maintained that if a Protestant clergyman had been arrested in similar circumstances in England or Wales and carried off to prison, as the Irish Executive had carried off Father Keller, a storm of intense indignation would have been roused by English Members in the House of Commons, and extremely strong language would be used with reference to the matter. If it was the intention of the Government to do anything for the benefit of the people of Ireland, they had certainly in this case gone to work in the wrong way; and they had acted in Ireland in a way in which they dared not act in England. The way in which the arrest of Father Keller had been carried out was evidently intended as an insult to the people. In Wales, where there had been a great deal of trouble, would the Government dare to arrest one of the Nonconformist clergymen there who were struggling against the tithes? In consequence, however, of the action of the Government, Father Keller had been ennobled in the eyes of his parishioners and his fellow-countrymen in Ireland, who now looked upon him with feelings of veneration and respect. The Government could not produce their Coercion Bill without stirring up the muddy waters and trying to bring about bloodshed. He had been at meetings which were attempted to be suppressed, and which he had held in spite of the attempts to suppress them; and on such occasions it was customary for the Government to send 200 police. How many were sent to Youghal? He argued that if the Government had meant to preserve law and order in Youghal, they would have sent a strong force to execute the warrant, instead of sending 30 policemen only, some of whom he was certain were Orangemen. The whole policy of the Government was to provoke the people, and to make them take up the rifle—a thing which they might do if it were necessary. He believed that the dangerous policy which the Government were pursuing was not originated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary or his Colleagues, but was pressed upon them and backed by the landlord faction in that House, and they were afraid to take up a line of policy which would differ in any degree from the policy inaugurated by the Landlords' Defence Union; and he felt convinced that its evil results would sooner or later recoil on their own heads. If their object in playing upon the chords of passion and trying to exasperate the Irish people was, as he feared, to obtain a miserable pretext for introducing coercive legislation, they must themselves bear the responsibility for all the bloodshed and disaster which might ensue.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) said, he regarded the statement which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) as fraught with danger to the Public Service. The right hon. Gentleman ought not lightly to make such statements, and when he had found himself misled into such a statement he should have apologized to the House, and explained how and on what authority he was induced to make it. He denied that any justification had been shown for the arrest of Father Keller, and maintained that it was ridiculous to expect that by summoning him as a witness any evidence could be obtained from him in the case before the Bankruptcy Court, inasmuch as it was impossible for him to betray the confidence reposed in him as a priest. Moreover, in face of the letter of his Bishop, Dr. M'Carthy, warning him of his duty towards his people, he dare not do other than refuse to give any information in this matter. Further, it was a wanton exercise of power on the part of Judge

Boyd to compel Father Keller to come before his Court when there were hundreds of the tenants joined in the Plan of Campaign on this estate who had not been summoned as witnesses yet. The Government only carried out the laws that suited themselves and favoured the rich; and if they were so anxious to enforce law and order and to execute the decrees of the Courts, why was the order of the Coroner's Court at Youghal not carried out? If law and order were to be maintained in Ireland the decree of one Court ought to be executed with as much certainty as the decree of another Court. The policy adopted by the Government was not calculated to increase respect for law and order in Ireland. If the Government despised the orders of the Coroner's Court in Youghal, how could they expect the people to respect and obey the orders of other Courts? There had not been shown the slightest necessity for the arrest of Father Keller, and the object of the Government was to exasperate the people and provoke disturbances, in order to find some excuse for passing the measure of coercion for Ireland they intended to bring in.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) said, if the Members of the Government were pleased with their attitude in that matter, hon. Members from Ireland could well afford to make them a present of that pleasure. When an Irish subject was brought before the House the Members of the Government seemed to be seized with lock-jaw; and all they could do—as was the case at that moment—was to indulge their artistic tendencies by sketching the Irish Members in the House. He must confess he could not help feeling surprised that not one word of regret had fallen from the lips of any Member of the Government at the death of the man Hanlon, at Youghal, who was proved to have been stabbed through the back whilst running away from the forces of the Crown. The expression, "I'm sorry I did not fire on them," used by District Inspector Somerville to Dr. Ronayne, J.P., of Youghal, was an embodiment of the spirit that animated Her Majesty's Government in Ireland, and was a free paraphrase of the last words of the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), "You will get something harder than batons," as he bid adieu to the House. He (Mr.

E. Harrington) could not congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) on his baptism of blood at Youghal. He (Mr. E. Harrington) was an humble man, but not for a thousand times the salary of the best paid Minister of the Crown would he occupy the position, standing there, and being the Representative of the murderers of the Irish people. [Cries of "Order, order!"] Well, he supposed that was not in Order; but if the statement were untrue why had not some Minister the courage to stand up and refute it? The fact was, the Government knew that they were losing their power over Ireland, and were becoming reckless. The Nationalist Members were agitators, and they would be base and recreant if they did not agitate until the wrongs of their country were redressed. If justice was not done to Ireland they would lay the print of the agitation on every spot of England until, if there were hearts in the men of the country, they would rise up and demand that justice should be done to Ireland, and that there should be an end to the present cruel, cowardly, and murderous policy of the Government in Ireland.

Dr. FOX (King's Co., Tullamore) said, there was a conspiracy of silence on the part of the Government in this matter, and the conspiracy had even extended to the Coroner's Court. It was entirely due to their mismanagement that the arrest, which was altogether unjustifiable, was made of Father Keller, in order to incite the Irish people to a breach of the peace. The unfortunate man who was killed had been present on the occasion merely out of curiosity. Father Keller was much respected in the district. With reference to the occurrences in Belfast—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) rose to Order, and wished to know whether the hon. Member was in Order in referring to what had taken place in Belfast?

Mr. SPEAKER said, that there was a definite Motion before the House—the arrest of Father Keller and the disturbance at Youghal; and, in his opinion, the hon. Member was not confining his remarks to the subject of that Motion.

Dr. FOX said, he wished to know what the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary for Ireland—with his 48 hours' experience of that country—could know about the Irish Constabulary? The right hon. Gentleman appeared to have set himself up as the Irish Ruddigore of modern politics. He talked of governing Ireland with a strong hand. He wished him joy of the job; but before many months were past the right hon. Gentleman would find that the labour of crushing down the Irish people was too much for him. He had uncoiled himself, and showed an amount of backbone that he hoped would stand by him for some time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is not in Order. He is not discussing the Motion before the House.

Dr. FOX said, that he would not pursue that line of argument further. Hon. Members opposite appeared to be anxious to enjoy the luxury of arresting an Irish Archbishop. If the right hon. Gentleman did make such an arrest he would find that he had made a very grave mistake. Many a braver man than the Chief Secretary had failed to rule Ireland, and the people of that country would continue to strain every nerve to show that they were worthy of self-government. With the Salisbury family in Office, and the Chamberlain family out of Office, he would soon come to the conclusion—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! I again, for the third time, warn the hon. Gentleman that he is not confining himself to the Motion before the House.

The hon. MEMBER thereupon resumed his seat.

Mr. P. McDONALD (Sligo, N.) said, the occurrences at Youghal had filled the Irish people with horror, and those of this country with indignation. The Irish priests did not dread a prison. Priest after priest and Bishop after Bishop were ready to sacrifice their liberty for the good of their people. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) had made a very false step when he permitted or approved the arrest of Father Keller. The Government thought that because Father Keller was the keeper of the consciences of his people he would communicate the secrets of the Confessional in the witness-box. But anything communicated to a priest in the Confessional was as secret as the grave. The brutality of the police was intended to provoke the people to resistance in order to give this wretched Government an excuse for coercion.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not speaking to the Motion before the House.

MR. P. McDONALD said, he was about to illustrate the object for which Father Keller had been arrested. The arrest was made in sustainment of a certain interest in Ireland; but it would not bring about the result desired by the Government, which was to enforce the payment of impossible rents. What Ireland wanted was not government by the baton, but just laws and equal rights.

MR. DEASY (Mayo, W.) said, he would ask whether it was too much to expect that the House should listen for a few hours to so important a discussion? He would suggest that the Government should allow some right hon. Gentleman to answer the speeches made from that (the Opposition) side of the House. The only speech made from the Government Bench was that of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour), who spoke only for a few minutes, and during those few minutes gave very little satisfaction to the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) who introduced the subject. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman had been commented upon very severely, and during his experience he had not heard any speech so much calculated to stir up ill-feeling. If the Government desired to carry out the law fairly in Ireland, why did they not arrest the policeman who refused to give evidence in the Coroner's Court? That was a much stronger case than that of Father Keller; but the policeman was not interfered with. The fact was that there seemed to be one administration of the law for the priests and the people, and another for the police; and he believed that the arrest of Father Keller was ordered and made because it was the step best calculated to enrage the people and to bring them into conflict with the law. If the Government wished to maintain order in Ireland, and to instil respect for the law into the minds of the Irish people, let them set the example of fairly and equitably applying it to all classes. The course they were at present pursuing, and the tone of the speech delivered that evening by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, could have no other effect than to stir up the most bitter feeling against the law and the Executive; while, at the same time, it would tend to strengthen the bond which existed between the priest and his people all over the country.

Mr. P. McDonald

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, they had often listened to debates on the administration of justice in Ireland without heeding them, but now the feeling was different; and he believed that the result of this debate would be different from that of former debates in its effect upon English opinion as to the administration of justice in Ireland—[Cries of "Divide!" and interruptions].—

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.), in rising to Order, appealed to Members on the Ministerial Benches to give the hon. Member a fair hearing, as that would be the best means of bringing the debate to an early conclusion.

MR. JAMES STUART said, the country would be more than ever convinced, by what had happened in the House and out of it, that the administration of justice in Ireland should not, when Home Rule was established, be retained in the hands of this country. Some of the darkest blots on our administration of Ireland had arisen from the fact that the administration of justice had been in the hands of others than the Irish people.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): Mr. Speaker, I must protest, Sir, on the absence of any serious attempt on the part of the Government to meet the very strong and very serious case which has been made out against them. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland may be, like the pirate Lambro—

"The mildest mannered man,
That ever scuttled ship or cut a throat;"
but his mildness of manner will not enable him to escape the retribution which the judgment of history will assign to him as one who has entered on his task of bloodshed in Ireland lightly, and as one who, in a short tenure of Office, has been guilty of more errors, and displayed more callousness and more indifference, than any of his Predecessors. The Leader of the House has attempted to throw a cloud of dust in our eyes by endeavouring to shift the responsibility from the shoulders of the Government to those of a policeman. Now, Sir, this Motion attacks directly the conduct of the police. It has been said that the subject of the Motion is the subject of judicial proceedings; but it is only the conduct of the policeman which is the subject of judicial procedure. The Government are not shielded by the fact that a Coroner's inquest is proceeding upon the body of the unfortunate man Hanlon; but the charge is that the Government, armed as they are with the forces of civil authority, have deliberately set out on a course of exasperation, and have done all they could to bring about a collision between the people and the police. It seems to me that this unfortunate state of affairs has been brought about by the hurried change of Office from one right hon. Gentleman of considerable experience to another right hon. Gentleman who has had no experience at all. Unfortunately, the Government do not apprehend what sort of a country they have to rule; and what we accuse them of is that they have endeavoured to bring about the cruelties which have been perpetrated by the police upon the people. We also charge them and their Representatives with deliberately shielding the offenders from justice. At the Coroner's inquest which is now proceeding on the death of Hanlon, it has been sworn that a policeman named Ward chased this man Hanlon for 50 yards through the streets, and then deliberately ran a bayonet through his back. That statement, in fact, has not been denied; but yet this police-constable so charged is continued in his duty, and is marching through the streets of Youghal at the present moment, in company with his comrades, and in possession of the weapon he used on Hanlon. It is also sworn that the policeman, not contented with taking one life, pursued another man, who only saved his life by escaping through the open door of an hotel. The acts of this policeman appear to be regarded by the Government as brave deeds, and he is continued still in his duty; and the other day the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had a lie put into his mouth—[Cries of "Order!"]

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): I rise to Order. I understood the hon. Member to say that the Chief Secretary for Ireland has had a lie put into his mouth. Obviously—[half turning towards the hon. Member]—the hon. Gentleman does not mean what his words imply?

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. and gallant Member rise to a point of Order?

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN: Yes, Sir.

MR. SPEAKER: Then the hon. and gallant Gentleman must address the Chair.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN: Quite so, Sir; that is what I intended to do. I understood the hon. Member to say that the Chief Secretary has had a lie put into his mouth by some Member of this House; and I want to know from you, Sir, if the use of such an expression is regular?

MR. SPEAKER: I noticed the expression; but I did not understand the hon. Member to imply that the right hon. Gentleman had stated that which was not true, but that a statement had been supplied to the right hon. Gentleman which was not correct. He did not impute anything at all to the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN: I rise to Order.

MR. PARNELL: I had no intention of imputing anything at all to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN: I now rise to Order for the purpose of making a personal explanation in this connection.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Mr. Parnell.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN again rose—

MR. SPEAKER: I call upon Mr. Parnell.

MR. PARNELL: The expression which I made use of may have been somewhat too strong; but what I meant to say was that the right hon. Gentleman was asked for information in reference to the proceedings of the police at Youghal. The right hon. Gentleman stated that a large number of the constables employed on the occasion were seriously injured. That information turned out to be without any foundation whatever, and the right hon. Gentleman was himself obliged to admit that the proceedings had not been of so grave a character, and that the lives of the police were not in any danger at all. I would ask the House to contrast what took place at Youghal with that which occurred in the North of Ireland at Belfast, where the civilians of that town absolutely rose in arms not only against the Constabulary, but against the Queen's troops, and inflicted serious injury both upon the police and the military. Contrast the conduct of the Government in the one case and the other. The police constables in Belfast, after having been fired into, did take the life of one man, and for taking that life were arrested and sent to prison; but Police Constable Ward is still allowed to remain at Youghal, as a still further provocation to the people. I maintain that such conduct is intolerable, and it shows that the Government have not considered the weight of the task they have undertaken when they proceed in this reckless fashion. The Inspector of the police, who was in Court at the time of the inquest on Hanlon, was directed by the Coroner to execute a warrant for the arrest of Constable Ward; but he treated it as waste paper, and the constable is still at liberty. If we are to respect the authority of Judge Boyd's Court, why not respect that of the Coroner also? One of the reasons why your law is not respected is that it is only administered in a one-sided way. The Government talk of maintaining law and order. Why do they not begin in the Coroner's Court? The Coroner gave directions for the issue of a warrant, and you refuse to put it in force, and you allow a Constabulary officer, with a charge of murder hanging over his head, to remain at large. But if Judge Boyd gives an order in favour of the privileged classes, then all the forces of the law are called into action for the purpose of giving effect to it. This is one of the reasons why the people of Ireland do not respect the law, and they never will respect it as long as it is administered in that one-sided way. I think we are entitled to ask Her Majesty's Government to abstain from reckless provocation—to abstain from those open incitements which have been directed to the superior officers of the Constabulary of Ireland to shoot down the people. The arrest of an Irish priest is a serious matter. The arrest of Father Keller, an Irish priest, who is publicly supported by his Bishop and by the Archbishop of Cashel, is a very serious undertaking for the Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant could not have commenced his duties with a more memorable undertaking than the prosecution of an Irish priest. It is a remarkable thing that the right hon. Gentleman had been scarcely a week in Office when it was signalized by two such events as the murder of this unfortunate man and the arrest of this priest. [Cries of "Withdraw!"] I shall not withdraw.

Mr. Parnell

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince): I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. Member is not bound to withdraw that expression?

MR. SPEAKER: What is the expression the hon. and gallant Member complains of?

COLONEL BLUNDELL: The hon. Member said the right hon. Gentleman signalized his first week of Office by a murder. In saying that the hon. Member has attributed murder to the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member has imputed anything of the kind he is entirely out of Order, and it would be my duty to call upon him to withdraw it. But I did not gather that he said that. What he said was that the right hon. Gentleman's advent to Office had been signalized by the murder of this man and by the arrest of a priest—that those acts had taken place in Ireland since the right hon. Gentleman accepted Office.

MR. PARNELL: I made no imputation whatever against the right hon. Gentleman. What I said was that it was an ominous thing that the first week in Office of the right hon. Gentleman should have been signalized by a murder and the arrest of a priest. I call on the Government while there is yet time, before they go from bad to worse, to pause at the commencement of the struggle they are undertaking for no better or worthier reason than to try to keep themselves in Office a few months longer than they otherwise would. I can understand a Government believing that the foundations of society are unloosed, or persistently and steadfastly applying coercion; but it is not right, nor is it legitimate, but it is a miserable thing, to coerce Ireland merely for the exigencies of Party purposes. This strong and stern government is due to the exigencies of their Party, and not to the exigency of the state of affairs in Ireland. A year ago the Government intimated their intention to apply 20 years of stern and resolute government to Ireland; and it may suit their purpose now to imprison priests, and to uphold what you call the law with sternness and resoluteness. Neither of those feelings can I reciprocate; upon neither of them can I look with anything but the feeling they deserve; and I believe that the result of this last attempt at resolute government will be to bring the authors of it to the confusion they deserve.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 88; Noes 226: Majority 138.

AYES.

Anderson, C. H.
Asquith, H. H.
Blake, J. A.
Blane, A.
Bright, Jacob
Broadhurst, H.
Buxton, S. O.
Byrne, G. M.
Campbell, H.
Chance, P. A.
Channing, F. A.
Clark, Dr. G. B.
Cobb, H. P.
Connolly, L.
Conway, M.
Conybeare, O. A. V.
Craig, J.
Craven, J.
Deasy, J.
Dillon, J.
Dodds, J.
Ellis, J. E.
Ellis, T. E.
Eslemont, P.
Evershed, S.
Fenwick, C.
Foley, P. J.
Fox, Dr. J. F.
Gill, T. P.
Harrington, E.
Hooper, J.
Hoyle, I.
Hunter, W. A.
Illingworth, A.
Joicey, J.
Kenny, O. S.
Kenny, M. J.
Labouchere, H.
Lane, W. J.
Leahy, J.
Leake, R.
Lewis, T. P.
Lockwood, F.
Mac Neill, J. G. S.
McCartan, M.
McCarthy, J.

M'Donald, P.
M'Donald, Dr. R.
M'Ewan, W.
M'Kenna, Sir J. N.
M'Laren, W. S. B.
Mason, S.
Molloy, B. C.
Morgan, O. V.
Nolan, Colonel J. P.
Nolan, J.
O'Brien, J. F. X.
O'Brien, P.
O'Brien, P. J.
O'Connor, A.
O'Doherty, J. E.
O'Kelly, J.
Parnell, C. S.
Paulton, J. M.
Pease, A. E.
Pickersgill, E. H.
Powell, W. R. H.
Quinn, T.
Redmond, J. E.
Roberts, J. B.
Rowlands, W. B.
Rowntree, J.
Russell, E. R.
Samuelson, Sir B.
Stack, J.
Stanhope, hon. P. J.
Stevenson, F. S.
Sullivan, D.
Summers, W.
Swinburne, Sir J.
Tanner, C. K.
Thomas, A.
Tuite, J.
Wallace, R.
Warrington, C. M.
Wayman, T.
Williams, A. J.
Wright, O.

Sheil, E.
Stuart, J.

ADDISON, J. E. W.
AGG-GARDNER, J. T.
AMBROSE, W.
AMHERST, W. A. T.

ANSTRUTHER, Colonel R.
H. L.
ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, E.
BAGGALLAY, E.

NOES.

TELLERS.

Bailey, Sir J. R.
Balfour, rt. hon. A. J.
Balfour, G. W.
Barry, A. H. Smith-
Bartley, G. C. T.
Bates, Sir E.
Baumann, A. A.
Bentinck, rt. hn. G. O.
Bentinck, W. G. O.
Beresford, Lord C. W.
de la Poer
Bethell, Commander
G. R.
Biddulph, M.
Bigwood, J.
Brkbeck, Sir E.
Blundell, Col. H. B. H.
Bond, G. H.
Bonsor, H. C. O.
Boord, T. W.
Borthwick, Sir A.
Bridgeman, Col. hon.
F. C.
Bristowe, T. L.
Brodrick, hon. W. St.
J. F.
Burdett-Coutts, W. L.
Ash.-B.
Burghley, Lord
Caine, W. S.
Caldwell, J.
Campbell, Sir A.
Campbell, R. F. F.
Chaplin, right hon. H.
Clarke, Sir E. G.
Cochrane-Baillie, hon.
C. W. A. N.
Coghill, D. H.
Colomb, Capt. J. C. R.
Commerell, Adml. Sir
J. E.
Corbett, J.
Corry, Sir J. P.
Cotton, Capt. E. T. D.
Cranborne, Viscount
Cross, H. S.
Crossman, Gen. Sir W.
Davenport, H. T.
Davenport, W. B.
Dawnay, Colonel hon.
L. P.
De Cobain, E. S. W.
De Worms, Baron H.
Dimesdale, Baron R.
Dixon, G.
Dixon-Hartland, F. D.
Dugdale, J. S.
Dyke, right hon. Sir
W. H.
Ebrington, Viscount
Egerton, hon. A. de T.
Elcho, Lord
Elliot, hon. A. R. D.
Elliot, hon. H. F. H.
Elton, C. I.
Ewart, W.
Ewing, Sir A. O.
Eyre, Colonel H.
Fergusson, rt. hn. Sir J.
Field, Admiral E.
Finch, G. H.
Finch-Hatton, hon. M.
E. G.

Fisher, W. H.
Folkestone, right hon.
Viscount
Forwood, A. B.
Fowler, Sir R. N.
Fraser, General C. C.
Fry, L.
Fulton, J. F.
Gaskell, C. G. Milnes-
Gathorne-Hardy, hon.
A. E.
Gedge, S.
Gent-Davis, R.
Gibson, J. G.
Giles, A.
Gilliat, J. S.
Godson, A. F.
Goldsworthy, Major-
General W. T.
Gorst, Sir J. E.
Goschen, rt. hn. G. J.
Gray, O. W.
Grimston, Viscount
Grotian, F. B.
Hamilton, right hon.
Lord G. F.
Hamley, General Sir
E. B.
Hardcastle, F.
Havelock - Allan, Sir
H. M.
Heathcote, Capt. J. H.
Edwards.
Heaton, J. H.
Herbert, hon. S.
Hermion-Hodge, R. T.
Hill, right hon. Lord
A. W.
Hill, Colonel E. S.
Hobhouse, H.
Holland, right hon.
Sir H. T.
Holloway, G.
Houldsworth, W. H.
Howorth, H. H.
Hoxier, J. H. O.
Hubbard, E.
Hughes - Hallett, Col.
F. C.
Hunt, F. S.
Hunter, Sir W. G.
Isaacs, L. H.
Isaacson, F. W.
Jackson, W. L.
Jarvis, A. W.
Jennings, L. J.
Johnston, W.
Kelly, J. R.
Kennaway, Sir J. H.
Kenrick, W.
Kenyon, hon. G. T.
Kerans, F. H.
Kimber, H.
King, H. S.
King-Harman, Colonel
E. R.
Knatchbull-Hugessen,
H. T.
Lafone, A.
Laurie, Colonel R. P.
Lawrance, J. C.
Lawrence, Sir J. J. T.
Lawrence, W. F.

Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.
 Lees, E.
 Lewisham, right hon. Viscount
 Llewellyn, E. H.
 Long, W. H.
 Low, M.
 Lowther, J. W.
 Lyell, L.
 Lymington, Viscount
 Macartney, W. G. E.
 Macdonald, right hon. J. H. A.
 MacInnes, M.
 Maclean, F. W.
 Maclean, J. M.
 Maclure, J. W.
 McCalmont, Captain J.
 Malcolm, Col. J. W.
 Mallock, R.
 Marriott, rt. hn. W. T.
 Maskelyne, M. H. N. Story.
 Matthews, rt. hn. H.
 Maxwell, Sir H. E.
 Mildmay, F. B.
 Mills, hon. C. W.
 Morgan, hon. F.
 Mount, W. G.
 Mowbray, rt. hon. Sir J. R.
 Mowbray, R. G. C.
 Mulholland, H. L.
 Muncaster, Lord
 Muntz, P. A.
 Murdoch, C. T.
 Noble, W.
 Norris, E. S.
 Northcote, hon. H. S.
 Norton, R.
 O'Neill, hon. R. T.
 Parker, hon. F.
 Pelly, Sir L.
 Pitt-Lewis, G.
 Plunket, right hon. D. R.
 Plunkett, hon. J. W.
 Pomfret, W. P.
 Powell, F. S.
 Puleston, J. H.
 Raikes, rt. hon. H. C.
 Rankin, J.
 Rasch, Major F. O.
 Reed, H. B.
 Ritchie, rt. hn. C. T.
 Robertson, J. P. B.
 Robinson, B.
 Russell, T. W.
 Salt, T.
 Saunderson, Col. E. J.
 Sclater-Booth, rt. hn. G.
 Shaw-Stewart, M. H.
 Sidebotham, J. W.
 Sidebottom, T. H.
 Sidebottom, W.
 Smith, rt. hn. W. H.
 Smith, A.
 Spencer, J. E.
 Stanhope, rt. hon. E.
 Stewart, M.
 Sykes, O.
 Talbot, J. G.
 Taylor, F.
 Temple, Sir R.
 Theobald, J.
 Thorburn, W.
 Tollemache, H. J.
 Tomlinson, W. E. M.
 Tottenham, A. L.
 Townsend, F.
 Trotter, H. J.
 Verdin, R.
 Vernon, hon. G. R.
 Vincent, C. E. H.
 Waring, Colonel T.
 Watson, J.
 Webster, Sir R. E.
 Webster, R. G.
 West, Colonel W. C.
 Weymouth, Viscount
 White, J. B.
 Whitley, E.
 Winn, hon. R.
 Winterbotham, A. B.
 Wodehouse, E. R.
 Wood, N.
 Wortley, O. B. Stuart-
 Wright, H. S.
 Wroughton, P.
 Young, C. E. B.

TELLERS.

Douglas, A. Akers-
 Walrond, Col. W. H.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (RULES OF PROCEDURE)—RULE I (CLOSURE OF DEBATE).—RESOLUTION.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [FOURTEENTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned
 Debate on the Amendment to the Main Question, as amended,

"That, after a Question has been proposed, a Member rising in his place may claim to move,
 'That the Question be now put,' and, unless it shall appear to the Chair that such Motion is an abuse of the Rules of the House, or an infringement of the rights of the minority, the Question, 'That the Question be now put,'

 shall be put forthwith, and decided without Amendment or Debate.

"When the Motion, 'That the Question be now put,' has been carried, and the Question consequent thereon has been decided, any further Motion may be made (the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld) which may be requisite to bring to a decision any Question already proposed from the Chair; and also if a Clause be then under consideration, a Motion may be made (the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld)
 That the Question, That certain words of the Clause defined in the Motion stand part of the Clause, or that the Clause stand part of, or be added to the Bill, be now put. Such Motions shall be put forthwith, and decided without Amendment or Debate.

"Provided always, That Questions for the Closure of Debate shall not be decided in the affirmative, if a Division be taken, unless it shall appear by the numbers declared from the Chair, that such Motion was supported by more than Two hundred Members, or was opposed by less than Forty Members, and supported by more than One Hundred Members.

"Provided always, That this Rule shall be put in force only when the Speaker or the Chairman of Ways and Means is in the Chair."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

And which Amendment was,

To add, at the end of the Question, the words
 "Provided also, that any number of Members exceeding Ten, who shall be dissatisfied with such decision, shall be entitled, at the next Sitting of the House, to make a collective protest in writing, which shall be recorded in the Journals of the House."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there added."

Debate resumed.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON
 (Kerry, W.): This Proviso, which was moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), was under discussion when the debate was adjourned on Wednesday, and it provides that a protest in writing may be made and recorded in the Journals of the House.
 On that occasion I ventured to say that no hon. Member could find fault with the Amendment, seeing that it would occasion neither delay nor procrastination, nor involve a waste of the time of the House. [Cries of "Oh!"]
 If hon. Gentlemen are under that impression, let me explain to them how the matter stands. The proposal simply provides that any number of Members exceeding 10 who feel themselves aggrieved by a decision in favour of closure shall be able to make a collective protest in writing. I fail to see what reasonable objection can be made to the proposal. There can be nothing unreasonable in the protest, which, in many cases, might be valuable when a discussion of grave local importance, such, for instance, as that which has been debated to-night, had been brought to an end by the closure. Every Member who is dissatisfied with the decision, and whose constituents are affected by the action of the Government or the majority, will be able to place their views upon record. The Proviso is so framed that a defeated minority could not at once, in unseemly haste, rush to the books and record their protest. It must also be a collective protest of at least 11 Members, and it is provided that the protest shall not be made at once, but at the next Sitting of the House. This is no Party question, and the Proviso is practically the same as that which was proposed by the Conservative Party in 1882; and I hope, therefore, that at least some hon. Members on the other side of the House will justify themselves to history and in the eyes of their constituents by voting in favour of it. I would certainly invite the Leader of the House to explain the reasons which induce him to oppose the insertion of the Proviso.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I hope that this will not be made a Government or even a Party question. We do not ask the whole of the Members of the Government to vote for it, but simply to leave it an open question. The Amendment is not our Amendment, but it is one which was originally proposed by the First Lord of the Treasury himself. If, therefore, he will consent to leave it an open question, I believe that a large number of his followers will be willing to support it. I have no doubt that if they are allowed to vote as they like, there will be a considerable majority in favour of it. The time will come when the Conservative Party may be in Opposition, and they will then find the right of protest which we ask them to adopt very useful. This is not a Radical innovation—the words of the Amendment are those of the Conservative Party, they are not ours—and the Conservatives are much more likely to want freedom of speech than we are. They ought, therefore, to cherish this right, and if they refuse to accept the Amendment, they will, I think, act very foolishly, and regret having done so hereafter. It would be a graceful act on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to concede this point; and if he is not willing to do so now, I trust he will say that the matter shall be taken into consideration.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I hope the House will not forget the origin of this Amendment. Hon. Members will be aware that this Amendment was originally brought forward by the present Leader of the House; it was moved in his words, and it was supported by the whole force of the Tory Opposition in 1882. The question was brought to a Division, and it was only defeated by a very narrow majority. The majority against the Amendment was only 31; and yet the right hon. Gentleman, in the face of all his former arguments, and the arguments of every Member who at the time sat on the Front Opposition Bench, turns round and opposes the very Amendment which he then introduced, and which the whole of his Party supported. But we are supported by other recommendations than those of the then Conservative Opposition. We have other precedents for the Amendment which is now under discussion, and the support of gentlemen who are authorities on Parliamentary precedent, and who do not belong to the Tory Party. One of those gentlemen whose authority is, perhaps, higher than that of others is Professor Thorold Rogers, who has collected a series of precedents for protests made during a number of years. Professor Thorold Rogers, who was at the time a Member of the House, spoke in favour of this right of recording a protest; he referred, in support of the Amendment, to the practice of the House of Lords, which enables Peers to record their protest against the action of the majority of the House of Lords; that protests had been of great assistance in securing English liberty; and that those who had protested "were the protectors of public liberty against the arbitrary action of the Crown." In the series of protests which he records, an instance, in 1641, was included, when in the House of Commons an effort was made to exercise the identical right of protest which existed in the House of Lords. They claimed it in a higher degree than we do now, because we only ask for a certain number of Members what was then sought for all—this right of recording their protest on the Journals of the House. It was ultimately refused, but it may have been fortunate that it was so, because, at that time, the right of protest would not have been beneficial to the liberties of the Members of the House. The argument adduced against the Amendment of the present Leader of the House was that since it was the Speaker who had to exercise the initiative in proposing the closure, any protest recorded in the Journals of the House would be a protest in futurum, and not a protest in rem. That, Sir, strengthens our case immensely, because the initiative no longer rests with the Chair; and it can no longer be contended that a protest on the Journals of the House would be a protest in futurum, and not a protest in rem; it would be a protest against what the majority then considered an injustice, and the argument, therefore, falls completely to the ground. If it be contended that the recording of a protest might be considered as an insult to the Chair, I remind hon. Members that it would be competent to the House to expunge the protest. The House of Lords has frequently ordered certain protests, condemned by the Regulations of the House, to be expunged, either wholly or in part. If, therefore, anything were recorded on the Journals of the House which was considered as a reflection on the Chair, it would be very easy to order a correction of the protest recorded. I think these are reasons why the Amendment of my hon. Friend should be accepted. We are supported by most excellent precedents, and by the very high authority of persons who have made the practice of Parliament their special study. Under the circumstances, I urge upon the right hon. Gentleman that he should accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend, always bearing in mind that it is identical with that which he himself proposed to the Closure Rule in 1882.

Mr. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): The right hon. Gentleman advocates the closure on the ground that the time of the House will thereby be economized; but surely, if our tongues be silenced, our pens need not be paralyzed. There can be no reason why we should not record our protest, when we believe that the closure of debate is premature. The proposal precludes the idea of objection, for the recording of our protest could be the cause of no waste of time. The privilege for which we are arguing is analogous to the right existing in the House of Lords, or, rather, it cannot go so far; because I understand that in the House of Lords an individual may protest on any subject, while in the Irish House of Lords the right is carried even further. Then Peers were allowed to protest even by proxy. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to yield this point, which is identical with his own proposal in 1882. I am certain that if he does not do so it will be a great disappointment to Members both sides of the House. What we want for is that the Government should give us the greatest alleviation of the Rule which can be conceded now by allowing us to record our protest on the Journals of the House. The protests of the House of Lords are of great historical value, as evidencing the current of contemporaneous opinion on leading public events. Professor Thorold Rogers, who was for some years a Member of the House, has collected these protests in a work which is a valuable monument to historic research. In his preface written in 1875, he speaks unconsciously of warning when he says—"tongue-tied Parliament is a contradiction in terms." The House of Commons were urged to claim the privilege of protesting on the occasion of the Great Remonstrance in the time of Charles I. That privilege was not then exercised in the interests of public liberty owing to the power of the Crown. It is now claimed in defence of public liberty which demands the utmost publicity of all proceedings in this House. It can be attacked on the ground of novelty. The publication of Division Lists, which commenced in the House of Commons as late as 1836, and in the House of Lords as late as 1853, might thus be impugned.

Mr. T. P. GILL (Louth, S.): I am glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House in his place because I am anxious to see how he answers the arguments which he has used in 1882 in support of the Amendment, which we are now asking him to adopt. It will be, I think, very interesting to hear on what grounds the his Gentleman now considers unwise at which he considered so wise and necessary in 1882, as to compel him to give it as an Amendment to the Rules of Procedure which were then brought forward. Various reasons have been given for accepting this Amendment, and it will puzzle an ordinary intelligence to know on what ground it is now rejected by the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke against the Amendment (Sir John Gorst) hardly gave any reason at all, except that the times have changed, and we have changed with them; but I am sure the Leader of the House has too much respect for the gravity of hon. Members to base his refusal to accept the Amendment on that ground; and, therefore, I trust that he will consider the House to be worthy of receiving an explanation of his altered position. It must be remembered the Motion for the closure cannot be debated, so that there may be a very large section of the House who differ from the Motion, and who may have very good reasons against it, which, if they were allowed to lay them before the House, would possibly change its decision, or, at any rate, reasons which would justify the veto of those who are opposed to the closure; and it would be an explanation to the country and their constituents of their action as to what might otherwise appear to be the evident sense of the House. Although they oppose the Vote they dare not speak—they will be absolutely tongue-tied when the closure is applied. Now, hon. Members may have very strong reasons indeed why they should wish it to be known that they opposed the closure, and there may be also very strong reasons why they should wish their protest to be publicly recorded. The mere fact that the Motion for the closure is to go to the Division without Amendment or debate ought alone to be sufficient to secure the Members of the House the privilege of stating their views, and laying them before their constituents. Protests on the Journal of the House have a very great political and historical significance, and, besides, the protest we desire to make would in no way hamper the operation of the Closure Rule, or interfere with the dignity of the House. While simply providing that the opposers of the closure should be able to state their reasons, it will have no effect upon the closing of debate. That being the case, I think the right hon. Gentleman ought to have a very grave reason why an Amendment so harmless and so proper should not be agreed to. We have no attempt at a serious debate on the Amendment; and, in view of its importance, I hope we shall hear from the right hon. Gentleman some cogent reasons for its rejection.

Mr. M. J. Kenny

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): I think we, on this side of the House, have great reason to complain of the action of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, and to contrast with it the statement of his intentions which he made at the opening of the discussion on these Rules. In his opening statement he said he was not pledged to the form of the Rules, and that he would look with a view to their adoption, if salutary, upon all Amendments which might come from any part of the House. But I have observed that the right hon. Gentleman has not, in any single instance, made a concession of importance to Members on these Benches, unless it was backed up by Members in other parts of the House. Now, I say that that is not carrying out the pledge which the right hon. Gentleman gave, and it is not treating us with that fairness and courtesy which I am sure he would like to be extended to himself. The principal part of the discussion on this Rule has now terminated, and the right hon. Gentleman is not asked to make any modification of the Rule, but simply to allow us the privilege of doing what he himself wanted to do in 1882, and the refusal of the right hon. Gentleman seems to me to be carrying inconsistency very far indeed. I can understand a change of front when anything is to be gained by it; I can understand a change of front when there is a real change of time and circumstance; but I cannot understand anyone occupying the position of the right hon. Gentleman refusing a concession of this kind, which he knows cannot materially interfere with anything which the House has determined to do. We do not ask the power of preventing the closure in any way whatever; we simply ask that, on the following day, when our minds are calm and our tempers are no longer pulse of the moment, we may have the opportunity of recording our protest on the Journals of the House against the decision of the majority. Was ever a more moderate proposal than that in the interest of a minority made in this House? I can understand the right hon. Gentleman saying that he ought to have a week for consideration; I can understand him saying that we propose too small a number of Members, and that it ought to be 20 or 30; but we are met with a blank refusal, and that, I say, is not acting at all in the spirit by which the right hon. Gentleman, at the commencement of these discussions, said he should be guided with regard to Amendments. There is no doubt that if the closure is exercised prematurely and severely, there will be an injured feeling on the part of the minority on this side of the House, and that injured feeling we may be certain will find a vent for itself in some form or other. Now, I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman and the Government as to whether it is not better that this resentment should find expression in a silent vote, than in proceedings which might be embarrassing to the majority? Surely, if this right of protest will have the effect of calming the minds of the minority, instead of affording an opportunity for confusion being introduced into the proceedings of the House, as was said by the right hon. Gentleman who spoke against the Amendment on behalf of the Government, it will import into them the true principle of harmony and goodwill as between the various sections of the House. I will only say, in conclusion, that if the right hon. Gentleman and his supporters do not yield on this point, he has not kept to the undertaking which he solemnly gave when he introduced the Rule to the House.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 60; Noes 281: Majority 221.—(Div. List, No. 68.)

Mr. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): In the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) I rise to propose the Amendment next standing in his name—namely, that it shall be provided that in any Division the vote shall be taken by secret ballot. This proposal is by no means unprecedented. We had, in the case of the last Amendment, the authority of one of the most distinguished Members of the Party now sitting on the Treasury Bench. This Amendment is in the spissima verba of the proposal made by the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Lord John Manners) in 1882. Although we have almost ceased to hope that the Government will accept any Amendment that is proposed by the Opposition, I venture to submit this to the Leader of the House, in the hope that he will view it with favour. We all recognize the great authority of the present Chancellor of the Duchy on questions connected with the Procedure of the House; next to the Prime Minister there is no one who can speak with the same authority; because, as he himself has reminded us during the progress of these discussions, he has sat in the House for 40 years. The noble Lord, in 1882, referred at great length to the reasons which prompted him to introduce this Amendment. Amongst them I find he stated that during the debates Members in various parts of the House apprehended undue influence and intimidation in carrying the Closure Rule; and that, if it were so carried, it was reasonable to suppose that it would be applied under similar conditions; and he cited a letter written by a Member to one of his constituents to the effect that a well-known Radical Member had said that he was going to vote for the closure, and that he had no more power to vote against it than he had to refuse his purse to a man who held a revolver at his head. The noble Lord was followed by the late Mr. Schreiber, the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), and the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), all of whom supported the Amendment. I believe the discussion was continued for a considerable time. The Amendment was rejected, in spite of the protest of the Members of the Irish Party and a few independent Radicals; but the majority against it was very narrow. The opposition to the present proposal of the Government is quite different from the opposition offered to the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), which extended over many months, whereas the present opposition has been confined to days. There should be no objection in the country to this proposal to vote by ballot. We know that a Party man votes as a Party man, and not as a person recording his own opinions; anyone who has heard the Whips directing Members on which side to vote will know that Members do not care for anything but the interest of their Party in the Division. ["No, no!"] I cannot understand that any Members would have the hardihood to deny that they are frequently unacquainted with the merits of the questions on which they vote. I remember that, when the closure was applied in this House, the Liberal Whips had to use the utmost pressure to get a sufficient number of Members to carry it, and they barely succeeded in doing it, for the majority in favour of it was only 7. I say that Members are liable at any time to unfair pressure; they are liable to the innuendoes of their Party in respect of the votes they are about to give; and it is for this reason that we have submitted this Amendment to the House. We are acting on good authority in this; for we have on our side all the Members on the Treasury Bench, every one of whom, in 1882, supported the proposal we are making.

Mr. W. A. Macdonald

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question, to add the words "Provided also, That in any such Division the votes shall be taken by secret ballot."—(Mr. M. J. Kenny.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. Smith) (Strand, Westminster): I am not now prepared to justify, in respect of this Rule, every proposal that was made with regard to the Rules formerly introduced. I should regard it as an ill day for Parliament when Members of this House, instead of recording their names openly on the Division Lists, think it necessary to seek the protection of the ballot. I cannot accept the proposal of the hon. Member, and I trust I shall be excused for refraining to make a long speech on the subject.

Mr. T. P. Gill (Louth, S.): The main argument against vote by ballot was that Englishmen should not be afraid to record their votes openly. But the Ballot Act was considered a most beneficial change in the law; and I think this Amendment, which was proposed in 1882, did honour to the head and spirit of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who is a Tory of the old school and steeped in all its prejudices. I venture to say that a great number of hon. Gentlemen in the last Division did not know what they were voting about. Two hon. Gentlemen stood at the door, who said "No" to Members as they came in, and they went into the "No" Lobby like sheep into a sheep-pen; and, besides that class of voters, there are others who feel that they are compelled, by the exigencies of Party and Party intimidation, to vote against what probably are their opinions as to the question before them. But there are other Members whose minds were open to argument, who were convinced by the arguments used on this side of the House, and who felt that there was right, reason, and justice on the side of the Amendment, and who, if they were not under the watchful eye of the Whips, would have voted for Amendments which they dare not support, owing to the intimidation which is exercised by the Chiefs of their Party. What is the meaning of the word Parliament? It means a place in which talking goes on. What, then, will be the position of Members of the House of Commons when this right is taken away? [Cries of "Order!"] I can see there are a large number of Members in this House who have degenerated so far already.

MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Member to speak more relevantly to the subject in hand.

Mr. T. P. Gill: I should be glad to do so; but I was induced by the interruption—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I have asked the hon. Gentleman to speak more relevantly to the Question.

Mr. T. P. Gill: I was only explaining—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Mr. T. P. Gill: Then I adduce these reasons in favour of this Amendment—that upon a question of this kind many hon. Members would like to resist the adoption of a Clôture Rule, but are compelled, by the exigencies of Party arrangements in this House, to vote for the Resolution. The Amendment, if adopted, would provide the same protection for Members in this House as is provided for voters at the polling booth at Parliamentary Elections. I only hope that, as an example of the independence which ought to characterize Members of this House, and which hon. Members claim in supporting this Resolution, that those who voted for the Amendment when it was last before the House will vote for it now in spite of the Government Whips.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I hope hon. Members will not be misled by the suggestion of the hon. Member who has just sat down, and lose sight of the difference between the proposal now made and a simple vote at the election of a Member of Parliament. I was a supporter of the ballot when originally proposed in this House; but I am entirely opposed to the present proposition, because Members come here in a representative capacity, and their constituents have a right to know how they vote. There is this difference between voting for a Member of Parliament and a Member of Parliament voting in this House—that it is necessary, in order to keep the elector beyond the reach of improper influences, that he should vote secretly; but that it is equally necessary that the Member of Parliament should vote openly, in order that those he represents may know the action he is taking.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I would submit to the House that there is a vast difference between an ordinary vote given in this House and the vote of a Member upon a question of clôture, so far as that Member's constituents are concerned. In the case of an ordinary vote upon a matter of legislation or national policy, a Member's constituents can form some opinion as to how he should vote; but it is absolutely impossible for them to know the rights and wrongs of a question of clôture. No one can be better called upon to say whether or not it is right to close a particular debate than those who have sat and listened to that debate; and to say that our constituents are in a position to form an opinion upon such matters—to say that a debate ought not to have been closed when it has been closed, or ought to have been closed when it has not been closed—is simply preposterous. Our constituents have a right to judge our action on great questions of public policy; but when we come to deal with a question of closing debate, I submit that no one has a right to form an opinion as to the expediency of the clôture, and no one has a right to exercise pressure upon Members who has not sat and listened to the debate. If this Amendment is carried to a Division I shall support it, although I admit that the question is not one upon which I take a very strong view. The vagaries of Party Leadership in this House are the most extraordinary one could possibly conceive. We have heard the Leader of the House solemnly declaring that he cannot see his way to support this Amendment. Well, will hon. Gentlemen believe me when I say that on Monday, the 6th of December, 1882, there was found voting for an Amendment in terms precisely similar to those of the Amendment before the House “the Right Hon. William Henry Smith?” The Amendment proposed on the 6th of December, 1882, was—

“To add the words, ‘Provided also, That in any such Division the vote shall be taken by secret ballot.’”

That was proposed by “the Right Hon. Lord John Manners;” and that Amendment was supported, on a Division, by 55 Members, amongst whom I find Mr. Edward Stanhope, the Right Hon. Alexander Beresford Hope, Sir Henry T. Holland, Mr. Gorst, the Right Hon. Edward Gibson, Mr. Arthur J. Balfour, and Mr. Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett. I cannot understand how it is that these hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, having succeeded in making us converts to their views by the eloquent speeches they made on that occasion and by the votes they gave, can now, having got into Office, and having a majority at their back, and the opportunity of carrying out the principles for which they eloquently pleaded in 1882, and for opposing which they denounced the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) in unmeasured terms—I say I do not understand how these Gentlemen can now refuse to accept the proposal of my hon. Friend. I am at a loss to make out how they can accuse us of proposing unreasonable Amendments when we are simply bringing forward proposals which, as I have shown, were made by them, and debated at considerable length. The noble Lord (Lord John Manners), in introducing this Amendment in 1882, spoke for about an hour; a long debate ensued, and the Amendment was supported by the full force of the official

Members of the Conservative Party. The effect of the course followed by the Government upon the minds of us independent Members, who never get into Office ourselves, is to convince us that Gentlemen who occupy the Front Treasury Bench really do not vote on principle at all on these matters—that they lay down their rules and their principles in politics exactly as the Party exigencies of the moment require, and that they are prepared to swallow principles with the greatest celerity, notwithstanding that they have made most eloquent appeals on behalf of them only a few months before. As I said before, this is not a matter upon which I entertain a strong opinion; but I do say, in reply to the hon. Member opposite, that questions of Procedure in this House, such as the closure of debate, are matters that our constituents take no interest in, and upon which they are not entitled to exercise influence upon us. I maintain that it is desirable to protect Members from the influence of those in Office. The spirit of fair play which ordinarily exists amongst individual Members of this House is frequently—as we have too good reason to know—is frequently overruled when, at a late hour of night, the temper of Parties is aroused. Men do not like to set themselves against the whole bulk of their Party. If this Amendment goes to a Division I shall certainly support it.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. SPEAKER: The remaining Amendments on the Paper are out of Order; therefore I shall now put the Main Question.

Main Question, as amended, again proposed.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask if you consider my Amendment out of Order?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes; I have ruled it out of Order.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): I believe, Sir, that a debate would now be in Order on the Main Question you have just proposed, following the precedent set by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House in 1882. In that year the Main Question was debated for four whole nights, after the Amendments on the Paper had been disposed of, making 19 nights which had been consumed by the Tory Party in the discussion of a Rule of a much less drastic character than that now before us. That was 19 nights as opposed to 14 which have been occupied by the discussion of the present Rule. However, I do not intend to follow the bad example set by the right hon. Gentleman and his Party on that occasion, and I shall content myself with taking a Division against the Question you have proposed from the Chair.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 262; Noes 41: Majority 221.

AYES.

Acland, C. T. D.	Campbell, R. F. F.
Addison, J. E. W.	Channing, F. A.
Agg-Gardner, J. T.	Chaplin, right hon. H.
Allison, R. A.	Charrington, S.
Ambrose, W.	Clarke, Sir E. G.
Amherst, W. A. T.	Cochrane-Baillie, hon.
Anstruther, Colonel R.	C. W. A. N.
H. L.	Coddington, W.
Anstruther, H. T.	Coghill, D. H.
Asher, A.	Colomb, Capt. J. C. R.
Ashmead-Bartlett, E.	Commerell, Adml. Sir
Asquith, H. H.	J. E.
Baden-Powell, G. S.	Cotton, Capt. E. T. D.
Baggallay, E.	Courtney, L. H.
Bailey, Sir J. R.	Cranborne, Viscount
Baird, J. G. A.	Cross, H. S.
Balfour, G. W.	Crossman, Gen. Sir W.
Barry, A. H. Smith-	Curzon, Viscount
Bartley, G. C. T.	Curzon, hon. G. N.
Bates, Sir E.	Davenport, H. T.
Baumann, A. A.	Davenport, W. B.
Beach, W. W. B.	Dawney, Colonel hon.
Bective, Earl of	L. P.
Bentinck, rt. hn. G. C.	De Cobain, E. S. W.
Bentinck, Lord H. C.	De Lisle, E. J. L. M.
Beresford, Lord C. W.	P.
De la Poer	De Worms, Baron H.
Bethell, Commander G.	Dimisdale, Baron R.
R.	Dodds, J.
Biddulph, M.	Dugdale, J. S.
Bigwood, J.	Dyke, rt. hn. Sir W.
Birkbeck, Sir E.	H.
Blundell, Col. H. B. H.	Ebrington, Viscount
Bond, G. H.	Egerton, hon. A. de T.
Bonsor, H. C. O.	Elcho, Lord
Boord, T. W.	Elliot, hon. A. R. D.
Borthwick, Sir A.	Elliot, hon. H. F. H.
Bridgeman, Col. hon.	Elliot, G. W.
F. C.	Ellis, Sir J. W.
Bristowe, T. L.	Elton, C. I.
Brodrick, hon. W. St.	Evelyn, W. J.
J. F.	Ewart, W.
Bruce, Lord H.	Ewing, Sir A. O.
Buchanan, T. R.	Eyre, Colonel H.
Burdett-Coutts, W. L.	Feilden, Lieut.-Gen.
Ash-B.	R. J.
Burghley, Lord	Fellowes, W. H.
Buxton, S. Q.	Ferguson, right hon.
Caine, W. S.	Sir J.
Caldwell, J.	Field, Admiral E.
Campbell, Sir A.	Finch, G. H.

[Fourteenth Night.]

Finch-Hatton, hon. M. E. G.
 Fisher, W. H.
 Flower, C.
 Folkestone, right hon. Viscount
 Forwood, A. B.
 Fowler, Sir R. N.
 Fraser, General O. C.
 Fry, L.
 Fulton, J. F.
 Gaskell, C. G. Milnes-
 Gathorne-Hardy, hon. A. E.
 Gent-Davis, R.
 Gibson, J. G.
 Giles, A.
 Gilliat, J. S.
 Godson, A. F.
 Goldaworthy, Major-General W. T.
 Gorst, Sir J. E.
 Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
 Gray, C. W.
 Grey, Sir E.
 Grimston, Viscount
 Grotrian, F. B.
 Hall, C.
 Halsey, T. F.
 Hamilton, right hon. Lord G. F.
 Hamley, Gen. Sir E. B.
 Harcastle, F.
 Hartington, Marq. of Havelock - Allan, Sir H. M.
 Hayne, C. Seale-
 Heathcote, Capt. J. H. Edwards-
 Heaton, J. H.
 Hermon-Hodge, R. T.
 Hill, right hon. Lord A. W.
 Hill, Colonel E. S.
 Hoare, S.
 Hobhouse, H.
 Holland, rt. hon. Sir H. T.
 Houldsworth, W. H.
 Howorth, H. H.
 Hozier, J. H. C.
 Hubbard, E.
 Hughes-Hallett, Col. F. C.
 Hunt, F. S.
 Hunter, Sir W. G.
 Isaacson, F. W.
 Jackson, W. L.
 James, C. H.
 Jarvis, A. W.
 Jennings, L. J.
 Johnston, W.
 Joicey, J.
 Kelly, J. R.
 Kennaway, Sir J. H.
 Kenyon, hon. G. T.
 Kerans, F. H.
 Kimber, H.
 King, H. S.
 King-Harman, Colonel E. R.
 Lacaita, C. C.

Lafone, A.
 Laurie, Colonel R. P.
 Lawrance, J. C.
 Lawrence, Sir J. J. T.
 Lawrence, W. F.
 Lea, T.
 Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.
 Lees, E.
 Llewellyn, E. H.
 Long, W. H.
 Low, M.
 Lowther, J. W.
 Lyell, L.
 Lymington, Viscount
 Macartney, W. G. E.
 Macdonald, right hon. J. H. A.
 MacInnes, M.
 Maclean, F. W.
 Maclean, J. M.
 Macleure, J. W.
 M'Calmont, Captain J.
 M'Lagan, P.
 Malcolm, Col. J. W.
 Mallock, R.
 Marjoribanks, rt. hon. E.
 Marriott, rt. hn. W. T.
 Maskelyne, M. H. N.
 Story-
 Matthews, rt. hon. H.
 Maxwell, Sir H. E.
 Mayne, Admiral R. C.
 Mildmay, F. B.
 Mills, hon. C. W.
 More, R. J.
 Morgan, hon. F.
 Morley, A.
 Mount, W. G.
 Mowbray, R. G. C.
 Mulholland, H. L.
 Muntz, P. A.
 Murdoch, C. T.
 Noble, W.
 Northcote, hon. H. S.
 Norton, R.
 O'Neill, hon. R. T.
 Parker, O. S.
 Parker, hon. F.
 Pease, A. E.
 Pelly, Sir L.
 Pitt-Lewis, G.
 Plunket, right hon. D. R.
 Plunkett, hon. J. W.
 Pomfret, W. P.
 Powell, F. S.
 Quilter, W. C.
 Raikes, rt. hon. H. C.
 Rankin, J.
 Raach, Major F. C.
 Reed, H. B.
 Ritchie, rt. hon. O. T.
 Roberts, J. B.
 Robertson, E.
 Robertson, J. P. B.
 Robinson, B.
 Russell, T. W.
 Salt, T.
 Sanderson, Col. E. J.
 Schlater - Booth, right hon. G.
 Seton-Karr, H.

Shaw-Stewart, M. H.
 Shirley, W. S.
 Sidebotham, J. W.
 Sidebottom, T. H.
 Sidebottom, W.
 Smith, rt. hon. W. H.
 Smith, A.
 Spencer, J. E.
 Stanhope, rt. hon. E.
 Stanley, E. J.
 Stevenson, F. S.
 Stevenson, J. C.
 Stewart, M.
 Sykes, C.
 Talbot, J. G.
 Tapling, T. K.
 Taylor, F.
 Temple, Sir R.
 Thorburn, W.
 Tollemache, H. J.
 Tomlinson, W. E. M.
 Tottenham, A. L.
 Townsend, F.
 Trotter, H. J.

Vernon, hon. G. R.
 Vincent, O. E. H.
 Walsh, hon. A. H. J.
 Watson, J.
 Webster, Sir R. E.
 Webster, R. G.
 West, Colonel W. O.
 Weymouth, Viscount
 White, J. B.
 Whitley, E.
 Whitmore, C. A.
 Will, J. S.
 Winn, hon. R.
 Winterbotham, A. B.
 Wodehouse, E. R.
 Wood, N.
 Wortley, C. B. Stuart-
 Wright, H. S.
 Wroughton, P.
 Young, C. E. B.

TELLERS.

Douglas, A. Akers-
 Walrond, Col. W. R.

NOES.

M'Cartan, M.
 M'Donald, P.
 M'Kenna, Sir J. N.
 Nolan, Colonel J. P.
 Nolan, J.
 O'Brien, J. F. X.
 O'Brien, P.
 O'Brien, P. J.
 O'Doherty, J. E.
 O'Kelly, J.
 Parnell, C. S.
 Quinn, T.
 Stack, J.
 Stanhope, hon. P. J.
 Sullivan, D.
 Tanner, C. K.
 Tuite, J.
 Wallace, R.

TELLERS.

Rodmond, J. E.
 Sheil, E.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I now move that this Rule be made a Standing Order of the House; and, in doing so, I have to express my own very great satisfaction that the Rule has been adopted by such an enormous majority of the House—a Rule which does not represent the views of only one section, or of two sections, of the House, but of the great majority of the House. I am sure it will receive the cordial and loyal acceptance of the whole country. I move that it be made a Standing Order.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this Resolution be a Standing Order of the House."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

MR. PARNELL (Cork): Certainly, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) is thankful for small mercies. When he speaks of the enormous majority by which his Rule has been passed, he must recollect that he has not succeeded in getting anything like one-half of the House of Commons to vote in support of it. I hope that this day two years, or even this day twelve months, the right hon. Gentleman and his Party will be as pleased with the Rule as they seem to be now. My object in rising was not, however, to follow the right hon. Gentleman in his remarks, but to suggest that this would, perhaps, be a favourable time for the Leader of the House to take the House into his confidence as to his intentions with regard to the remaining Rules of Procedure. I should like to know whether he intends to proceed with the remaining Rules or not? It would also be convenient to many hon. Members to know what Business the Government propose to take on Tuesday, the day upon which, in the ordinary course, the consideration of the Rules will be resumed.

MR. SPEAKER: The Question before the House is, whether this Resolution should be a Standing, or a Sessional Order. I do not think a general debate can take place upon a mere question of time.

MR. PARNELL: I merely wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman what he intends to do with regard to the remainder of the Rules. If you think it will be more in Order to ask such a Question upon the formal Motion that the House do adjourn I will put it then.

MR. SPEAKER: It would be more regular to defer the Question until then.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this Resolution be a Standing Order of the House.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

ARMY ANNUAL BILL.

Resolutions [17th March] reported, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Resolution which, upon the 15th day of this instant March, was reported from the Committee of Supply, and which was then agreed to by the House, be now read, and the same was read, as followeth:—

"That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 149,391, all ranks, be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland at Home and Abroad, excluding Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, during the year ending on 31st day of March 1888."

Ordered, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide, during Twelve Months, for the Discipline and Regulation of the Army; and that Mr. Secretary Stanhope, Lord George Hamilton, and The Judge Advocate General do prepare and bring it in.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 202.]

MOTIONS.

WATERWORKS VALUATION AND RATING (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Edmund Robertson, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Valuation and Rating of Waterworks belonging to local authorities in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Edmund Robertson, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Sutherland, Mr. Barbour, and Mr. Hugh Elliot.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 203.]

PARLIAMENT — ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): In answer to the appeal made to me by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Parnell), I have to say it is my intention to proceed with the other Rules of Procedure, and that on Monday, at half-past 4, I will state what Business will be taken on Tuesday.

Question put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at twenty minutes after One o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 21st March, 1887.

MINUTES.] — PUBLIC BILL — Committee — Electric Lighting Act (1882) Amendment (10-49).

INDIA—THE QUEEN'S JUBILEE CELEBRATION—RELEASE OF PRISONERS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he will recommend for the release of prisoners to celebrate the Jubilee those prisoners who are under sentences for life and other heavy sentences for trifling thefts, and who had been subject to previous convictions; a list of which sentences was published in The Madras Mail of 12th September, 1884; and whether he will recommend the amendment of Section 75 of the Indian Penal Code by the insertion of the words "or any shorter time" after the words "transportation for life?" said, that he had put down the Notice on behalf of some prisoners; because, while they seemed fit and safe subjects for the exercise of Her Majesty's clemency, some of them who were in the Andaman Islands were so far from the seat of government that they might be easily overlooked. The noble Earl (the Earl of Derby), who had brought the question a short time ago before the House, objected that the prisoners to be released either had undergone sufficient punishment, in which case they ought to be released, whether there was a Jubilee or not; or, if they had not had sufficient punishment, it was not expedient to release them in order to give more éclat to a public celebration. Now, there were 10 prisoners sentenced for life in the list published by The Madras Mail, for very petty thefts, owing to a defect in Section 75 of the Penal Code, which, unlike another section of that Code, left no discretion to the Judge. The Madras Mail list also gave a description of 177 sentences between 1876 and 1884, which were very heavy sentences for petty thefts. Many of these sentences would now have expired; but the remaining portion, he thought, would be fit subjects for receiving the benefit of Her Majesty's gracious intentions on the occasion of the Jubilee. A leading article in The Madras Mail, commenting on these sentences, left no doubt as to the general opinion that the sentences for life were unjust, and that it was inexpedient to punish pickpockets more severely than burglars, and that the other sentences, though not so exaggerated, were also too heavy for such petty offences. One of those sentenced to penal servitude for life, named Alfred Lees, received his sentence on a second conviction for a petty theft in a shop. The Madras Mail was one of the best-conducted English newspapers published in India, and the editor, Mr. Lawson, had printed the list of sentences with the view to assisting in obtaining the amendment of Section 75 of the Penal Code. In 1884, he (Lord Stanley of Alderley) had asked the then Secretary of State for India, if he would recommend the amendment of the section, so as to leave the Judges some discretion, and he now repeated the Question, and hoped that his noble Friend the Secretary of State for India, with his experience at Quarter Sessions, would endeavour to remove the anomaly of punishing pickpockets more severely than burglars. As to the other sentences, he differed entirely from the noble Earl's (the Earl of Derby) theory that the Jubilee had nothing to do with the release of prisoners. It was quite a matter of opinion, in the case of a heavy sentence, whether it was enough, or too much, or too little; and if no part of a sentence was remitted, what became of the exercise of the Royal clemency? The Calcutta Statesman of February 19 announced that prisoners had been judiciously and extensively released in that city; but it had been done so privately that the editor had not been able to ascertain even the approximate number of those released. For his part, he thought that the prisoners had better have been released at midday in the most public manner. The noble Lord concluded by asking the Question of which he had given Notice.

Lord Stanley of Alderley

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): The celebration of the Jubilee in India is now over, and all the remissions of sentences which the Viceroy, after careful consideration and consultation with the local authorities, thought it advisable to grant, in honour of the occasion, took effect nearly a month ago. The cases to which the noble Lord refers can, therefore, only be dealt with in the ordinary way upon their merits, and, that being so, it does not appear to me that there is any reason why I should take the very unusual course of interfering with the discretion of the constituted authorities in a matter of this kind. The last part of the Question of the noble Lord is to be dealt with by the Government of India, to whom the whole Question will be sent.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING ACT (1882)
AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord Thurlow.)

(NO. 10.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN (for Lord Houghton), in rising to move the insertion of a new clause before Clause 1, said, that the object of the clause was to recognize the interests which local authorities had in such matters. As the law now stood, when a Provisional Order was sought by a Company, they did not necessarily apply for the consent of the local authority, but went direct to the Board of Trade. It was true, however, that the Board of Trade took the opinion of the local authority, and there were then ample means of stating objections. The change which was proposed was that, in the first instance, the Company should go to the local authority and ask for their consent, and if that consent was refused, the Company had power to appeal to the Board of Trade against the decision of the local authority. The local authority would thus have a veto, which, however, the Board of Trade might override.

Moved, to insert the following new clause before Clause 1 :—

"Notwithstanding anything in the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, no Provisional Order authorising the supply of electricity by any undertakers within the district of any local authority shall be granted by the Board of Trade except with the consent of such local authority, unless the Board of Trade, in any case in which the consent of such local authority is refused, are of opinion that, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, such consent ought to be dispensed with, and in such case they shall make a special report, stating the grounds upon which they have dispensed with such consent."
—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

LORD THURLOW said, he had no objection whatever to the new clause which had been proposed by the noble Earl, as it was an accidental omission in the Bill.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord Stanley of Preston) said, the Government had left the subject in the hands of his noble Friend (Lord Thurlow), who had shown so much interest in the matter, because they thought it would be more courteous so to do. The measure was the outcome of the Committee of last year, and, in fact, was similar to it, and the Government were prepared to support it, provided this and similar Amendments were accepted.

Motion agreed to; Clause ordered to be added to the Bill.

Clause 1 (Amendment of s. 27 of Electric Lighting Act, 1882. Purchase of undertaking by local authority).

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he had an Amendment in page 1, lines 22 and 23, which raised a question of principle. The Bill, as it stood, proposed that the period during which Electric Lighting Companies should enjoy the fruits of their enterprise should be extended from 21 to 42 years, and, in addition, it was provided that at the expiration of that period any Local Authority was to be at liberty to purchase the undertaking upon the terms of paying the then market value of the goodwill of the undertaking. He objected to such legislation, for it appeared to him that this offered Electric Lighting Companies a greater privilege than was necessary or desirable in the interests of the public. If, after the period of 42 years, Local Authorities had to pay for the goodwill of these undertakings, their purchase would become impossible. Not only would a monopoly be created, but it would be a perpetual monopoly, just as the terms on which gas and water undertakings could now be acquired were so exorbitant that their purchase was impossible. It would be quite sufficient to allow the Company a monopoly of 42 years, and then to pay for their plant, but not their goodwill. He would move, therefore, that the words relating to the goodwill should be struck out. It was true the Act of 1882 gave only 21 years, and that term had not been sufficient to induce persons to invest their capital in Electric Lighting Companies, hence the Select Committee enlarged the term to 42 years; but it did not insert the power to a Company to exact a sum for goodwill when it sold the undertaking. He thought it was necessary, on behalf of the public, to omit these words, as the term of 42 years would be sufficient to enable a Company to recoup itself; and he might point out that in Clause 2 the Board of Trade would have power to vary the terms of purchase, which would be sufficient protection to a Company.

Amendment moved, in page 1, lines 22 and 23, to leave out ("of the goodwill of the business of the undertaking, and")—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

LORD THURLOW regretted that he could not accept the Amendment. He felt that both his noble Friend and himself were of the same mind and working for the same end—trying to create a new industry, and to prevent the creation of a new monopoly; and he thought that the clause, as it stood, would effect that better than if the words were struck out. He could not see why Electric Lighting Companies should be put upon a worse footing than other undertakings. He was convinced that the provision in the Bill was necessary for the encouragement of that new industry, and he believed there were no other alternatives to it, but either to grant provisional orders for such a prolonged term as might enable undertakers to recoup themselves without charging a prohibitive rate, or to provide liberal purchase conditions at the expiry of a shorter period. He greatly preferred the latter alternative as flavouring least of a monopoly, and should feel bound to take the sense of the House on the Amendment.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he wished to endorse what had fallen from the noble Lord who had last spoken. Under the Act of 1882 Electric Lighting Companies had not succeeded, because the term of years offered—namely, 21, was too short to induce capitalists to invest their money in them with a reasonable prospect of advantage. He was, therefore, glad that a revulsion of public feeling had taken place in the matter, and that a longer term of years was now to be accorded to undertakers of electric lighting. He did not either think it unjust that the Companies should be paid for the value of their goodwill, and should therefore oppose the Amendment. He hoped that the words proposed to be inserted by the noble Earl opposite would not be agreed to. It was obvious that the Bill would not pass in the other House that Session; therefore if the Government would undertake to introduce, at some future time, a satisfactory measure dealing with this subject, he thought that the noble Lord (Lord Thurlow) would do well to wait and to be content with such an assurance, instead of pressing forward a Bill which could not get beyond that House during the present Session.

LORD BALFOUR said, he did not think that the Electric Lighting Companies could demand to be placed upon the same footing as the existing Gas and Water Companies. When the Gas and Water Companies were dealt with, the public did not make the best bargain with them; but that was no reason why they should now make the same mistake in dealing with the electric light. In his opinion, the Electric Lighting Companies ought to be glad to get such a Bill as this; if they waited for what they might deem to be a more perfect measure, they would run the risk of not getting a Bill at all. He trusted their Lordships would pass the Bill in the same shape as nearly as possible as it was passed by the Select Committee. He should be glad to see the words referred to in the Amendment struck out.

LORD BRAMWELL said, that, on the other hand, he trusted that their Lordships would not agree to the Amendment. He thought that the local Authorities were allowed to acquire Water or Gas undertakings the better it would be for the community at large. But supposing they were to do so, what was the substance of this controversy? It was this—capitalists said that they would provide the necessary capital for carrying out electric schemes, if the Legislature would give them time to obtain a reasonable amount of profit upon their undertaking; and that if such undertaking resulted in a profit, instead of a loss, they were to receive compensation for the risk of loss they had run, by being allowed to receive something like the reasonable value of their undertaking. The suggestion of the other side was, that the capitalists were to run all the risk of loss; and that, when their undertaking had become a success, they were to receive, not its full market value, but merely—he did not say the old iron value—but the value of the plant, less the amount of its depreciation. This was in itself most unreasonable. But it would be attended with this mischievous consequence—As time went on the work would extend, new plant would be required for them to replace the old; and, as the time approached when the Local Board would purchase the undertaking, the undertakers would be desirous to limit their outlay as much as possible. The consequence would be that the renewal of the plant would be scamped, and every effort would be made by the undertakers to lessen the value of that which was about to be taken from them by the Local Authorities. This policy of the Local Authorities was a dog-in-the-manger policy. They said—"We shall not do it ourselves; and you shall not do it except on the terms we are willing to grant, but which you will not accept." Their Lordships should remember that those unreasonable capitalists who desired to make a profit were bound down in such a way that the dividends were limited to 10 per cent, and that when new capital was required, it could be raised only on certain stringent conditions. He also asked their Lordships to bear in mind that not one of the witnesses called before the Committee said that 42 years would give time enough; and if it did, it was open to the objection that it would prevent electric undertakers from doing their best towards the end of the term. He, therefore, asked their Lordships to reject that which he had already said was one of the most unreasonable provisions ever proposed. As to the argument, "Beware of another place," what did that mean? It meant that if their Lordships did right here, others would do wrong "elsewhere," which ought not to be supposed, nor, if supposed, acted on.

Lord Thurlow

LORD LINGEN said, that he agreed with the noble Lord who spoke last but one (Lord Balfour) that they were now dealing not with a case of vested interests already created, but one in which a new bargain was to be made, in which the interests of all parties could be fairly and judicially considered, without reference to the past. The figures brought before the Committee impressed him (Lord Lingen) with the magnitude of the question. The Birmingham Town Council, in 1875, acquired the gas and waterworks of that town, for which they paid £3,500,000. In that payment, £1,500,000 was for goodwill, and was not represented by any works which they acquired. It represented the interest of the shareholders, and what was understood by "a going concern." The decision, therefore, to which their Lordships might come was of very great importance to municipalities. As to municipalities coming forward as Trading Companies, it was to be observed that when monopolies were imported into local jurisdictions by consent, there was very little difficulty in the matter; but it complicated the case when the monopoly might be introduced without the consent of the Local Authority. That made the great difference between the case of towns and that of private persons who wished to have electric lighting introduced into their houses. It should be remembered that the Local Authorities had the interests of the entire community to consider. When these powers were given, it was not only for the lighting of the streets, but of private houses. If very hard bargains were driven with the public on the introduction of those practical monopolies, it was almost certain that, at some time or other, the feeling would be to break through them; and, probably, on much less favourable terms to the Companies than if, on the introduction of the enterprise, the promoters accepted reasonable and proper limitation. He thought a compromise might be effected on the basis of excluding the consideration of the very uncertain matter of future profits.

LORD HERSCHELL said, he was not able to follow his noble and learned Friend (Lord Bramwell) in the view that municipalities, which represented the public, had not a right to make the best terms they could in the public interest, when persons had to come to Parliament to get a monopoly.

LORD BRAMWELL: They have a perfect right to get the possible bargain for the public.

LORD HERSCHELL said, that the Public Authorities were bound to take care that rights were not acquired by Companies which would be injurious to the public. He agreed with the noble and learned Lord that it would be mischievous to pass a measure in such terms as to prohibit the introduction of a system of lighting, or of anything else that would be advantageous to the public. Hence they had to consider those two points—that, on the one hand, the municipalities should be able to make the best terms they could; and, on the other, that Parliament ought not to impose restrictions which would prevent the public from getting an advantage that large numbers of people desired. For his own part, he should much regret any legislation which might have the effect of interfering with the introduction of electric lighting in private houses by those who desired it. As to the question whether the terms of the Bill were sufficient or not to promote the object in view, he thought one circumstance had been somewhat left out of sight. There could be no doubt that a monopoly was practically given to Gas and Water Companies which were first in the field, and simply because there was not room for more than a limited number of gas and water pipes under the public streets; but with electric lighting that would not be the case, because the space that would be occupied by such a system would be so comparatively small as to obviate all difficulties in this respect. He did not know whether, under the Bill, a municipality would be precluded from entering into competition with an Electric Lighting Company for the term of 42 years.

LORD THURLOW: Not so.

LORD HERSCHELL said, that in that case, if the system of electric lighting turned out a success, there would be no difficulty in giving the public a competing scheme, if unreasonable terms were exacted by the Company in existence. That might materially affect the view as to the terms which the promoters of a Company would have a right to ask; it would strengthen their right to ask that the undertaking, when it was acquired, should be taken upon terms which would fairly recoup them for the risks they had incurred. His noble Friend behind him had suggested a course which had been often taken in similar cases, and that was not merely to pay for the plant, machinery, and so on, but to take the average price of the shares for a number of years, and the earnings for a number of years. That would seem to him to be a reasonable course. He believed that municipalities would be conciliated by some such proposal, much more than if the Bill was passed in its present form.

LORD RAYLEIGH said, he objected to the omission of the words in question; and he did so not in the interests of capitalists, but in those of the public. What was now required was to encourage the start of a new industry; and if the words were omitted, it was clear that the terms then offered under the Bill would be insufficient to attract capital. The real point of difference seemed to be which was the safe side to go on. Was it the safe side to put too severe terms in the way of the Companies? This appeared to him to be the unsafe side. There was a general desire to encourage and develop this movement, and it would be a mistake to impose severe terms at the outset. If in the future it were found that there was a great rush of capital, it would be open to Parliament to revise the terms applicable to new undertakings, of which the risk would be much less. Unless they offered reasonable terms in the first instance, it would be impossible for the electric light to get properly under weigh in this country.

LORD GRIMTHORPE said, that he told their Lordships last year that the House of Commons in 1882 disregarded the evidence of all the competent authorities which was brought forward on this subject, and now everybody knew that the result was that the Act of 1882 had proved a complete failure. No other country has such legislation, and every civilized country except this has public electric lighting. By the attempt of the Committee of 1882 to go ahead of all mankind, they had fallen behind all mankind in this matter. The Select Committee of this House last year did the same thing; for he found, on looking over the evidence, that every single engineer and financier of experience who was examined was distinctly of opinion that the Bill, in the form in which the noble Earl opposite (The Earl of Camperdown) put it, would be again a failure. As the matter stood, they had to choose between the opinions and evidence of the most competent electric engineers and scientific men and financiers, on one side, and that of a number of Town Clerks and Aldermen, on the other, exactly the same class who, in 1882, had deprived the Kingdom of the advantages of the electric light, by the terms for which they stipulated. He hoped Parliament would not listen to them again, and repeat the mistake by accepting the Amendment. A great deal had been said about monopoly; but the word was altogether inappropriate to the matter in hand, and the arguments founded upon it were incorrect. There was no more monopoly of Electric Lighting Companies than of bakers. The point at issue simply was practically whether the property was to be sold for what it was worth, or the owners were to be obliged to sell it at a loss. Both parties argued that that was the issue and the effect of excluding or admitting what is called goodwill, though it may not be an accurate term to express the commercial value of a going concern; but it is universally understood. As to Gas and Water Companies, such an obligation as it was sought to impose in this case was never placed upon them, unless the practice had been very recently altered, and he saw no reason for imposing it on Electric Lighting Companies. He strongly supported the clause as it stood. It seemed to him that if this important industry was not to be treated unfairly, the Amendment must be rejected, or we shall be, in five years more, in exactly the position which the Act has brought this country into now.

Lord Herschell

LORD STANLEY OF PRESTON said, he was bound to say, personally, that he supported the Amendment moved by his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Camperdown); but there was a wide and an honest difference of opinion in many quarters with regard to it, and he should be sorry to prejudice in any way the action which any noble Lord might wish to take in this matter. His noble Friend behind him made a kind of appeal to him to say that the Government would bring in a Bill dealing with this subject. He did not think it would be honest on his part to give his noble Friend such a pledge. He had already explained that it was owing to his having been prevented by circumstances from introducing any measure dealing with this question, that he told the noble Lord opposite (Lord Thurlow) that he thought it was advisable that he should proceed with this Bill, and that they should endeavour, as far as they could, to assist in passing it through the House. Therefore, he thought the matter ought not to be postponed, but dealt with at the present time. The question, then, was, whether the Bill would be of the use it was intended to be, if this Amendment were added to it. He could not help thinking that, in this matter, they ought to go step by step. He was bound to a certain extent by negotiations and arrangements which took place consequent upon the Committee of last year; and, standing as he did, therefore, in the position of having to deal with this matter, he was bound to say that he preferred the lesser Amendment instead of taking the larger step. In some way or other, the question of the goodwill might hereafter have to be considered; but he did not feel himself able to accept that at the present time, and, consequently, he must vote against the Amendment of the noble Lord. The extension of time, from 21 to 42 years, was a large concession; and he thought they would do well to leave the goodwill to be dealt with at some future time. He should vote for the Amendment.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, his noble Friend who had just addressed the House spoke for himself alone, and not on behalf of the Government. This was not a matter on which the Government had taken a decided line, and, for his own part, he saw no reason whatever why a public body should get for less money that for which any private person would have to pay a larger sum. Therefore, he should support the Amendment.

THE EARL OF ORAUFORD said, he was sorry to find that the President of the Board of Trade had departed from the generous line indicated by Lord Salisbury, on the second reading of the Bill, as the proper method of treating this question. He was confident, speaking from three years' experience, that the working of an electric lighting undertaking was so difficult, that no Local Authority would have done what had been done by the personal care and attention given to the extension of electric lighting by members of the Companies. In regard to the alleged creation of a new monopoly, he held that there was no monopoly in gas, which had to compete against oil and candles; and electric lighting ought not to be put on any less favourable footing than gas, because it would have to compete with gas, oil, and candles. No monopoly was asked for, excepting that which the Companies could create for themselves by the excellent quality of that which they supplied, and the moderate price they charged for it. As to what had been said about paying for old iron, he acknowledged that there was a difference between buying new machinery and buying the same machinery which had been laid down in the ground for a definite purpose. The proper price to be paid by the purchaser would be the value at the moment, and that would involve a reduction for depreciation from the original cost. But with this must be a sum for the "goodwill," which would fairly represent the trade value of the business, which had been built up by the efforts of the undertakers, and this entirely apart from any question of value of machinery plant and other property.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, he would recommend his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Camperdown) to withdraw the Amendment, for he must see that the feeling of the House was against him. Their Lordships had to answer two questions. The first was, whether they were to deal out to Electric Lighting Companies the same measure of justice they had dealt out to other Companies; and the second was, whether they desired to incite the men of science to drive away from this country the best light in the world?

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, in reply to the various questions which had been asked, said, he held that it would be most unfair that a Local Authority should have the power to compete with an Electric Lighting Company during the 42 years for which a concession had been granted; and he did not believe that a Local Authority would have such a power under the Bill. If the Board of Trade granted a concession to the private Company for 42 years, he apprehended it would refuse a similar concession to any other Company, or to a Local Authority for the same district. How could we know, without trial, that the provisions of the Bill would be prohibitory of electric lighting experiments under the new term of 42 years? On the question of goodwill, he would assent to a compromise, if one could be arranged. He was prepared to accept an Amendment which would pay the value of plant and other things mentioned in the Bill, with a percentage added on account of compulsory purchase. But he was anxious to exclude uncertain calculations and valuations of prospective profits, which would be due to the expansion of a town, and not to the outlay of an Electric Lighting Company. Therefore, he must ask their Lordships to decide on the Amendment.

On Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause?" Their Lordships divided:—Contents 45; Not-Contents 10: Majority 35.

Amendment disagreed to.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that, after their Lordships' decision, he did not think it necessary to proceed with the remaining Amendments on the Paper.

The Earl of Crawford

LORD HERSCHELL said, he did not quite understand why the words about "goodwill" had been introduced. He should have thought that if the undertaking were purchased on the terms of paying the value of the undertaking, that would have covered the whole thing.

LORD BRAMWELL said, he quite thought the word "undertaking" was sufficient.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY) said, he thought that the word was necessary.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Monday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 49.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 21st March, 1887.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—NAVY ESTIMATES, Vote 2; CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES; CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS; CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS; CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE; CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART; CLASS V.—FOREIGN AND COLONIAL SERVICES; CLASS VI.—NON-EFFECTIVE AND CHARITABLE SERVICES; CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS; REVENUE DEPARTMENTS (Vote on Account) £3,624 [100].

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—£1,261,076; £12,078,800, Consolidated Fund. PUBLIC BILLS — Second Reading — Army (Annual)* [202]; Isle of Man (Customs)* [199]; Small Debts (Scotland)* [42]; Pauper Lunatic Asylums (Ireland) (Superannuation)* [62].

Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—Bankruptcy Offices (Sites)* [197].

Third Reading—Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Acts Amendment* [168], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—ALLEGED ILLEGAL ARRESTS—CHARGE AGAINST SERGEANT WHARTON.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, on 9th January, Sergeant Wharton, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, entered the house of a Mr. John M'Nulty, near Loughglynn, and arrested J. M'Nulty and eight other persons whom he found in the house; whether Sergeant Wharton searched J. M'Nulty and took money from his person; whether, on M'Nulty objecting to this treatment, Constable Anderson, who accompanied Sergeant Wharton, drew a revolver and threatened to use it against M'Nulty and the others; whether J. M'Nulty and the others were taken by Sergeant Wharton and his force before the Honourable Charles Ffrench, a brother of Lord de Freyne, whose tenants they were and whose rents they were accused of withholding; whether the entry into the house of Mr. M'Nulty by the band of armed constables, the arrests, the searching of Mr. M'Nulty, and the seizure of his money were each and all made without any warrant; whether proceedings against Mr. M'Nulty have recently been dropped by the Government; and, whether the Government propose in any way to recompense M'Nulty and the others for the treatment they have received?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: John M'Nulty and nine other persons were arrested, as stated in the first paragraph of the Question, without a warrant, on a charge of criminal conspiracy, when actually engaged in collecting money under the Plan of Campaign, which was seized by the sergeant. They were at once brought before Mr. Ffrench, as described in the Question, the nearest, and indeed only, available magistrate. He confined himself, after having taken an information, to ordering the discharge of nine of the accused, and sending M'Nulty's case for investigation to Petty Sessions, offering to accept bail for his appearance thereat. A rescue having been threatened Sergeant Wharton drew his revolver, and cautioned the persons interfering to stand aside; but he used no threats to M'Nulty. M'Nulty and five others were returned for trial from Petty Sessions; and, as I have already stated, in answer to a Question, in the exercise of the discretion I possess I have directed that the proceedings should not be continued by the Crown, but that no recompense will be paid to the accused.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman say whether there was any warrant?

MR. HOLMES: I have already said there was not.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman state who was the magistrate before whom the men were brought?

MR. HOLMES: I have stated it was the Mr. Ffrench described in the Question.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman answer the second paragraph of the Question—whether Sergeant Wharton searched M'Nulty and took money from his person?

MR. HOLMES: Oh, I omitted to state that the sergeant took money which had been collected by M'Nulty.

MR. CHANCE: And the sergeant was not entitled to do so?

MR. HOLMES: I hold he was perfectly entitled to do so.

POST OFFICE (SCOTLAND)—ACCELERATION OF MAILS NORTH OF PERTH.

MR. FINLAY (Inverness, &c.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether, in view of the great dissatisfaction in Inverness and the North of Scotland generally, with the slow rate at which the London Day Mail is carried from Perth to Wick and Strome Ferry, and of the fact that it now takes about 10 hours more than the London Night Mail to traverse the distance between London and Wick, he is willing to re-consider the possibility of accelerating the London Day Mail north of Perth, in accordance with the Memorials sent in to him from the Northern towns and counties on the subject?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I am aware that the London Day Mail is carried from Perth to Wick and Strome Ferry by a slower train than that employed for the London Night Mail. But the postal revenue of the district would be altogether inadequate to justify the maintenance of two Mail Trains a-day throughout, running at the speed and under the conditions of the Night Mail Train. The payments made for the conveyance of Mails north of Perth are already so considerable that it may become a serious question on the next revision of the contract whether, if more moderate payments cannot be accepted by the Highland Railway Company, the liberal and effective postal service in the districts traversed by that line may not have to be reduced. I am sorry that I can hold out no expectation of a compliance with the prayer of the Memorials referred to.

CRIME (ENGLAND AND WALES) — RETURN OF MURDERS BY ARMED BURGLARS, &c.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return stating the number of murders committed by Burglars in the United Kingdom during the past 10 years; how many such murderers have been convicted; how many Persons have been wounded by the use of fire-arms by burglars; how many burglars in the Metropolitan Police District have avoided arrest by the use of fire-arms; and, whether he contemplates proposing any change in the law to deter burglars and others from the felonious use of fire-arms and other dangerous weapons?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): A Return such as my hon. Friend asks for, including the whole of the United Kingdom, could only be obtained by Circular from the Local Police Authorities, and would entail much labour and expense, and I regret that I do not feel able to comply with the request. If, however, my hon. Friend will be satisfied with a Return including only the Metropolitan Police District, I will ask the Chief Commissioner if he is able to give the information asked for; and, if so, I shall be happy to lay such a Return on the Table. It is not my intention to propose any change in the law with regard to the use of fire-arms and other dangerous weapons by burglars.

FACTORY AND WORKSHOPS ACT—INSPECTORS IN IRELAND.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, considering the limited number of Inspectors in Ireland under the Factory and Workshops Acts, and their consequent inadequate administration, he will appoint an additional number of practical men as Factory and Workshop Inspectors?

Mr. Raikes

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have consulted the Chief Inspector on this matter, and he informs me that he is not of opinion that the number of Inspectors in Ireland is too limited, or that the Acts are inadequately administered. There are, unfortunately, few industries requiring inspection in the South and West of Ireland, and complaints as to evasion of the Acts in those districts are very rare. The Inspectors resident in Ireland will receive occasional assistance from England; but I have no intention to add to the existing number of Factory Inspectors.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—TOWN COMMISSIONERS OF BOYLE, CO. ROSCOMMON—SUB-INSPECTOR BABBAGE.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether complaints have been made to the Inspector General of Constabulary by the Town Commissioners of Boyle, County Roscommon, of the conduct of Sub-Inspector Babbage, commanding the police in Boyle, in disobeying their Orders, and neglecting to aid them in maintaining good order in that town; and, whether, under the provisions of the 70th section of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 103, the police are bound to obey all proper and legal Orders issued by the Town Commissioners for the government and good order of the town?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) said, he would answer the Question on behalf of his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary. He had heard from the Inspector General of Constabulary that a complaint was made to him in regard to the disobeying by the Constabulary of a particular order of the Boyle Town Commissioners; but though the Constabulary had directions to obey all proper and legal orders issued by the Town Commissioners, with regard to this particular order which they had not carried out there was a doubt as to its legality.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — MR. CEIL ROCHÉ, R.M., BOYLE, CO. ROSCOMMON.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord

Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Mr. Cecil Roche, R.M., was sent specially to Boyle to try a summons for non-payment of rates, issued by the Town Commissioners against Colonel King-Harman, M.P., and Mr. Webb, J.P.; whether Mr. Roche accepted Mr. Webb's hospitality, and put up at Mr. Webb's house during his stay in Boyle; whether Mr. Roche dismissed the summons against the defendants on the ground that a question of the lawfulness of the prosecutors' title to act as Town Commissioners had been raised; whether Mr. James Candon, the present Chairman of the Town Commissioners, has been appointed a Justice of the Peace by virtue of his title as Town Commissioner, under Section 29 of 17 & 18 Vict., c. 103, and has held a Town Court fortnightly since his appointment; and, whether Mr. Roche sat and acted in the Town Court on the 9th ultimo with Mr. Candon, though he now questions the validity of Mr. Candon's claim to act as Town Commissioner?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: Mr. Cecil Roche was one of two Resident Magistrates sent at the request of the Town Commissioners to hear the case referred to. It is not a fact that he accepted Mr. Webb's hospitality, or put up at his house. The magistrates, of whom Mr. Roche was one, decided that, owing to the question of the Town Commissioners' title pending in a higher Court, they could not dispose of the question as to the rates. Mr. Candon having been appointed a magistrate, as described, by the late Lord Chancellor, Mr. Roche has naturally not felt it within his jurisdiction to question the appointment.

MARRIAGE LAW (ENGLAND AND WALES)—MARRIAGES IN DISSENTING CHAPELS—RE-MARRIAGE.

MR. T. BLAKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has been able to obtain more detailed information as to the re-marriage of William Frederick Jaine with his wife, Fanny Jaine, at the parish church of Kimbolton on 16th February, after they had already been married at the Primitive Methodist Chapel in Leominster; whether such re-marriage was performed by the Rev.

Augustus Garthwaite, Curate of Kimbolton, and with full knowledge that the parties were already married; whether, with such knowledge, he proceeded to enter the ceremony as a marriage in the Parish Register, and in the entry (No. 211) described the parties as being "bachelor" and "spinster," married after banns; whether the wilful insertion of such an entry is made a felony by the Statute 24 & 25 Vict., c. 98, s. 36; whether this re-marriage was actually celebrated without either banns or licence, in contravention both of Ecclesiastical Law and of the Statute 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, s. 21; and, if any banns were proclaimed, on what Sundays, and at whose request, they were proclaimed, and what written record exists of the proclamation; and, whether he will direct the Public Prosecutor to take any action in the matter?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have received a further letter from the Vicar of Kimbolton Parish, and have also heard from Mr. Squires, the Primitive Methodist minister at Leominster, as to the re-marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Jaine. The Vicar repeats that his curate was not aware until the following day that a religious ceremony had been performed; but believed that the parties had been married before the Registrar only. The ceremony was entered as a marriage in the Parish Register, the parties being described as stated in the Question. The Act of 24 & 25 Vict., c. 98, which makes it a felony to knowingly and unlawfully insert in any Register any false entry of any matter relating to any marriage, appears rather to be aimed at a different state of facts from that which I have mentioned. The marriage was solemnized without publication of banns, properly so-called; but there had been notice of the marriage three times given through the Registrar's Office as provided by statute, in lieu of banns. I am led to think from the correspondence that the curate believed that he was entitled to solemnize the marriage in church without banns under 19 & 20 Vict., c. 119, s. 12, although no doubt he ought not in such a case to have entered the marriage in the Parish Register. Under all the circumstances of the case, the curate seems to me to have acted without full knowledge of the facts, and rather per incuriam than with any fraudulent intent; and, accordingly, I am not prepared to advise the Public Prosecutor to interfere.

MR. T. BLAKE inquired, whether a marriage could be solemnized in a church without any other notice than that given at a Registrar's Office?

MR. MATTHEWS said, he would like Notice of the Question; but, so far as he was aware, the production of the Registrar's certificate was sufficient to entitle parties to be so married.

MR. T. BLAKE stated that the Secretary to the Registrar General informed him to the contrary.

ARMY—SUPPLY OF HORSES FOR ARMY PURPOSES.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Her Majesty's Government will agree to a Select Committee of this House being appointed to consider and report upon the supply of horses for Army purposes; and also to report whether, in their opinion, the supply could be in any way improved by the action of the Legislature?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): We have carefully considered this matter, and have come to the conclusion that there would be no adequate advantage in holding an inquiry by a Committee of this House at the present time into the supply of horses. The question of horse supply for the Army is of an urgent character; and I do not wish to be precluded by the appointment of such a Committee from taking any immediate steps that may be necessary.

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES—THE FISHERIES DISPUTE.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can now inform the House of the nature of the Despatch received from the Dominion Government suggesting a "modus vivendi" for a settlement of the Anglo-American Fisheries dispute, and when he anticipates that further Correspondence will be in the hands of Members; and, whether the prohibition of the sale of bait to United States fishermen in Newfoundland whilst permitted to French fishermen is in harmony with "the most favoured Nation" Clause of Foreign Treaties?

Mr. Matthews

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government will be desirous of informing the House of the course of negotiations with the Government of the United States upon the Fisheries dispute as soon as possible. I hope to lay on the Table the Despatch now being addressed to the United States Government before the Easter Recess. I hope the House will excuse me from entering upon the questions affecting the Newfoundland Fisheries in a fragmentary manner. Her Majesty's Government will be careful to observe their International obligations, while having due regard to the interests of Her Majesty's subjects.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—CONVICT PRISON AT GALWAY.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What amount has been expended of the £10,000 voted last year for the erection of a Prison at Galway for convicts to be employed upon Harbour works?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Serious difficulties occurred in the way of the carrying out of the proposed works; and I am informed that the only part of the money spent is the sum of £63 paid to an engineer.

MR. PINKERTON: Does not the right hon. Gentleman think it would be advisable, considering the increased strain likely to be put upon prison accommodation in Ireland, to proceed with this work as expeditiously as possible?

INDIA—INFANT MARRIAGE AND ENFORCED WIDOWHOOD.

MR. E. R. RUSSELL (Glasgow, Bridgeton) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government have sanctioned, or have raised any objection to, the following passage in the Resolution of the Governor General in Council, on Infant Marriage and Enforced Widowhood, passed in October last—

"When caste or custom lays down a rule which is of its nature enforceable in the Civil Courts, but is clearly opposed to morality or public policy, the State will decline to enforce it?"

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GOSSET) (Chatham):

Her Majesty's Government have neither sanctioned nor have they raised any objection to the passage quoted.

INLAND REVENUE—DEED STAMPS, SCOTLAND.

MR. E. R. RUSSELL (Glasgow, Bridgeton) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he is aware of the present practice by which, when solicitors in Glasgow have to get deeds adjudicated upon by the stamp authorities, in order to fix the duties to be paid thereon, it is necessary to employ an Edinburgh agent to present such deeds at the Stamp Office in that city, expense being thereby incurred; and, whether the Government will take steps to arrange that in such cases deeds may be handed in at the Glasgow Stamp Office and transmitted by the Glasgow authorities to Edinburgh?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities), in reply, said, the facts were as stated in the hon. Member's Question; but whenever the inconvenience complained of was pointed out to the Board of Inland Revenue, they proceeded to have it remedied, and arranged with their solicitor in Edinburgh that he should receive direct from solicitors in Glasgow, by post, all deeds for adjudication, without employing any agents in Edinburgh.

EVICCTIONS, &c. (IRELAND)—RELATION OF LANDLORDS AND TENANTS—ALLEGED CIRCULAR TO THE POLICE.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the evidence given at Lifford, County Donegal, in the case of Hannah O'Donnell, charged with having taken forcible possession in Gweedore; whether there is now in existence a Circular to the police, such as was deposited to in that case by Sergeant Mahony, directing the police to interrogate tenants as to their relations with landlords, and to demand possession, or otherwise act as bailiffs for the owners of property; and, if he will lay a copy of it upon the Table of the House?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I think the hon. Member must have seen some incorrect report of the proceedings. I am informed that Sergeant Mahony gave no such evidence. There is no such Circular as is suggested in the Question.

MR. O'DOHERTY: Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware that the police so acted, as the informations in the case show? I can give the right hon. Gentleman a copy of the informations.

[No reply.]

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—EXTRA DUTY IN TRAVELLING POST OFFICES AT CHRISTMAS.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.) asked the Postmaster General, Why payment for extra duty, performed during the Christmas pressure in the travelling post offices in Ireland, has not yet been made; if he can state why payments for extra duty done in this branch of the Service are not made as punctually as in other departments of the Dublin Post Office; and, when these payments will be made?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): Considerable delay in making these payments has been caused by certain officers of the travelling post themselves, who omitted to submit their claims with sufficient promptitude. The amounts have now been passed and instructions issued for payment.

BURIALS—THE BURIAL GROUND AT LLANFROTHERN, MERIONETHSHIRE.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the old burial ground of the parish of Llanfrothen, Merionethshire, has, for some years, been too full to allow of any more interments in it; whether, 20 years ago, a lady presented to the parish a piece of ground adjoining the old burial ground; and, whether the present incumbent of the parish refuses to Nonconformist parishioners the right of availing themselves of the provisions of "The Burials Act, 1880," in burials in the additional portion of the parish burial ground; and, if so, whether he can take steps to prevent this defeat of the law?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I received a letter this morning from the Rector of Llanfrothen, who informs me that the burial ground of the parish is not full, that many burials take place there annually, the last having taken place on the 17th instant. It is a fact that a piece of land was presented to the parish by a lady for burial purposes, but on the condition that the service should be conducted according to the rites of the Church of England. This piece of land was conveyed to trustees under 36 and 37 Vict., c. 50. Presuming that the condition attached to the devise was inserted in the conveyance, the provisions of the Act of 1880 do not seem to me to have been evaded; for Clause 9 of that Statute enacts that the Act shall not authorise the burial of any person without the performance of any express condition, on which any right of interment in any burial ground vested in trustees, not being the burial ground of the parish, may have been granted.

AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS — COMPARATIVE RETURN, 1881 TO 1886.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether his attention has been called to the "Return of the value of live stock and crops, showing the numbers, at various ages, of cattle and sheep, and the estimated produce of the crops, with the average prices of each year and of each kind from 1881 to 1886," prepared for the Royal Commission on "The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881," and mentioned at page 9 of the Report of the said Commission; and, whether he would consent to a similar Return being prepared for England and Wales, so as to assist landowners and tenant farmers in effecting equitable readjustments of rents?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) (who replied) said: The Agricultural Department will consider the Return referred to, which has now been printed, and will decide whether it is possible to prepare a similar Return for England and Wales.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT — REPORT FOR 1886.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, When the Report of the Agricultural Department of the Privy Council for the year 1886 will be presented?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) (who replied) said: The whole of the Report is in the hands of the printer, and it will be presented before the end of the month.

Mr. Matthews

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT — IMPORTATION OF CATTLE AFFECTED WITH PLEURO-PNEUMONIA FROM IRELAND.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY (Forfarshire) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether he can inform the House what steps the Irish Executive propose taking to prevent the shipment from Dublin of cattle affected with pleuro-pneumonia; whether the Veterinary Department consider the proposed new arrangements satisfactory; and, if not, whether he can state what course the Department proposes to adopt; and, if he will lay the Correspondence relating to the subject upon the Table of the House?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) (who replied) said: The Irish Government have passed Orders prohibiting the movement of cattle out of the infected districts in Dublin and the neighbourhood without the special sanction of the Lord Lieutenant; and further measures suggested by the Privy Council in this country are under the consideration of the Irish Government. The Correspondence is not complete, and cannot, therefore, be laid on the Table at present.

METROPOLIS—GUY'S HOSPITAL.

MR. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, on the afternoon of 14th March, a man named Stack, suffering from a fractured leg, applied for surgical aid at Guy's Hospital, and his case was not attended to till 1 a.m. on the following morning; whether, on the same morning, after the leg was set, he was ordered to leave the place, as there was no room for him, a relative having to pawn her wedding ring to pay for a pair of crutches supplied by the Hospital; and, whether he will cause an inquiry to be made into the case?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Medical Superintendent of Guy's Hospital that the facts of Stack's case are as follows:—Stack was brought to the Hospital at 7 p.m. on Monday, and was found to be suffering from a simple fracture of the small bone of his leg. He was taken into the accident ward for the night and received immediate attendance; and, as is usual in the case of similar injuries, the limb was temporarily placed in sandbags, and in the course of a few hours, between 11 and 12, the limb was put up permanently in plaster of Paris bandages. Stack was discharged on the following day with a pair of crutches supplied at the expense of the Hospital, and without any charge to Stack or his relatives. He was discharged in the ordinary course, and not for want of room. When Stack came to the Hospital every bed in the ward was occupied; but one of the occupants, who was leaving the next morning, was placed on a stretcher, and thus made room for Stack. The Hospital Authorities seem to me to have done all that was proper on this occasion.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)—FURTHER EXPENDITURE REQUIRED FOR COMPLETION OF ARKLOW HARBOUR—STATEMENT OF THE TOWN COMMISSIONERS OF ARKLOW.

MR. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Lords of the Treasury have considered the statement of the Town Commissioners of Arklow, in which they protest against the proposal of the Board of Works to raise an additional loan, on the guarantee of the rates, of £4,325 to complete the harbour; whether it is alleged that the original sum of £20,000, for which a baronial guarantee was given, in addition to the Treasury Grant, was ample to do the work, but for the large sum expended in repairing damages, owing to the collapse of the breakwater during its construction; and, whether, under the circumstances, the Treasury will increase the grant by a sum sufficient to put the harbour in working order?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The statement referred to by the hon. Member has been considered. It is alleged that the original sum was ample. Additional expenditure was, however, necessary in consequence of damage done by storms during the progress of the work, and of delay caused by discussion. In June last year a joint deputation of the Town Commissioners of Arklow and the local Harbour Committee unanimously approved the completion of the south pier on the Board of Works' plan. Unless the Town Commissioners are prepared to guarantee in the terms of the Act the additional capital required, I fear that the proposed north groyne cannot be proceeded with; but experience may show that it is not necessary. Two eminent engineers who were called in are of opinion that experience might show that the works already done would be sufficient for the purposes of a harbour.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)—MEDAL TO THE SUAKIN REGIMENTS, 1885.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN (Kent, Isle of Thanet) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can hold out a hope that the Egyptian medal will soon be given to the officers and men, including the Indian Native Regiments, who served around Suakin in 1885?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The Egyptian medal has already been issued to all British and Indian troops who served at Suakin during any part of the period from the 26th of March, 1884, to the 14th of May, 1885, which has been held to be the limit of the period of warlike operations for which the medal is granted. I am afraid I can hold out no hope that the question can be re-opened.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—VENTILATION OF THIS HOUSE—COOKSON'S WHARF, MILLBANK.

MR. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, as stated in the Report of Mr. Fletcher, the Inspector under the Alkali Acts, before the Select Committee on the Ventilation of the House, there exists, a few yards south of the Houses of Parliament, at Cookson's Wharf, Millbank, a refuse heap, upon which castaway bedding, rags, bones, hair, animal and vegetable refuse out of Westminster is burnt periodically at night, as occasion requires; and, whether, if correct, he proposes to do anything to mitigate this nuisance?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. BRIDGES) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Mr. Fletcher, in his Report, expressed the opinion that the unpleasant smell, resembling that of burning animal matter, experienced on the west side of the Houses of Parliament, early in the morning of July 9, 1884, arose from the burning of some refuse material at Cookson's Wharf, Millbank. I am informed by Mr. Fletcher that subsequent inquiry has shown that this burning of refuse was an isolated act, in violation of orders, which has not been repeated.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked, whether the establishment referred to, not being carried on for the purpose of manufacture, was not exempt from the operation of the Factory Acts?

MR. RITCHIE said, that was an entirely new point. The Question put to him was as to the nuisance, and as to that he had replied that it was an isolated act, and had not been repeated.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—THE ROYAL NIGER COMPANY.

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in the recent changes which have taken place in the Government of the Niger, sufficient steps were taken to secure the assent of the natives to the new arrangements; whether he will lay upon the Table of the House evidence to show that the natives were parties to the establishment of the authority of the Royal Niger Company; and, whether he has any information to show whether the late disturbances were due in any way to the natives resenting the imposition by the Company of heavy taxes, to which they were not accustomed?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The Charter to the Royal Niger Company was granted after most mature consideration. There is abundant evidence as to the general assent of the Natives, over 230 Treaties having been concluded with the Company. It is not proposed to lay upon the Table these Treaties, which, indeed, would be misleading, as they contained clauses giving exclusive rights which have become inoperative under the Charter. Reports show that the recent disturbances arose from robberies by a Native Chief, and not from the imposition of taxes.

Mr. Ritchie

EDUCATION CODE, 1887—CLASS SUBJECTS—WELSH.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether Welsh will be included among the class subjects under Article 15 of the Education Code now lying upon the Table of the House?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (SIR WILLIAM HAET DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The hon. Member is aware that Welsh is now a "specific subject"—that is, it is taught to individual scholars, and grants are made in respect of each child who passes; but I am not prepared to make Welsh a "class subject," and, therefore, to refuse all grants unless the language is taught throughout the school.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE, 1887—PUPIL TEACHERS AS QUEEN'S SCHOLARS.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he will consider the desirability of so altering Article 124 of the Education Code so as to allow pupil teachers in Wales to be presented for examination as Queen's Scholars who have been under instruction for the prescribed time at one of the three University Colleges of Cardiff, Aberystwith, and Bangor, without residence at the Training College?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (SIR WILLIAM HAET DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): It would be difficult to accept on the part of pupil teachers in Wales instruction at the three University Colleges of Cardiff, Aberystwith, and Bangor as equivalent to residence in a Training College, for the syllabus of subjects, the study of which it is thought necessary to enforce on candidates for certificates, is not adopted at those Colleges, and students would, therefore, be placed at a disadvantage in the examination, and would be less eligible as teachers afterwards.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE, 1887—WELSH-SPEAKING DISTRICTS.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether, in the "Class Subjects" of Article 15 of the Education Code, the Education Department will sanction an alternative scheme of English adapted to schools in Welsh-speaking districts; whether, in the "Elementary Subjects," bi-lingual reading books, of the ordinary size, may be used in Welsh schools; whether Her Majesty's Inspectors in Wales are in a position to suggest such a scheme of bi-lingual teaching, and, if approved, whether it will be inserted in Schedules I. and II. of the Code; and, whether such a scheme will be made equally applicable to evening schools in Wales?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The hon. Member is aware that in Welsh-speaking districts it is already provided that the intelligence of the children examined in any elementary or class subject may be tested by requiring them to explain in Welsh the meaning of passages read, and I know of no reason to object to the use of bi-lingual reading books. The forthcoming General Report on Wales, which will be published separately, will show the attitude of Her Majesty's Inspectors on the subject, and will, I hope, satisfy the hon. Member that the Department is not insensible to its importance.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE, 1887—THE WELSH AND GAELIC LANGUAGES—PUPIL TEACHERS.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether, for many years up to 1862, a grant was made by the Government to the pupil teachers who successfully passed in Welsh or Gaelic, and who taught in schools in Welsh or Gaelic-speaking districts; whether the Scotch Education Code of 1887 allows pupil teachers to obtain marks in Gaelic grammar, translation, and composition, in their admission examination to the Training Colleges, and directs a grant to be made to pupil teachers employed in giving bi-lingual instruction to Gaelic-speaking children; and, whether the Education Department will add Welsh to the four languages in Schedule V., Section 10, of the Education Code, and direct a grant to be made to pupil teachers employed in giving bi-lingual instruction to Welsh children?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): A grant was formerly made to certificated teachers under the circumstances described in the Question; and by the Scotch Code of the present year the customary grant is made in respect of pupil teachers employed for the special purpose of giving bi-lingual instruction, but not required to make up the minimum staff. I am not, however, as at present advised, prepared to make the changes suggested in the last part of the Question.

ADMIRALTY—DRAWINGS SUPPLIED TO FOREIGN POWERS.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether there are any Rules in force, and what is the practice, in regard to the supply of drawings or information to Foreign Powers, or individuals, of vessels, &c., constructed in the Royal Dockyards, or by firms or Companies outside of the Dockyards; whether such drawings or information are sometimes supplied under the authority of the Admiralty; whether any moneys have been received by the Admiralty for their supply; and, whether any further steps will be taken in regard to designs which may be considered to be of a more confidential character?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): It is contrary, both to Rules and existing practice, for Government employés to supply drawings of ships constructed in the Royal Dockyards either to Foreign Powers or to individuals. Certain exceptions to these Rules have at times been made with the approval of the Admiralty; and in these cases the expenses incurred by the employment of extra draftsmen have been refunded by the persons for whom the drawings were made. Private firms tendering for the construction of ships and engines are, of necessity, supplied with specifications and drawings. New Regulations are about to be issued in reference to the publication of confidential designs.

INDIA—THE PISHIN FRONTIER.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If the statement is correct that the Indian Government are about to post a force of observation on the Pishin Frontier; if the Government propose entering Afghan territory; and, whether they intend affording and material or subsidiary support to the Ameer of Afghanistan in case of a Russian advance?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The Secretary of State has no information which corroborates the statement referred to, nor has he any reason to suppose that Russia is contemplating an advance against Afghanistan; but he has not authorized me to express any opinion as to the course he would take should such be the case.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—IRREGULAR DETENTION AT NEW ROSS POLICE STATION.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) (for Mr. J. E. REDMOND) (Wexford, N.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether John Malone and Richard Magee, who were arrested and lodged in New Ross Police Station on the 21st February last, on a charge of insubordination, and who were on the following day brought before a magistrate, in a room of the police station, and by him sentenced to three months' imprisonment, were before sentence asked to give bail for their appearance at the then next Petty Sessions for the district; whether he will state the amount of bail required by the magistrate in each case; and, whether the prisoners declared that they were unable to give such bail?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Holmes) (Dublin University), in reply, said, the prisoners had been inmates of the New Ross Workhouse, and had raised no objection to their being tried by the magistrate. The charge against them was not insubordination. They were convicted under the Vagrancy Act for being found loitering for an illegal purpose; and the fact that the magistrate did not ask them could they give bail did not affect the legality of the decision.

MR. SEXTON asked, was not the magistrate bound, under the 22nd section of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, to call upon the prisoners to find bail; and, whether the failure to do so did not render the decision illegal?

Dr. Tanner

MR. HOLMES said, the magistrate was not required to do so in the case in question.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE RESOURCES OF IRELAND—THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Royal Commission on the Development of the Resources of Ireland have concluded their inquiries regarding arterial drainage; and, if so, whether they will report upon that subject prior to their entering upon the consideration of the other questions referred to them?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I understand from the Royal Commissioners that they have practically completed their inquiry upon the subject of arterial drainage; and, in accordance with the promise conveyed by my Predecessor in Office to a deputation of which the hon. Member was one, they intend making a separate Report upon this part of the Reference to them. They are now engaged on the preparation of that Report.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—LETTER OF CAPTAIN PLUNKETT.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the police officer, to whom Captain Plunkett telegraphed not to hesitate to shoot the people of Youghal if it should be necessary, was County Inspector Brownrigg; whether County Inspector Brownrigg was recently summoned before the Youghal Bench for an assault upon a local merchant, and fined; and, if so, whether it is the intention of the Chief Secretary to entrust this officer in future with such discretionary power as is named in the telegram?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The telegram sent by Captain Plunkett was addressed to County Inspector Brownrigg. With regard to the circumstances of the case mentioned in the second paragraph of the Question, I have to say what was stated by my Predecessor on a previous occasion—that County Inspector Brownrigg was summoned for an alleged assault while in the discharge of his police duties, and was fined a farthing, without costs—the presiding magistrate, in announcing the decision of the Bench, stating that the case ought not to have been brought into Court.

WANDSWORTH COMMON — VICTORIA PATRIOTIC ASYLUM FOR GIRLS.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, prior to granting a lease of land attached to the Victoria Patriotic Asylum for Girls on Wandsworth Common, held in charitable trust, the Royal Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund sought and obtained the consent of the Charity Commissioners?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I am advised that the Commissioners of the Royal Patriotic Fund would not be required by law to obtain the assent of the Charity Commissioners to the grant by them of a lease of land for 21 years.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—THE OFFICE OF CROWN AGENT — MR. AULDJO JAMIESON.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether Mr. Auldjo Jamieson, Crown Agent for Scotland, is a member of the firm of Todds, Murray, and Jamieson, who act as estate agents; whether the said firm are agents for the Ardencaple Estate, Argyllshire, where a deforcement took place in connection with the eviction of a farmer named M'Dougal, and for which Samuel M'Dougal has been tried and imprisoned; and, whether the Government will require that so important and responsible an official as the Crown Agent shall act as the servant of the Crown alone, and not as an estate agent in cases that may come before him in his public capacity?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I answer the two first paragraphs of the hon. Member's Question in the affirmative. As regards the third paragraph, I have to say that the Crown Agent, in matters of prosecution for crime, is solely an administrative official, and cases in no way come before him in that capacity. They are dealt with by the Lord Advocate and his deputies, without consultation with the Crown Agent of any kind; and it would be quite out of his province for him to interfere in any way with the proceedings, and he never does so. It is not intended to make any alteration on the existing practice.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—PUPIL TEACHERS.

MR. TUITE (Westmeath, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether teachers of national schools in Ireland, seeking promotion from the third to the second class, are required to present at the annual results examinations a certain proportion of their pupils in the higher classes; whether by this rule several teachers are debarred from all hope of promotion, in consequence of the districts in which their schools are situate being so thinly populated, and so poor, the people in many instances being unable to provide clothes for their children, that it is impossible for the teacher to secure the required minimum attendance of 100 days of the requisite number of pupils to qualify for presentation at the results examinations, while in such schools the number of passes in many cases on the whole average 87 per cent; and, whether, under the circumstances, he is prepared to recommend a modification of this rule in certain cases where the diligence and efficiency of the teachers are undisputed?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Commissioners of National Education inform me that every national school teacher seeking improved status and remuneration is expected by the Commissioners to have such a fair proportion of pupils in the higher classes as the circumstances of his school—whether in a thinly-populated district or not—warrant, and to have both junior and senior pupils carefully instructed. While there is no absolute rule fixing any precise number of pupils for the higher classes, the existence of such classes in other than infant schools is always an important element in determining the admission of teachers to examination with a view to promotion.

POST OFFICE—COMMISSION ON POSTAL ORDERS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is true that a scheme has been submitted to him which will insure a proportionate commission on all postal orders; and, whether the Department intends to adopt that or some system founded on similar lines?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I have received, a few days ago, from my noble Friend the Member for the St. Alban's Division of Hertfordshire (Viscount Grimston) a scheme such as that referred to, and it is now undergoing a careful examination.

POST OFFICE—CHARGES AT SHANGHAI.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General, Whether he is aware that British merchants in Shanghai can send their letters through the French Post Office there for conveyance to Europe by the English steamers of the Peninsular and Oriental Company at the rate of 2½d. per half ounce, while the same letters, if sent through the British Post Office at Shanghai, also for Europe, would be charged 5d.; and, whether he is disposed to take steps to remedy this apparent anomaly?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): Yes; I am aware of the circumstance to which the hon. Member has called attention. The explanation is that the French Post Office does not avail itself of the option given by the Postal Union Convention of collecting additional postage to meet the expenses of conveyance to distant places, while the British Post Office does avail itself of that option. In the case referred to, the French Office does not incur a loss in sending the letters by British packets for 2½d.; but even at the 5d. rate a considerable loss is incurred by the British Office, because it has to pay heavily, not only for the sea service, but also for a special train service across Italy and France. Obviously, any reduction of the British postage would involve additional loss; and I am not prepared at present to recommend the Treasury to incur that loss.

INDIA (MADRAS)—PLANTATIONS OF CINCHONA.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Under Secretary of

Mr. Henniker Heaton

State for India, Whether the Government of Madras planted cinchona for the purpose of obtaining a febrifuge for the Native classes; whether it is the fact that sales of Government bark are advertised in London papers; that the bark comes to Europe for the manufacture of quinine; and which drug being retailed at an average of some 300 per cent above the wholesale price (which to-day is 2s. 8d. per ounce for the best) puts it wholly and totally beyond the means of the classes the Madras Government intended to benefit; and, whether the present method of selling its bark in the open market in Madras is contrary to the understanding arrived at when the Government ceased to export bark on its own account?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GOSR) (Otham): One of the objects, but not the only one, of planting cinchona, was that stated. Government bark is advertised for sale in London, and comes to England for the manufacture of quinine. Government gets quinine for its Medical Departments at wholesale prices, and makes the "Red Bark" into an effective febrifuge cheap enough to be within the reach of all classes. I do not understand what is the "understanding arrived at" mentioned in the last paragraph.

ADMIRALTY—SHANK PALLISER SCREW BOLTS.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, How many reduced shank Palliser screw bolts for armour plates (approximately) have been used in Her Majesty's Navy; whether they are generally used in ships now afloat; and, whether they are still being used to fasten armour plates on ships now under construction?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): From 25,000 to 30,000 Palliser armour bolts with reduced shanks have been used in Her Majesty's Navy. They are generally in use in ships now afloat, and are still used for ships under construction.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT asked whether Captain Palliser had received any pecuniary benefit from his discovery?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he would like to have Notice of the Question.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—OUTBREAK OF ANTHRAX.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether any information can be given respecting the numerous outbreaks of anthrax that have taken place in various parts of Great Britain during the past six months, and whether they have been traced to the use of railway trucks for the conveyance of foreign hides, the same trucks being subsequently used with cattle?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) (who replied) said: An inquiry in reference to the recent outbreaks of anthrax is now being conducted by the officers of the Agricultural Department. There is no reason, however, to believe that the disease has been more prevalent during the last six months than previously. The Anthrax Order of September last imposes on the owners of animals the obligation to give notice of the disease, and on the Inspectors the duty of making Returns weekly; hence public attention has been called to outbreaks which otherwise would have escaped notice. None of the outbreaks have been traced to railway trucks in which foreign hides had been previously carried.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE asked, what steps the Government were prepared to take to stamp out anthrax in Cheshire?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he was not himself able to give an answer to that Question without Notice.

ADMIRALTY—THE QUEEN'S JUBILEE CELEBRATION—THE NAVAL REVIEW — ROYAL NAVAL RESERVE AND ROYAL NAVAL ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

SIR SAMUEL WILSON (Portsmouth) (for Mr. BADEN-POWELL) (Liverpool, Kirkdale) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether arrangements will be made in order to enable contingents of officers and men of the Royal Naval Reserve and Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers to take part in the Jubilee Naval Review; and, if so, whether it can be arranged that these contingents shall be representative of the different districts of the United Kingdom?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The Jubilee is to be celebrated by a Naval Review to be held at Portsmouth on July 23, at which Her Majesty has signified her intention to be present. This Review will embrace a large number of battle ships, coast defence vessels, fast cruisers, torpedo boats, and gunboats; and, unlike previous Reviews, will not be merely a pageant, but the prelude to a series of operations at sea to test the efficiency both of men and ships. These operations will comprise the defence of our principal military and commercial ports and the protection of our coasts from the Downs to the north of Donegal Bay, and also the protection of our commerce near the entrance of the Channel; and in carrying them out all precautions will be taken which would be observed in time of war. We shall be glad to associate with these manœuvres a limited number of Naval Reserve men who may wish to volunteer for service on this occasion, to be selected from each district; also a certain number of Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers could be embarked in the coast defence vessels to be employed for the protection of the commercial ports. There will, I imagine, be some difficulty in the men forming these Reserves leaving their regular employment for the time required for the Review and subsequent operations, and there will also be a certain expense in conveying the men from their respective localities; but I hope these are not insurmountable difficulties.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne) inquired whether Members of the House of Commons would receive an invitation to the Review; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government would consider what arrangements would be made for taking them to Portsmouth, and for their accommodation when there?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: We are still a good way away from the 23rd of July; but if my hon. Friend will put the Question to me a little nearer that time, I have no doubt I shall be able to give him a satisfactory answer.

INDIA—RAILWAYS—THE PISHIN VALLEY LINE.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is a fact that "Railway material for 100 miles of line is being collected in the Pishin Valley;" what is the distance from the existing terminus of the railway to Candahar; is this material collected with a view to an extension of the line to Candahar; and, will the Secretary of State promise that information shall be given to Parliament before railway surveys or works are undertaken beyond the British frontier?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Oatham): Yes; 100 miles. So soon as any designs for extending the railway are adopted, the Secretary of State will be happy to communicate the same to Parliament, should it be consistent with the interests of the Public Service to do so.

WAR OFFICE—HORSE ARTILLERY BATTERIES.

GENERAL FRASER (Lambeth, N.) asked the Secretary of State for War, in the event of it becoming necessary, in sudden emergency, to raise the Horse Artillery Batteries of the First Army Corps to war establishment, From what source he proposes to obtain the necessary horses and men; and, if from the Second Army Corps Batteries, in what condition these latter batteries would be left as regards numbers of horses and men?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): No batteries of the Second Army Corps would be drawn upon for the First Army Corps; and in the event of mobilization any deficiency in men would be made good from the Reserve. With regard to horses, it is the fact that economy prevents our maintaining a full establishment either for the Cavalry or the Artillery. The question of the best mode of supplying the necessary number of horses is engaging my earnest attention; but, in my opinion, it would not be solved by maintaining another battery of Horse Artillery on Second Army Corps strength.

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—MR. JAMES A. IRWIN, NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHER.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Board of Commissioners of National Education (Ireland) have yet concluded their investigation into the alleged connection of Mr. James A. Irwin, teacher of the Carrickawilkin (County Armagh) National School, with the Orange Society; and, what is the result of the inquiry?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Commissioners of National Education inform me that they were satisfied, on inquiry, that the teacher named had broken their Rules in the manner alleged, and they have removed him from their service.

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—ATTENDANCE OF MEMBERS.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, When the Return ordered of the Number of Meetings and Attendances of the Board of Commissioners of National Education (Ireland) will be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I understand that the Return will be laid on the Table within a day or two.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—THE ESTATE OF MR. S. E. SHIRLEY, CO. MONAGHAN.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received any intimation that Mr. S. E. Shirley intends evicting 36 families on his Farney Estate, in the County Monaghan, on the 22nd instant; whether it is a fact that the tenants on this estate have served Mr. Shirley with the necessary originating notices, preparatory to going into the Land Court to have fair rents fixed; and, whether a police force has yet been applied for to carry out these threatened evictions on Tuesday next; and, if so, whether, pending the decisions of the Land Court in their cases, he will withhold his sanction to the Forces of the Crown being used for the purpose of carrying out the eviction of the tenantry of this estate, which numbers 2,000, and represents about 12,000 persons?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I require further Notice of this Question.

Mr. Buchanan

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Arising out of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, I wish to ask him is he aware the evictions take place to-morrow?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Question only appeared on the Paper on Saturday, and I have not had time to obtain the necessary information.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: In consequence of the unsatisfactory nature of the right hon. Gentleman's reply, I beg to give Notice that I shall recommend the tenants on Mr. Shirley's estate to protect themselves by adopting the Plan of Campaign.

LAND ACT (IRELAND), 1870—TENANT PURCHASERS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is intended to include in the provisions of any Land Bill the cases of the tenant purchasers under the Land Act of 1870?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Government propose, on an early day, to give their general views on the land legislation for Ireland.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ACTS—MR. JOHN ROE, DONAGHMORE UNION.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. John Roe, solicitor to the lately dissolved Board of Guardians of Donaghmore Union, in the Queen's County, has received a sum of £300 out of the rates for fees under the Labourers' Acts; whether anything has really been done within the area of the said late Union in the way of housing the labourers; and, what work was performed by Mr. Roe in consideration for the sum mentioned?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It appears, from the minutes of proceedings of the Guardians, that when the affairs of the Union were being arranged prior to its amalgamation with neighbouring Unions, the solicitor of the Board sent in his bill of costs, which had been allowed to run on since 1869, and amounted to £363. The Guardians agreed to allow him £300, which included whatever may have been due to him under the Labourers' Acts. The amount is not distinguished; but, of course, it could only have formed a very recent part of the debt, which had been accumulating for 17 years. The schemes under that Act fell through, as, owing to delay on the part of the Guardians in the presentation of their petition, the dissolution of the Union took effect before anything could be done.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND—"STORMY EVICTIIONS IN MAYO."

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to a paragraph on page 8 of The Pall Mall Gazette of Wednesday, 16th March, headed Stormy Evictions in Mayo, or if he has other knowledge of the facts referred to therein—namely, that the Resident Magistrate present at the eviction stated—

"If the people offered resistance the police must shoot them down. . . . A bailiff, named Gallagher, abused by an old woman when he was removing her furniture, drew a revolver and threatened to shoot her. . . . A dying lad was carried from one of the cabins, and last night he received the last rites of the Roman Catholic Church;"

and, if he is aware that the rents, for inability to pay which those evictions were carried out, varied from 46 per cent above the valuation to twice, and even in one case four times, the valuation?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The statements referred to are either unfounded or misleading. The evictions were not stormy; there were only a few people present. No magistrate used any such words as are stated, nor did any bailiff act in the manner described. In one of the houses there was a sick child in its mother's arms; and the Sheriff's attention being drawn to it, he, out of consideration for this case, merely took formal possession, allowing the inmates of the house to re-enter it at once as caretakers, and disturbing none of the effects.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the last paragraph in the Question, as to the rents varying from 46 per cent above the valuation to twice and even, in one case, four times the valuation?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I know nothing about that.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—EXPORT OF CATTLE FROM IRELAND—PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that a letter was sent from the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council to the Local Authority of the North Dublin Union, to the effect that it is of the highest importance, in the interest of the Irish cattle export trade with Great Britain, that every possible step should be taken to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, and, under the circumstances, inviting the Local Authority to take into consideration the compulsory slaughter of 42 head of cattle that at present remain in five pleuro-pneumonia infected places in that Union; whether he is aware that the Local Authority have resolved not to cause their slaughter; and, seeing that the interest of the Irish cattle export trade with Great Britain is seriously affected by the frequent outbreaks of that fatal disease amongst Irish cattle in Great Britain, whether the Privy Council will forthwith enforce the provisions of Clause 6 of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Amendment Act of 1886 in Ireland?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The facts are substantially as stated. It appears from the minutes of the last meeting of the Local Authority that they proposed to take the matter into further consideration on the 6th of April; but they will be asked to do so at an earlier date. The question as to how far the provisions of Clause 6 of the Act of 1886 can be enforced with the least inconvenience and expense is at present engaging the attention of the Privy Council Veterinary Department.

VETERINARY DEPARTMENT OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL (IRELAND)—CATTLE FROM AMERICA AND IRELAND.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the attention of the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council in Ireland has been called to the statement that American cattle arrive in Liverpool and Glasgow in better condition than Irish cattle; whether this arises from defective arrangements in the cross-channel steamers, and overcrowding, or otherwise; whether it is the fault of the Board of Trade Regulations, or of those of the Privy Councils of Great Britain and Ireland, that nothing is done to remedy the state of things complained of; and, whether, in view of the attitude of certain Local Authorities in Great Britain, the Government will take energetic steps in this matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It is true that such a statement as is referred to has been brought under the notice of the Veterinary Department in Ireland; but if the complaint against the condition of Irish cattle be well founded it cannot be traced to defective arrangements in the cross-channel steamers, either by overcrowding or otherwise. The Regulations on the subject are as carefully devised as possible. They are identical in England and Ireland, and are the same for cross-channel steamers as for those carrying cattle to Great Britain from other countries. The shipment of animals is superintended by officers of the Veterinary Department, who do all in their power to prevent any cruelty or infringement of the Regulations; and I am afraid that no further action on the part of the Department seems practicable.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) — ELECTION IN MOUNTMELLICK UNION.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the following 10 ratepayers in the townland of Derrygrule, in Mountmellick Union, have for years voted in all the elections in the electoral division of Mountmellick until 1885—namely, John Quigley, Mary Meehan, James Brien, James Quigley, Edward Jones, William Tanner, John Conroy, Richard Dickinson, Bridget Bergin, and John Walsh; whether the newly-appointed clerk, acting as Returning Officer, has disallowed the votes of the ratepayers mentioned, although they have paid the rates assessed on their holdings; and, whether the Local Government Board will take steps to protect the rights of the persons in question at the present election?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): This Question only appeared on Saturday, and was at once referred to the Local Government Board; but there has not been time for the receipt of their Report, as they had to refer to the country for the required information.

SOUTH AFRICA—PONDOLAND.

SIR LEWIS PELLY (Hackney, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government recognize Pondoland as belonging to Great Britain or to any other Power, either absolutely or as a Protected State; whether any negotiations are pending between Her Majesty's Government and any other Power concerning Pondoland; and, whether Government are in a position to give assurances that Pondoland will not be occupied, either directly or indirectly, by any Foreign Power?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (SIR HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): My right hon. Friend has asked me to reply to the Question. Her Majesty's Government exercise a Protectorate over the whole Coast of Pondoland, and consider the country as being under their influence, and do not recognize a right on the part of any other Power to interfere in its concerns. I stated, in my answer of the 15th instant, that in August, 1885, in reply to a proposal for placing Pondoland under the protection of the German Empire, the German Government had stated that they were not in a position to entertain the Petition; and the hon. Member has probably seen in to-day's newspapers the statement from the semi-official North German Gazette, which confirms this view. No negotiations are pending between Her Majesty's Government and any other Power respecting Pondoland. Her Majesty's Government consider that no Foreign Power could occupy Pondoland without their consent.

IRELAND — CONSTABULARY FORCE FOR THE NORTH RIDING OF TIPPERARY.

MR. P. J. O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the regular Constabulary force for the North Riding of the County of Tipperary stands at 309 men; whether, out of that number, there are at present only 266 men in active service in the district; whether the sum of £1,000 is annually paid out of the Riding for what is termed extra police; whether, including the so-called extra police, the regular force is at present short of the number of 19; and, if so, whether he will fill up the regular Parliamentary quota, and relieve the ratepayers from this tax for extra police; whether he will inform the House, or give a Return, as to the number of persons at present under police protection, and the number of men employed in discharge of protection duty in North Tipperary; whether at the recent Spring Assizes at Nenagh, where the presentment for this Extra Police Tax was opposed, the presiding Judge, Baron Dowse, replying to the traverser, made use of these words—and, whether he will explain, while there is a comparative absence of crime in the county, as stated by Baron Dowse, why the ratepayers are burdened with this tax for extra police?

"It is imperative on me to pass this presentment, otherwise I would be most happy to concede to the just application. You must look for redress elsewhere;"

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The full force of the North Riding of Tipperary is 309 men—namely, 266 free force and 43 extra men. The number actually serving is 290, leaving 19 vacancies, which, according to statute, are proportionately divided between the free and extra men. It is impossible that the full force should always be present in any county, as allowance must be made for occasional absence, and for recruits training at the depot. I have already explained, with regard to extra police generally, that the chief reason why they are required is for the protection of individuals. In the North Riding of Tipperary there are six persons under constant protection, and 22 under protection by patrols—the number of police employed on this duty being six and 27 respectively, or a total of 33.

MR. T. P. GILL (Louth, S.): The right hon. Gentleman says there are 33 of the police engaged in protection duty. Will he say what the rest of the extra police are doing?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have said there are 43 extra men, and I have accounted for 33, the greater part.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us whether the extra police are doing any work?

it was the most peaceable county in the Circuit?

[No reply.]

ADMIRALTY — NAVAL OFFICERS — LIEUTENANTS AND SUB-LIEUTENANTS.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he can inform the House what are the exceptional measures that will have to be taken in time of war to provide the requisite number of Lieutenants and Sub-Lieutenants to serve as watch-keepers, and to take command of torpedo and picket boats, and how many hours watching out of every 24 their Lordships consider to be within the range of non-injurious duty for the average Naval Officer?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord George HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The exceptional measures alluded to would be, speaking generally, to call out all officers over whom the Admiralty had control, and who may be required—whether in the Reserves, retired, or specially employed. It has been generally held in the Service that three watches, or eight hours out of the 24, are the range of non-injurious watch-keeping duty which an officer can be called upon to perform continuously.

AFRICA (EAST COAST)—THE KING OF JOHANNA.

MR. A. E. PEASE (York) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the following telegram that has appeared in the newspapers:—

"Zanzibar, March 18. — The King of Johanna, the second largest of the Islands of the Comoro Group, having refused to receive a French Resident, the French Commandant at Mayotte promised that, if he assented, the French Government would endeavour to obtain an amendment of the Slavery Abolition Treaty with England. The King persisting, nevertheless, in his refusal, the French offered the Throne to the King's brother, who, however, declined to accept it. The French corvette Nisily was subsequently ordered to Johanna to bombard the place; " and, whether he can confirm the truth of this report; and, if so, whether the Government will make representations to the French Government, with a view of preventing any further interference, on the part of the French, with the King of Johanna, and take such steps as may be necessary to support the King in his adherence to the existing Slavery Abolition Treaty with England?

Mr. J. O'Connor (Tipperary)

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government, although they were aware that differences existed between the Sultan of Johanna and the French Authorities at Mayotte, have no information confirming the intelligence conveyed in the telegram from Zanzibar. Mr. Holmwood, Her Majesty's Acting Consul General at Zanzibar, has, however, received instructions to report on the matter.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—DETECTIVE CONSTABLE PETER MONAHAN.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many previous convictions for drunkenness, &c., were recorded against Detective Constable Peter Monahan; whether the young man Shea, whom he assaulted in Killarney, has lost the sight of the eye which was injured; and, whether it is in accordance with the Constabulary Rules and Regulations to continue as detective or policeman in plain clothes a man who has been convicted of assault and drunkenness?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, he was informed that there were no previous convictions for drunkenness recorded against the constable. As had been already stated, he was not convicted of assault. It was not a fact that Shea had lost the sight of an eye. The constable had not been continued as a detective.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—SERGEANTS JOHNSTON AND BRADY.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that a constable named Johnston was stationed in Tuam from the commencement of his service until the year 1885; whether he was then promoted to the rank of acting sergeant, and changed from Tuam to Oummer; whether he has been subsequently promoted to the rank of sergeant, and is now stationed again in Tuam, from whence he was first promoted, and whether this is contrary to the Constabulary Rules; if it is true that another sergeant named Brady, who had been stationed in Tuam only for four months, was ordered to another station to make room for Johnston; and, what are the reasons stated for the alleged exceptional method of procedure?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am informed by the Inspector General that there was nothing exceptional or contrary to the Regulations of the Constabulary Force in the transfers and promotions made in the cases of these men. The exchange of stations effected between the two sergeants was for the purpose of placing Sergeant Johnston in a barrack where there was accommodation for his family, a requirement which does not exist in the case of the other sergeant.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — MR. JEREMIAH HEGARTY.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If Mr. Jeremiah Hegarty, late of the Macroom Workhouse, now of Millstreet, has been appointed to the Commission of the Peace in the County of Cork; whether Mr. Hegarty is owner of a public-house in the town of Millstreet, and is also bailiff to the Landlord Defence League in Cork; whether he has been for some time past, and still continues, under police protection; if it is true that his police guard have objected to the treatment they have received at his hands; what reasons have been given for granting police protection to Mr. Hegarty; on how many occasions this year has a supplementary police patrol been sent to survey the route by which Mr. Hegarty was travelling; whether such police were supplied on Mr. Hegarty's application; whether the only people who frequent his public-house are policemen and emergency men; whether, in view of these facts, it is his intention to bring the appointment under the notice of the Lord Chancellor; and, by whom was Mr. Hegarty recommended for the said magisterial position? The hon. Member desired to supplement the Question, and to ask whether it was a fact that quite recently Mr. Hegarty compounded with his creditors?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, he knew nothing about the supplementary matter. Mr. Hegarty was a Roman Catholic gentleman of independent position. He was appointed by the Lord Chancellor on the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant of the County and other local gentlemen. It was not a fact that he held a publican's licence, the business formerly conducted by him having been transferred to his son. It was not true that he was the bailiff of the Landlord Defence League. Neither was it a fact that he was under special police protection, or that the police had complained of the treatment they had received at his hands. The police gave him and his property such protection as they thought he required; but he could not say how often they had patrolled the roads in consequence.

DR. TANNER: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether he thinks it right to appoint as a magistrate a late pauper of the Macroom Workhouse, and now a holder of a publican's licence; and, whether he thinks such an appointment will tend to the preservation of law and order in Cork?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant has nothing to do with the appointment of magistrates.

DR. TANNER: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us when the license was transferred from Hegarty to his son; whether it was not done immediately before Hegarty was appointed a magistrate; and whether, therefore, Hegarty was not practically a publican at the time of his appointment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The year before last, Sir.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) — THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL — COMMITTEE OF CONSTABLE BULMER.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Constable Bulmer, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, was committed to gaol by Mr. Coroner Rice on Wednesday last, for refusing to answer questions tending to discover the person who bayonnetted Patrick Hanlon, of Youghal; whether District Inspector Smith, to whom the Coroner handed the warrant for execution, has executed, or made any attempt to execute, the same; and, what steps the Government intend to take to insure the execution of the Coroner's warrant?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: I am informed that a warrant was issued by the Coroner for the committal of Constable Bulmer for refusing to answer a question which the constable, by the advice of his solicitor, declined to answer, on the ground that it might tend to criminate himself—he and his comrades having been previously charged by counsel for next-of-kin with wilful murder. As the warrant was considered by the District Inspector to be illegal in point of form, and as he would in such case have no protection if he executed it, he had held it over until he was advised as to its legality; but he undertook to produce Constable Bulmer if, and when, required in the meantime.

MR. CHANCE: What is the doubt about the warrant?

MR. HOLMES: I have given the reply I have received.

MR. CHANCE: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman answer the second part of the Question—namely, whether District Inspector Smith, to whom the Coroner handed the warrant for execution, has executed, or made any attempt to execute, the same?

MR. HOLMES: I have already answered that part of the Question. I have stated the District Inspector was in doubt as to the legality of the warrant.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): I wish to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman, whether it is competent for an Inspector of Police to decide for himself as to the legality or illegality of a warrant issued by the Coroner?

MR. HOLMES: I have already stated that it is not competent; but, inasmuch as a Coroner's or a Magistrate's warrant is no protection to the person directed to execute it, the District Inspector has a right to be advised upon it.

MR. CHANCE: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell what steps have been taken to see whether the warrant was illegal or not?

MR. HOLMES: The hon. Gentleman must be aware that the only answer I can give is the information I have received from those in the locality; but, of course, if the District Inspector's advice is that the warrant is legal, the warrant will be executed in the ordinary way.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I wish to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman, with reference to the question of the execution of the warrant of the Coroner at Youghal, when the warrant of the Coroner was issued? I am informed that it was issued last Wednesday. He can tell us, probably, whether that is correct; and how long the suspension of the execution of the warrant will be allowed to continue before the question is decided?

MR. HOLMES said, that the right hon. Gentleman was probably aware that he, in his capacity as Attorney General, had nothing whatever to do with this matter, and he had no information as regarded the date. The answer he had given was simply to the effect that the execution was suspended for a reasonable time, an undertaking being given that the man would be produced in the meantime, if required.

WAR OFFICE—GOVERNMENT WORKSHOPS AND ARSENALS—INSPECTION BY REPRESENTATIVES OF FOREIGN POWERS.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it has been the practice, whenever the Representatives of friendly Powers have made formal applications to inspect Government workshops and arsenals, or to obtain copies of drawings and plans of warships, machinery, or armaments, to grant the facilities sought by such persons; and, whether it is the case that Naval designs have been furnished to the American, Russian, and other Governments?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The War Department allow Representatives of friendly Powers, whose applications are forwarded by the Foreign Office, to inspect such workshops as do not contain secrets exclusively held, or supposed to be held, by Her Majesty's Government; and the same rules apply to the grant of drawings and plans. The Admiralty allow Foreign Naval Attachés free access to inspect the Government Naval Establishments. It is not the practice to allow them to obtain copies of drawings and plans of warships, machinery, or armaments. In exceptional cases drawings of designs have been given.

Mr. Chance

ARMY AND NAVY ESTIMATES—THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) asked, Whether the First Lord of the Treasury intended to proceed to-night with his Motion for a Select Committee to examine into the Army and Navy Estimates, and to report their observations thereon to the House?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, he had certainly hoped that the House would have accepted this Motion without debate. In the circumstances, it would not be in his power to proceed with it to-night. It was his intention to have made the Motion, in fulfilment of an engagement he made to the House; but it was not expected that a debate would arise upon it, seeing that full powers would be possessed by the Committee under the terms of the Motion.

COAL MINES REGULATION BILL.

In reply to MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.),

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.) said, the Bill was in print, and would, he hoped, be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow; but the question of when he would proceed with the second reading would depend on the course of the other Business of the House.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I beg to give Notice that I shall to-morrow ask leave to bring in a Bill to make better provision for the prevention and punishment of crime in Ireland, and for other purposes.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I wish, Sir, to say that, under the special circumstances of the Notice just given by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, I shall to-morrow, at half-past 4, move that the introduction and several stages of the Criminal Law and Procedure

(Ireland) Bill have precedence of all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion, including the Rules of Procedure, whenever it shall be set down by the Government as the first Business of the day. And, Sir, with reference to the inquiry addressed to me on Thursday night last by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), I beg to say that it is the intention of the Government to proceed with this Motion to-morrow, and, I hope, with the consequent Motion of which my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant has given Notice. In the event of the Bill being brought in to-morrow, or Wednesday, it will be printed at once, and the second reading will be taken on Monday next. We hope to proceed with the Rules of Procedure on Thursday and Friday.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Sir, I beg to give Notice that to-morrow, when the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) makes the Motion that he has just announced, I shall move the following Amendment:—

“That this House declines to set aside the Business of the Nation in favour of a measure for increasing the stringency of the Criminal Law in Ireland, while no effectual security has been taken against the abuse of the law by the exaction of excessive rents.”

PARLIAMENT—ORDER—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ORDER OF THE DAY FOR COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY—EXCLUSION OF MOTIONS.

MR. T. P. GILL (Louth, S.): I wish, Mr. Speaker, to put a Question to you upon a point of Order. I see that there are two Notices standing upon the Order Book in the names of the hon. Members for North and South Antrim (Mr. C. E. Lewis and Mr. Macartney) for Tuesday, the 5th of April, a date when the House will probably be in recess for the Easter holidays. One of them is for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the alleged system of jury-packing in Ireland, while the other expresses approval of the action of Her Majesty's Government in reference to the telegram of instructions to the police sent by Captain Plunkett to the District Inspector at Youghal. I wish, Sir, to have your ruling, as a matter of Order, upon both of those Notices, having regard to your ruling in the case of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), who desired to raise a debate upon jury-packing when the Address in reply to the Queen's Speech was under discussion. You then ruled that it was not competent for my hon. Friend to allude to the question of jury-packing so long as there was a Notice standing on the Paper in reference to the subject. Now, Sir, one of these Notices refers to the question of jury-packing, and the other to the instructions of Captain Plunkett to the police of Youghal to fire upon the people if necessary. What I wish to know is, whether your ruling extends to the preclusion of Amendments to the Motion, "That you do leave the Chair," for the purpose of going into Committee of Supply upon the Civil Service Estimates; and whether your ruling will extend further to the preclusion of any debate upon the subjects to which these Notices apply in Committee of Supply?

MR. SPEAKER: I cannot presume to settle cases before they arise. I must see and hear what is said in debate before I can give an opinion.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I also wish to ask a Question, Sir, on a point of Order. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has just announced that he will take the second reading of a particular Bill on Monday next. But that Bill has not yet been printed, seeing that permission has not been given by the House to read it a first time. Therefore, I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is not contravening the Order of the House which prevents a subsequent stage from being put down before the previous stage has been taken?

MR. SPEAKER: I presume that before the Motion is put down for the second reading the Bill itself will have been printed.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I do not know whether I have put the Question quite clearly. At present the House has not given permission for the introduction and first reading of the Bill, nor has it been printed. Nevertheless, the right hon. Gentleman has announced that he will put down the Order of the Day for the second reading next Monday. What I wish to know is, whether, in doing so, the right hon. Gentleman is not directly contravening a Standing Order of the House?

Mr. T. P. Gill

MR. SPEAKER: Of course, I presume that, in the event of the Bill being read a first time, it will be printed in the interval between that stage and the second reading on Monday.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): In reference to your ruling, Sir, as to the Question put by the hon. Member for South Louth (Mr. T. P. Gill) relating to two Motions standing in the Order Book in the names of the two hon. Members for Antrim, relating to jury-packing and the telegram of Captain Plunkett, I wish to know whether, supposing it is necessary to discuss the question of jury-packing—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I gave no ruling on the Question raised. I declined to give any ruling.

MR. CONYBEARE: I was only going to ask your ruling, Sir, in connection with a Bill of which Notice has been given by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, whether we shall be precluded from discussing the Question relating to jury packing in connection with that Bill, owing to the Notice of Motion which is already standing upon the Notice Paper?

MR. SPEAKER: I cannot see that any objection arises as a point of Order.

IRISH LAND BILL.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government can give any intimation as to the probable date on which they will introduce their Irish Land Bill?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): It is the intention of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland to make a statement on this subject almost immediately.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. COURTNEY in the Chair. [5.15 P.M.]

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £992,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Victuals and Clothing for Seamen and Marines, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st of March, 1888."

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): The discussion which took place on Thursday night in respect of the Navy was almost entirely confined to the special subjects of which Notice had been given by Amendment on going into Committee of Supply on the Navy Votes; and it was not possible, therefore, to enter into a general discussion upon naval questions and the policy indicated in the Memorandum of the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton). I think, therefore, that the noble Lord has done well in giving an opportunity on this occasion for raising a further discussion upon the general questions connected with the Navy on the Victualling Vote. In opening that discussion, I am prepared fully to subscribe to all that was said by other hon. Members on Thursday night in regard to the Statement or Memorandum submitted to the House by the noble Lord, both as to its ability and completeness; and I hope that the example which has now been set will be followed in succeeding years, and that hereafter a printed Statement will be submitted to the House in substitution of the personal explanation which has hitherto been made by the First Lord of the Admiralty. At the same time, it appears to me that an annual Statement of this kind will have much more permanent interest than a mere formal speech in introducing the Navy Estimates; and, therefore, it is most desirable that such Statements should be perfectly impartial, and not of a partizan character. I regret to say that much evil has been done in past times in consequence of mixing up partizan statements in regard to the Navy and questions of policy in the discussions upon the Navy Estimates. Such a practice is, in my opinion, much to be deprecated; and I should have hoped that in a Statement of this kind it would have been most carefully avoided. I have to complain, however, that the Statement made by the noble Lord in some respects appears strongly to partake of a partizan character, and to be specially directed against the shipbuilding policy of his Predecessors, and especially of Lord Northbrook, who was First Lord of the Admiralty for four or five years. The parts of the Statement which I take objection to in this Memorandum are twofold. In the first place, the Memorandum, so far as it deals with a retrospective history of the Navy, contains this assertion. The noble Lord says that—

"During the years from 1881 to 1885, while every other Naval Power in Europe was increasing its Naval Expenditure, England alone stood still."

The noble Lord further goes on to say that during that time England has been the only Power not to recognize the necessity of important changes in naval construction being brought to bear, with a view of obtaining thicker armour for ships and greater speed. It appears, he says, that other Powers have been largely engaged in producing vessels of greater power and speed; and that we alone have stood still, England having been the last Naval Power to recognize the new condition of affairs. The other statement to which I desire to call attention is contained in pages 14 and 15 of the Memorandum, which gives a valuation of the vessels comprising the Fleet, and also an estimate of the amount required to replace vessels which have become obsolete from old age or wastage. The noble Lord arrives at an estimate that £1,800,000 is required annually for replacing the Fleet, and he ends by saying that the expenditure for the years immediately preceding 1885 was very much less than that amount. Now, I think I shall be able to show that both of the Statements to which I have referred are untrue, and have no foundation in fact; and, further, that they are exactly the opposite of the real state of affairs. I do not mean to say that the noble Lord has made a wilful misstatement, but he has asserted a fact, probably on the authority of others, without sufficient consideration. If the noble Lord had gone a little further back in his historical retrospect and had included the three years before 1881, he would have then found himself in conflict with some of his own Colleagues, and especially the right hon. Gentleman who is now First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), and who at that time was First Lord of the Admiralty, in regard to whose administration some of the allegations made by the noble Lord may with great truth be said. I have no desire, however, to enter into a recriminatory discussion with the First Lord of the Treasury. I have not mentioned the matter for the purpose of bringing charges against the right hon. Gentleman, but simply to show what was the condition in which Lord Northbrook found the Navy, and the changes during his administration which were made in it. I find that the expenditure for new ships during the three years which preceded 1881 amounted to £1,430,000 a-year, which is very considerably below the point the noble Lord estimates as the proper average expenditure on new ships, and very considerably below what it was in past times and what it has been since. The Gunnery Vote had been reduced to less than £400,000. That, again, was the period in which special exertions were made by the French for reconstructing their Navy. Their increased expenditure commenced in 1876, and it reached its maximum in 1879; and for the three years he had alluded to it amounted to exactly the same sum as that expended in England—namely, £1,430,000 a-year. When my noble Friend Lord Northbrook came into Office in 1886, he recognized the fact that the Shipbuilding Vote had been brought down to a dangerously low point, as compared with France. I was a Colleague of the noble Lord in the Admiralty at the time, and I well recollect pointing out to him what I had frequently urged in this House during the naval administration of the First Lord of the Treasury—that, having regard to what was being done in France, the expenditure of the past few years in regard to the Shipbuilding Vote for the English Dockyards and by contract, especially that for iron-clads, had been brought to a very low point. I further expressed an opinion that unless a considerable addition was made to the Shipbuilding Vote there was likely to be great alarm in the country on the subject, and probably a scare would arise which, in the end, would involve a much larger expenditure. I always recognized, for my part, that there were special reasons for the great increase which took place in the expenditure in the French Dockyards. Their vessels were built of wood, armour-plated, instead of being completely constructed of iron. They were perishing away, and would not stand the wear and tear to which they were subjected.

It was, therefore, found necessary to make great exertions to bring up the French Fleet to a proper condition; but yet the fact remained that in these three years the expenditure in the French Dockyards upon shipbuilding was exactly the same as the expenditure in the English Dockyards and by contract. My noble Friend fully admitted the necessity of doing considerably more in the direction of building new ships, and during each of the next four years he added largely every year to the Shipbuilding Vote, and the consequence was that the average expenditure for the next four years during Lord Northbrook's administration amounted to £1,900,000, or £500,000 above the average of the previous three years, and £100,000 a-year above the amount which the noble Lord opposite, in the Statement presented to the House, asserts to be necessary for the annual replacement of old vessels. Lord Northbrook brought up the annual expenditure upon new ships from the point at which he found it—£1,400,000—to the sum of £2,240,000 in the year 1884-5, and the average for the whole period was £1,900,000, showing an increase of 40 per cent on the average of the previous three years. This increase was almost wholly devoted to iron-clads and the larger class of cruisers. The expenditure on iron-clads has been brought up from £700,000 to £1,300,000, or 90 per cent. Therefore I say it is not true that during the years from 1881 to 1885 the naval administration in this country stood still. The fact is that during the same time the French Government made no further increase in their Navy Vote, and the expenditure in their Dockyards during four years averaged precisely the same amount at which it stood in the previous three years. Therefore, it is exactly the opposite of the truth to say that the shipbuilding in the English Dockyards stood still while there was a rapid increase in the French Dockyards. Precisely the reverse was the case—namely, that this country increased its expenditure by 40 per cent during the four years and by 90 per cent upon iron-clads, while the expenditure of the French Dockyards upon the same class of vessels remained stationary. During that period Lord Northbrook commenced eight iron-clads against four laid down by the French. Six of these vessels can run 17 knots an hour, whereas the average speed of the four vessels laid down in the French Dockyards is only 15 knots, showing an advantage in the case of the English vessels of no less than two knots per hour per vessel. Then, again, five of the English vessels are constructed to carry guns of 67 tons, whereas the French vessels only carry guns of 50 tons; and as to the coal-carrying capacity, I find that six of our vessels have been constructed to carry 1,200 tons of coal each, whereas the French vessels can only carry 600 tons, —thus showing that the English vessels are provided with double the amount of coal-carrying capacity which the French vessels possess. Lord Northbrook also laid down, during the same period, several very large and fast cruisers of the Mersey type, faster and better vessels than the French. All these vessels were either completed, or will be completed, within the present year, while none of the French vessels are within two years of completion. I think I have shown that the statements contained in the noble Lord's Memorandum are not in respect of the years 1881-4 justified by the facts of the case; and I with great confidence appeal to the noble Lord to alter his Statement, because I am quite sure he does not desire that a Memorandum of this kind, which gives a retrospect of the history of the Navy, should contain inaccurate assertions, especially when this Memorandum will hereafter in all probability be looked upon as an authentic record. I trust the noble Lord will realize the fact that his Statements are not correct, and that he will rectify them so as to bring them in accordance with the true facts of the case. In 1885 unquestionably Lord Northbrook agreed, under the pressure of public opinion, to propose to the House a special Programme, involving a further expenditure, which was to be spread over five years, of £3,100,000. This alarm was, I think, occasioned by public opinion not fully understanding, as I believe, the enormous accession of strength which is gradually being attained. The alarm had its origin, I believe, in the fear as to our relations with France arising out of that damnable hereditas—Egypt. Lord Northbrook had always said, that while he believed that the rate of expenditure on new ships which he had attained would, if continued for a few years longer, have been quite sufficient, yet he was not unwilling to avail himself of public opinion to hasten the building of ships by a special Programme; and he therefore applied to Parliament for the special Vote I have mentioned of £3,100,000 to be spread over five years. The expenditure was subsequently increased to £3,500,000, and was spread over three years only instead of five; with this additional money two additional iron-clads and five belted cruisers—which are, in fact, second-class iron-clads—are being built. The result was that a very large addition was made to the Navy, and whatever credit is due for that is entirely due to Lord Northbrook, and not to the Board over which the noble Lord opposite now presides. Let me point out that none of the ships provided under the special Programme of 1885 are yet completed; and, therefore, if it is really the case, at this moment that the provision of the ships in the first reserve of the British Navy is more full and ample than it had ever been before. The noble Lord has claimed credit for the Navy of England being stronger than the Navy of any three other Powers.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): No; if the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to correct him, what I said had reference to the number of ships on commission.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Then the noble Lord said that the number of English ships on commission were equal to the strength of the three most powerful Navies.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: No; I said nothing about the strength of the Navy; but I said that the number of ships on commission of the iron-clad class was larger than those on commission of any three other naval Powers.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: At all events, we had three times the number commissioned; and I think if the noble Lord compares the strength of the vessels he will make a similar admission in regard to that point. I think he will also be prepared to make this further admission that at this moment, in regard to the vessels which are now in the first reserve, and are coming into the first reserve, the course of the present year, the Navy of England will other navies infinitely better than it has done with the navies of Foreign Powers for many years past. If that be so, it seems that the vessels being built under the special Programme of Lord Northbrook are not yet completed; is it not clear that this satisfactory provision has been made out of the normal Votes for the Navy from 1881 to 1885? The noble Lord has attempted to throw discredit upon the special Programme of Lord Northbrook in two ways. First, he said that the adoption of it tended to throw the Dockyards into confusion; and, secondly, that it by a sudden increase led to waste. I think he ought to have remembered that all the vessels which came under the Vote of Credit were ordered to be built by contract, and not one of them in the Dockyards. Therefore it cannot be the case that any of the vessels building in the Dockyards were interfered with by the special Programme, or that the work of the Dockyards was thereby placed in confusion. The noble Lord says it would have been far better if some of these ships had been built at an earlier period. Now, if the seven big vessels contracted for in 1885 had been contracted for three years earlier, we might have got some of them earlier; but, on the other hand they would have been inferior in many respects as to speed and other qualities. We have certainly got much more powerful vessels and vessels of much greater speed. In fact, the improvements in naval construction have been so rapid that three or four years make a great difference, and there can be no doubt that the vessels bought under that Programme are much better and more powerful than if they had been ordered three or four years earlier. Then as to the cost, it is no doubt certain that in consequence of the depression in the trade, the vessels have been bought at a far more reasonable cost than they could have been if contracted for sooner. I do not, however, wish to make much of that point, and I only put it against the attempt of the noble Lord to discredit the special Programme, and to assert that it would have been far better if the vessels had been constructed earlier. I have now done with this part of the case, and there is only one other point I wish to mention. It has reference to the contract for the engines of the Renown and the Sans- pareil. Lord Northbrook is in Italy at this moment, and unable to make a personal explanation. I have, however, received a letter from him, in which he says that he assumes full and entire personal responsibility for what has been done in connection with these vessels. In the course of his letter he expresses surprise in regard to two points. One is, that the hon. Member for the Govan Division of Lanarkshire (Mr. Pearce) should have been included in the reference with respect to a case in which he himself had been one of the tenderers. The noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty has very hastily assumed that because the engines of the Nile and Trafalgar contracted for by the same firm a year later were at a somewhat lower price, therefore there must necessarily have been a mistake. That shows very little knowledge of business. The engines, though for larger ships, were of the same size, horse-power and pattern, and that very fact alone, undoubtedly, enabled the contractors—Messrs. Humphrys—to offer a lower price. The other point is, that Lord Northbrook should never have been informed that a special inquiry was taking place by a Committee of which the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) was a member, and that he should have been afforded no opportunity of making an explanation on the subject. I think that many hon. Members will agree with the surprise expressed by Lord Northbrook upon these two points. I have felt it my duty to make this statement in regard to Lord Northbrook—I will not say in his defence, but in regard to the conduct of himself personally, and his policy and that of all of his Colleagues. I believe, myself, that the naval administration of Lord Northbrook during the period I have adverted to will bear full investigation, and will stand against any of the somewhat carping criticisms which have been made upon it by the First Lord. Lord Northbrook's fame has been mainly achieved as an administrator; and I believe that the present Government showed their appreciation of it by offering him a seat in their Cabinet. I should like to know what form the statement the First Lord would have assumed if Lord Northbrook had been one of his Colleagues at this moment? I cannot think that any reference to Lord Northbrook would have appeared in this document in so damaging and derogatory a form with regard to Lord Northbrook during the time he was First Lord of the Admiralty. Turning from these matters to the Estimates now before the Committee, I find that the Estimates for the coming year show a reduction of £793,000 as compared with last year. I confess that when I saw that amount I was somewhat surprised, especially when I recollected that the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) had left the Government, because, as he told us, he could not induce his Colleagues at the Admiralty and the War Office to assent to a reduction of even £500,000. It will be recollected that the noble Lord, in the explanation which he made at the beginning of this year, told the House that he had had a discussion with his two Colleagues at the War Office and the Admiralty with reference to a reduction of their Estimates. He said he would have been quite prepared to remain in Office if he could have induced them to make a reduction of £1,000,000. He said, further, that £100,000 or £200,000 less than that would have satisfied him, and that he was not prepared to say he would not have remained in Office if a reduction of £500,000 only could have been promised. He did not, however, find that either of his Colleagues was prepared to meet him in that respect; and therefore he was bound to send in his resignation. Certainly, in the face of that statement, I was surprised to see that the First Lord of the Admiralty claimed credit for a reduction of £700,000 in the Estimates of the year as compared with last year. I shall, however, be prepared to show that this reduction is, in fact, of an illusory character, and will not bear examination. There is an increase in the Gunnery Vote for naval purposes of £292,000. The effect of the Statement of the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) is that there has been that increase in the Vote as compared with last year. However, the comparison of the noble Lord, from the Chancellor of the Exchequer's point of view, should be made with the Estimates of last year, only including the addition of the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: That is always done.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: No, it is not—at all events, not for financial purposes. The noble Lord knows well that there will be further Supplementary Estimates in the coming year, as there have been in the past; and, in order that the Chancellor of the Exchequer may deal with the matter financially, he should make a comparison with the Original Estimates, and not with the Estimates including the addition of Supplementary Estimates. Now, the Supplementary Estimates were £272,000; therefore, deducting these two items, the real diminution, as compared with the Original Estimate last year, from the point at which the Chancellor of the Exchequer would look at the matter, is only some £240,000 lower; and I am not sure that that sum is not also illusory, because the Supplementary Estimates have been caused by hastening on the contract work, and enabling more money to be spent in the current year. If that work had not been hastened, it is quite clear that all the money paid under the Supplementary Estimates to the contractors would fall upon the coming year; and I should like to know from the noble Lord if that has been done which was so much complained of by the Auditor and Comptroller General, and whether the money was advanced to contractors for work in hand, or whether the work has not been hastened. At all events, I am right in saying that if this contract work had not been hurried so as to bring it within the present year what is due to the coming year would have been included in the Estimates of this year, and the result would have been exactly the same. There has been a benefit to the coming year at the expense of the next year to the extent of £240,000. Taking the two Estimates together—the Army and the Navy Estimates—there is a saving only, I think, of £260,000. I cannot understand why the Government, for the purpose of saving a Colleague so valuable to them as the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington, might not have advanced a little further and made a further reduction of the sum of £240,000. That would have been very easy to do, especially as the noble Lord pointed out that the liabilities at the end of the coming year would be very much reduced from what they were at the beginning of the year. Therefore, I think the Government might easily, by postponing the contract work for three or four months, have arranged that the payments should be made to come into the financial year, and then the further reduction the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington asked for would have been effected, and in that way the Government would have saved a valuable Colleague. I can only surmise that there was some other motive on the part of the Colleagues of the noble Lord for getting rid of him than the difference that existed between them of £240,000. The programme of the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty in regard to new work is of a very moderate character. It provides for five protected cruisers of 2,500 tons each and a few smaller vessels. Looking at the very large increase which has been made during the last few years, I am not prepared to say that the noble Lord was bound to go further, but at all events it appears to me to be somewhat out of harmony with the noble Lord's demands last year when he supported the views of the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford), that an expenditure of £5,000,000 to be provided by terminable annuities ought to be spent upon cruisers. The demand made by the noble Lord last year, was that it would be necessary to construct immediately no less than 20 large cruisers, and some 20 smaller ones at a cost of £5,000,000. I congratulate the Government at the conclusion at which they have now arrived. I think they are right in making a more moderate demand; and I congratulate the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty in having succeeded in restraining his noble Colleague, and in having brought the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone so much within his demand of last year. One of the most interesting parts of the statement of the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty has reference to the future. There is one statement to which I have already adverted shortly—namely, the valuation which the noble Lord has already made in regard to the effective ships in the Navy, and also the annual sum required for supplying the waste in the Navy. But I would observe that the statement contained in the Memorandum is a very different statement indeed to that which was made by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty in the course of the Recess at a meeting in Lancashire. In the course of that speech, the Secretary to the Admiralty estimated the effective ships of the Fleet to be of the value of £50,000,000; and he gave them an average life of only 15 years, bringing out the fact that an annual sum of £3,000,000 was required in order to replace the Fleet—in other words, he considered that £3,000,000 should be expended every year on new ships in order to keep up the Navy to its normal amount of value—namely, £50,000,000. He wound up in the manner usual with the present Board by making a fierce attack upon his Predecessors. He said that whereas £3,000,000 were annually required, Lord Northbrook had only provided £1,800,000, and hence the neglect of the Navy. When I read that statement I looked upon it as a very exaggerated one, and I thought there were some extraordinary fallacies connected with it. I had in past times made calculations of this kind, and I had brought out far different results. I, therefore, proceeded at once to make a valuation for myself from the information I had before me. My calculations brought out that the fair value of the existing vessels belonging to the Fleet was £35,000,000. I thought that 15 years was a very short life to give to our iron-clads. I find that out of the 56 iron-clads we now have of an effective character, no less than 20 have had a longer life than 15 years, including the Hercules and the Sultan, and there are 22 others—such, for instance, as the Monarch and the Audacious—all excellent vessels which have had a good deal more than 20 years' life. They are still valuable vessels with many years before them. We have not yet had sufficient experience of the cruisers of a larger type to allow us to form any data with regard to them, because it is only within the last few years that iron-clads have been substituted for wooden vessels; but the Active and Volage, built 18 years ago, are still very valuable vessels. In regard to our troop-ships, I may mention three of those vessels. The Himalaya was purchased 33 years ago, and is as good as she was on the first day she was constructed. The other two—the Tamar and the Orientes—were both of them built more than 32 years ago. Therefore, I think it is a mistake to assign so short an average of life as 15 years for our iron-clads; and, under these circumstances, I found that the sum required annually for the replacement of effective ships amounts only to £1,800,000, instead of the £3,000,000 put down by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood). I was very nearly writing to the Press to complain of the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty on this subject, and to give my version of the value of the Fleet, and the annual cost of replacement; but I refrained from doing so believing that the hon. Gentleman would renew his attack in this House. I was rather surprised, therefore, when I looked at the Memorandum of the noble Lord to find that he had completely thrown over the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty; that he had abandoned altogether the hon. Gentleman's valuation, and had brought out a result almost identical with that which I, as an amateur, had arrived. Instead of taking the value of the vessels at £50,000,000, he brought them down to the point of £39,000,000 only, including the ship-building, and he conceives that 15 years is too short a limit to assign as the average life of our vessels. The result he brings out is precisely similar to that which I had done—namely, £1,800,000 compared with the £3,000,000 his Colleague the Secretary to the Admiralty proposed in the Recess. I think we are entitled to some explanation from the Secretary to the Admiralty upon this point, and to ask whether he concurs with the valuation now made by the noble Lord. If so, I think we ought to have some apology from the hon. Gentleman for the attack which he made upon his Predecessors, and which he founded on this mis-statement. It is clear, then, that if the noble Lord is right, and he believes himself his Estimate is a very fair one, and is, if at all, in excess, we may look forward to a considerable reduction in our expenditure on new ships in coming years, when the special programme of 1881 is completed. We are expending this year £2,800,000 on new ships, or £1,000,000 in excess of the noble Lord's Estimate. This excess involves a corresponding increase on the Vote for guns and gun-mountings.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

I feel little doubt, therefore, that we may look forward to a reduced expenditure of £2,000,000 in the total Votes, including the Gunnery Vote. Turning to another point, I have observed with pleasure, on reading the Memorandum of the noble Lord, that the Admiralty are making efforts for the reform of the Admiralty organization, both in the Admiralty itself and in the Dockyards. I can assure the noble Lord that on this side of the House we heartily sympathize with him, and are prepared to do our very best to assist him in carrying out any reforms he may make. I say this because I can recollect the time when it was very much otherwise. The last attempt to reform the Dockyard administration was made by my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) in 1870, and at that time a most tremendous political opposition was raised against the proposed reform, which did not confine itself to this House, but was experienced in the Dockyards themselves, and within the walls of the Admiralty also. The result was that every kind of obstruction was interposed in every way to the reform of the Dockyard administration, and I am sorry to say that in the end things went very much to the bad, especially under the régime of Mr. Ward Hunt. I attribute much of what has taken place since in regard to the Dockyards, to the unfortunate way in which this attempt to reform the Dockyard administration was received. I can assure the noble Lord that none of his reforms will be treated by us in that spirit, but we shall endeavour to assist him to the best of our ability in carrying them out. I am certainly afraid that he is attempting too much at once. Dockyard reforms can only be carried out slowly and with the greatest care, and the noble Lord will find that it is not so much the system that is at fault as the men. It is difficult to find good men to place in responsible positions in order to see that the reforms you propose to introduce are properly carried out. The present system of Dockyard responsibility is such as to prevent the growth of Dockyard reforms. There is one change which the noble Lord has made which I think is in the right direction, although I cannot say that I think it goes far enough. The appointment of civil assistants to the Naval Superintendents of Dockyards. I say that these appointments are in the right direction, but they are only a very small step in the right direction. Let me point out to the noble Lord and the House what has really been done. The Admiralty have appointed a highly-paid officer in each of the Dockyards as a civil assistant to the Naval Superintendent. This officer has a salary of £1,000 a-year, which is more than is attached to the post of Chief Constructor in the Dockyards. At the same time, the civil assistant has no direct responsibility of any kind. He is not able to give a simple command or order to any one single man in the Dockyard; he is merely the assistant of the Naval Superintendent, to advise the Naval Superintendent, and to act the part of an aide-de-camp or a kind of a spy going about the Dockyard seeing if there is anything that ought to be done, and then advising the Naval Superintendent upon the matter. Perhaps even the discharge of this duty may do good, and I believe it has done good in finding out evils of various kinds, and bringing them under the attention of the Naval Superintendent. But the reform is one which I maintain does not go far enough, and I think it is absolutely necessary to impose responsibility upon these men, and to give them some definite function to perform with full command over others. I look with great alarm at divided responsibility. Let me suppose a case. There might happen to be a difference of opinion between the Chief Constructor of the Dockyard and the civil adviser of the Naval Superintendent—say in regard to some important point of naval construction. Divided responsibility in such a respect would be a most serious matter, and might lead to a naval disaster. Therefore, I cannot but think that the noble Lord will have at a very short date to go much further, and to give these important officers some real and direct responsibility in the Dockyards. That ought to be the true end and aim of any real Dockyard reform, and I do not believe that any satisfactory reform can be carried out in the Dockyards unless you are able to build up a complete system of management and control under one supreme civil Head under the Naval Superintendents. When you have done that, the Naval Superintendents in the smaller yards, such as Pembroke and Sheerness, will be found redundant and may be dispensed with. With respect to all that the noble Lord has said about stores, I fully concur. I recollect well that when those doctrines were upheld by the right hon. Member for South Edinburgh and Mr. Baxter, they were denounced as tending to reduce the strength of the Navy by depleting the storehouses. In regard to reforms in the Admiralty itself, I listened with some interest to the remarks made by the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) upon that subject, especially in reference to the duties of the Naval Lords, in regard to which he said that great changes are taking place. He said that all of them in future would be consulted, and that they will all have to write minutes in regard to their own Department, and that nothing will be done without their approval. I listened to the noble Lord attentively, but I could detect no real change as having taken place. Therefore, I would ask the noble Lord to point out distinctly what change has been effected. The Order in Council distinctly lays down the responsibility of each Naval Lord; and in my time the Naval Lords signed the "Estimates." The noble Lord was obliged to admit in his speech that the Navy Estimates were flung at his head without his having been allowed to see them before they were presented, and that he was asked to put his signature to this important document without having been consulted in the matter. I should like to know if that is the result of these new Rules? Is it the outcome of the new Rules that the Naval Lord is required to sign his name to the Estimates without ever having seen them? If so, it appears to me to be a very singular arrangement; but I would venture to say that the refusal of the Naval Lord to sign the Estimates is an unprecedented occurrence, full of danger in regard to the future. The noble Lord cannot absolve himself from the general tenor of these Estimates even by refusing his signature to them, because every Naval Lord is practically responsible for the Estimates as a whole, and if he does not care to be responsible for them his proper course is to give up his post. Although, therefore, the noble Lord did not sign the Estimates he is responsible to the House and the country for them, and if he fails to do that he ought not to be there. His only alternative is to resign. There is one other point to which I desire to allude. The noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty gave an explanation of what is to occur in the future when new ships are under construction. I understood him to say that each Naval Lord is to be asked what he wants in a new ship—each Naval Lord is to lay down his requirements—and then the Admiralty are to call upon the Constructors to build a ship in accordance with their demands. If that is to be the new plan of the Admiralty in regard to new ships I do not know where it may lead us. Certainly not to the construction of a good vessel. I hold that one of the most important and responsible duties of the Admiralty is that of determining the designs of the larger vessels. It has been my lot to have been at the Board of Admiralty on several occasions when vessels of an important type have been agreed upon, and I know of no more responsible and difficult duty than that of arriving at such a conclusion. On all occasions the Naval Lords have been fully consulted; but so also was the Scientific Department of the Admiralty, represented by the Chief Constructors. There has often been a divergence of opinion between those two branches of the Navy; but I have never known a case where agreement was not finally arrived at between the scientific element and the naval element of the Admiralty. I think I may say that the great changes which have taken place in the designs of vessels during the last 20 years have not been due to naval officers, but that they have been forced on the Naval Service, in a great measure, by the Scientific Departments of the Admiralty, and by the Scientific Departments of other countries—especially of France. If naval officers' advice alone had been taken we should have made very little advance indeed. Eventually an agreement has been come to between the scientific department and the leading naval officers representing the Admiralty. As a general rule, the object of the naval profession is a very conservative one on these subjects, and perhaps rightly; but I do not believe that the most eminent naval men would stand by that conservative feeling unless they were egged on by the scientific branches of the Admiralty. The consequence has been that the designs of our vessels have been the result of a combination between the best scientific and the best naval opinion. A big ship must be in the nature of a compromise in which various elements of strength are combined, as to which there is room for great difference of opinion. As a general rule, it has been possible to bring the Naval and Scientific authorities into harmony by some concessions on either side. The importance of this has already been brought under the notice of the House in the case of the Nile and Trafalgar. The facts of that case have not been disputed by the noble Lord. Their importance consists in this, that for the first time the scientific constructors were not consulted, but were directed what to design upon the sole advice of the First Naval Lord. An order was given by the Board of Admiralty to construct these two vessels on certain conditions laid down by the advice of naval officers. The constructors objected, and reported that the vessels were not what they ought to be for the enormous expenditure devoted to them, and that they were very deficient in certain qualities, especially in speed. The constructors entered their protest, and asked that a Royal Commission would be appointed similar to that presided over by Lord Dufferin. I am not going into the whole subject of the designs of these two vessels; but I confess that the result of the debate on Thursday last was to impress me with the highest importance of the demand which has been made for a Royal Commission. That step, I believe, would result in reassuring public opinion as to the vessels already constructed after the attacks which have been made upon them by the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed), which seem to me to be exaggerated, and most unfair to Sir Nathaniel Barnaby and Mr. White. I am afraid that the noble Lord, in the course which he has pursued, has promoted distrust in regard to some of the vessels which have been built, and that he has not stood up for the officials of the Admiralty as he ought to have done. I cannot help bearing in mind what the noble Lord stated last year as to the construction of the Agamemnon and the Ajax, and I think—having regard to the cussion on Thursday it would be wise, at the present moment, to appoint a Commission of design, not with a view of altering any of the vessels now under construction, because that could not be done, but to reassure the public mind as to the character of the vessels now being constructed, and also with a view of laying down the conditions which are in future to be followed when new vessels are to be built. It is quite certain that before very long there will be a new departure in the case of vessels of large tonnage. I believe that the French Government are not commencing any new vessels of large tonnage, nor are they engaged, at the present moment, in laying down any large iron-clad at all. It is, therefore, evident that we are approaching some other line, and in view of that I think it would be well that a Committee of Design, similar to that presided over by Lord Dufferin, should be appointed again for the purpose of considering the designs on which the future construction of vessels should be based. I make this remark in no carping spirit. I think the programme of the noble Lord, for the coming year, is a wise and moderate one, and that it will afford an opportunity of considering what should be the character of our vessels in the future. It is quite evident that the days of iron-clads of the type of the Colossus and others are numbered, and it is right that the Government should be fully advised before taking a new departure. With regard to another point, I entirely agree with what has been stated as to the education of naval officers, and the results of the inquiry of the Ravensworth Commission. I regret what the noble Lord said about it; but I do not propose to refer to that matter now, although I shall certainly take the opportunity of expressing my views upon it at greater length on some other Vote. There is only one other point I desire to allude to. I read with pleasure the statement made by the noble Lord with regard to the personnel of the Fleet. He said that the waste of men is far less than formerly, and that the service has become more popular. I rejoice at that, for after all the personnel of the Fleet is by far the most important part of it. We can improvise in time of war to a great extent the matériel of the Fleet, but we cannot improvise officers and men of the highest quality. That must always be a work of time with respect to the matériel of the Fleet. No one can foretell what would be the requirements of the next naval war. My own opinion is that something very much more simple than the cumbersome and costly constructions of the last few years will be the platform on which our men will have to fight, and that science will discover something appropriate to the time, which will be improvised quicker than the iron-clad. What it may be we cannot foretell, but whatever it may be it will require hearts of steel to man our vessels. But having the greatest confidence in the personnel of the Fleet; knowing that our officers and seamen will be men of great courage and of the highest intellect, I feel that they will be adequate to any duty that may be imposed upon them, and that they will maintain the interests of the Service, and of the Empire wherever they may be called upon to act.

CAPTAIN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) stated that he is not quite sure the next Secretary to the Admiralty will know the form of vessel in which the seamen of our Fleet will have to fight. He, perhaps, thus explains his own position when Secretary to the Admiralty himself. At the beginning of his speech the right hon. Gentleman alluded to the fact, as being generally recognized, that questions relating to the Navy were not Party questions. Yet the gist of the whole of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was that of a Party politician. Now I am afraid that it is this Party spirit which has injured the efficiency of the Navy in the past, and that if the efficiency of the Navy is really to be restored on a firm basis, it will be as well to discard any partizan feeling when discussing matters in which the Admiralty are concerned, and by hon. Members dropping their politics for the time. The right hon. Gentleman, in praising the policy of Lord Northbrook, quite forgot to tell us which policy of that noble Lord he was praising. Was it the policy of March, 1884, when this House brought a considerable amount of pressure to bear on the Representatives of the Government, when it was demanded that an inquiry should be instituted into the condition of the Navy, when it was asserted that the House and country were dissatisfied with the existing state of things, and when the proposal was resisted by the Representatives of the Admiralty in this House, and especially by Mr. Brassey—now Lord Brassey—on behalf of the Government? He said, in March, 1884, that the Admiralty were satisfied that “the addition they were making for the Fleet was sufficient to maintain our naval supremacy, and that it would be impolitic to propose the sensational Estimates which the critics of the Government policy demanded.”

The right hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) maintained that it was “impossible for the Government to allow an inquiry to be instituted into the state of the Fleet on the supposition that its condition was unsatisfactory.”

That was what Lord Northbrook's Administration stated in March, 1884; but in the month of November in the same year they came down to this House and asked for an additional expenditure of over £3,000,000, because they were then altogether dissatisfied with the condition of the Fleet. Which of these two policies of Lord Northbrook is it to which the right hon. Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) has been referring? I think he ought to have specified whether it was the policy of Lord Northbrook in March, 1884, or the totally opposite policy which he advocated seven months later. I trust that the Committee will hear from the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty a somewhat clear statement as to the responsibility which attaches to naval individuals in the Admiralty. I confess that, after the debate which occurred the other night, I have been more confused upon that point than I was before. I have never, since 1869, been able to understand the responsibility which attaches to Naval Lords. It was stated the other night that the Imperieuse and the Warpite are frightful examples of the bad system prevailing at the Admiralty. It was then pointed out that the case of the Benbow was an example of blunders owing to the goodness of the system, but badly applied. In one of these cases it was alleged that the system was bad, but in the other that it was good. The hon. and gallant Member for the Eastbourne Division of Sussex (Admiral Field) said that under the Order of Council in 1869 the whole position of the Naval Members

